Gentlemen, what does it mean? We come to this conclusion. By the very history of what has transpired here, the very history that has transpired, our administrative bodies are trying to coerce the courts to conform to administrative will, and the courts, to maintain respect and dignity to preserve our social order, cannot bow to administrative will.

This motion was filed out of time and the court has no jurisdiction at this time to hear a motion for new trial. The motion is going to be overruled.

Congress Uneasy—Members Fear Resentment From Voters at Delay in Passing Excess-Profits Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, following my observations in the House a few days ago regarding excess-profits tax legislation, I attach hereto a statement appearing in the Washington newspaper by the columnist Thomas L. Stokes.

Current rumors indicate that some sort of a compromise has been agreed upon by the conferees by which no immediate excess-profit taxes are to be levied. Surely these rumors cannot be well-founded in fact. How anyone can justify immediate adjournment of this Congress without taking care of this essential and greatly needed tax measure is beyond my conception. I know that many of our colleagues are anxious to get home to look after their political fortunes. I believe it would be to their political advantage to stay in session and thus discharge their full duties. From my experience through the years, I have never suffered at the hands of the voters when they were convinced that I was making a conscientious effort to faithfully discharge the trust they have reposed in me. If we must recess for a while, and I see no reason for that, let us return again soon after the election early in November to finish our work in the Eighty-first Congress. It will not suffice to adjourn this Congress with some sort of a pretended agreement to enact excess-profits-tax legislation in the Eighty-second Congress. We have no authority to speak for subsequent Congresses. When the report from the conferees on the tax measure comes up for consideration, if it does not provide for proper excess-profits-tax levies, let us recommit it with specific instructions to carry out the expressed wishes of the House.

Regardless as to what we do with the tax measures, I intend to vote against the adjournment of Congress in view of the continuing serious international problems confronting us. The abovementioned statement follows:

CONGRESS UNEASY—MEMBERS FEAR RESENTMENT FROM VOTERS AT DELAY IN PASSING EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

Uneasy lie the heads of many of those who wear the crowns in this Eighty-first Congress who in 7 weeks must face the voters to answer for their stewardship.

Around the Capitol you hear much frightened conversation about a voter rebellion against the "ins" of whatever party, come November 7. That happens occasionally in critical times such as these, when people are disturbed and confused about things in general and strike out blindly at the exposed targets—those in public office.

That fear, of course, is subject to the usual discount that most politicians "run scared." Nevertheless, the anxiety is manifest in numerous ways, among them, the overwhelming vote last week of the House, 331 to 2, instructing its Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee to prepare a bill to tax excess profits for the Eighty-first Congress which runs until January 3.

This gesture, which probably will turn out to be no more than that, reveals how sensitive Members of that body—all of whose seats are at stake in November—have become to complaints from their constituents about raising their income taxes beginning October 1—a month before election, incidentally—and not at the same time taxing war profits.

OBVIOUS IN SENATE, TOO

This does not look like equality of sacrifice—and isn't, of course.

The guilt consciousness so obvious in the House was apparent also in the Senate, only a third of whose Members are up for reelection. There, after the House action, proponents of an excess profits tax now lost by only 2 votes, 34 to 36, in an attempt to get the Senate to rescind its previous resolution for a bill at the next session and follow the House recommendation for one in this Congress.

The resolutions of each body are only promissory notes, and no action appears likely before next year, since an extra session after the election would be required. But they at least give hard-pressed Members a piece of paper to wave frantically before their constituents who already are figuring how they are going to meet their increased tax bills and may, consequently, not be too sympathetic.

Anybody who knows anything about the operation of Congress—and this reporter lays some claim to that after 29 years here—knows that there is no excuse whatever for not taxing war profits now. There's been a lot of sham and flapdoodle about how long it takes to write a bill because of the complicated subject. There has been plenty of time. The Korean war is nearly 3 months old. Just after it started the tax committees of both House and Senate were reminded that an excess-profits tax should be included to make for equality of sacrifice. But the Senate Finance Committee, before which the tax bill already passed by the House was pending, voted for postponement until next year, which, likewise, was advocated by Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder.

PLENTY OF TIME NOW

As a matter of fact, there is plenty of time now to write an excess-profits tax. The Treasury Department has done considerable research on the subject, which it did to be ready in event Congress decided to act now and could submit a workable measure very shortly.

The dilatory tactics have worked very nicely for those who hope somehow to avoid enactment of such a tax or, if it comes, that it not be made retroactive to the beginning of the Korean war, July 1, this year, or October 1, when increased individual and corporate income taxes become effective, as was recommended in Senate and House resolutions.

This part of the resolutions about retroactivity of the tax may turn out to be lip service. In this connection, Representative JOHN CARROLL, Democrat, of Colorado, one of the leaders in the House for an excess-profits tax now, pointed out that the Senate Finance Committee, in its report on the tax bill, said flatly that the tax would apply to 1951 profits, and also read a recent interview in Paris with Secretary Snyder who said the tax would be applied to 1951 profits, as it would be difficult to make the tax retroactive to 1950 profits.

Representative EBERHARTER, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, also active for an excess-profits tax now, put the issue in a nutshell when he told the House:

"We feel that it is not fair, particularly to low-income groups of this country, people earning less than $5,000 a year, to have their taxes increased an average of 20 percent and at the same time be forced to pay higher prices for groceries, for rent, and for the other necessities of life, and not have this tax measure do anything about war profits."

That seems fair and reasonable.

Information Program of the Department of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, last Friday I received from the Assistant Secretary of State, Jack K. McFall, a note which said:

I thought you might be interested in seeing what your constituents are doing to help put over the Department's information program.

Attached to this note was a clipping from the Dallas (Tex.) Morning News of August 27, written by David Botter. Believing this excellent article will be of interest to other Senators, I am asking that it be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXANS AIR NATION'S VOICE

(By David Botter)

WASHINGTON, August 26.—We have a story to tell. It's all true. But a lot of people can't, or don't, believe it. They haven't seen our proof. They can't even imagine the things we say. And some other people are telling them our story isn't so—even if they are allowed to hear or read it.

It's a matter-of-fact story, to us. But it's pretty tall Texas telling, to folk who haven't seen us or what we talk about.

To tell this story straight, to convince these people that we are playing fair with them, we have a big selling job. We have ideas for sale. But our ideas can be no more winning than our story.

This, then, is the job of America's expanding information services—which this year will cost about $130,000,000. And it's the job of some of your old friends and neighbors—Texans who have been recruited to help tell and sell America to people who just can't believe what they hear about us.

HAPPY INDUSTRIOUS PEOPLE

Ours is the story of a big, rich country, filled with big-hearted, basically happy, pretty industrious people who respect human beings because they are human beings; who don't go looking for fights but will take one on when it's necessary; who believe in human and governmental decency and fair play; who think policemen are there to help people, not frighten them into cellars.

Now our job—the job of this bunch of Texans—is to tell the story so people can understand it. It must be told so men and women who never saw a towering bank building or a State fair or a town full of cars or beautiful department stores won't hold it against us for having the things they never saw. It must be told so people who aren't free and who don't make $10 or $15 a day will want to improve their own systems instead of wanting to tear ours down.

We want to sell freedom, with this story, because we know that free people will want peace.

This is a big job of story telling. But it's not too big for people like Parker May of Abilene and Jack McDermott of Lufkin, for Ruth Lewis of Austin and Bess Stephenson of Fort Worth, for Carolyn Ramsey, of Marshall, and Bernice Strong, of Alpine.

BIG JOB OF STORY TELLING

Their job is in radio, newspaper, magazine, book, picture—every available avenue of information. It centers on one word—"truth".

McDermott is a former Lufkin editor and publisher. He used to write beautiful prose about the Lufkin Panthers, toughest football team in the Piney Woods. Now he directs the entire program of news gathering that keeps American press officers and local newspaper editors around the world alert to what is happening here. It is a plan for shipping news and stories about every facet of American life all over the world for publication, for repetition by word of mouth, for speechmaking. It even includes preparation and printing of magazines and other documents for free distribution, setting up libraries of information for people who will take time to hear what the United States is doing.

Working with McDermott is Bess Stephenson. Her bylines in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram were widely known. Today her field is unlimited Americana.

She is chief of a section that produces and directs the production of basic story material about this country—stories about how we do things, how we view things, what our basic policies are. In her ken are science, literature, art, politics, business, industry, labor, agriculture, forestry—the works.

Carolyn Ramsey has a farm home near Marshall. Now she jeeps across the country with a camera. Seven times she's gone across the land, getting pictures to prove what America is. And she is a secret weapon, because the Soviets will let us exhibit pictures of America, even when they jam our broadcasts and ban our printing. So Miss Ramsey's pictures can pierce the iron curtain and her product goes on display in libraries and galleries all over the world.

EACH HAS PART IN PROGRAM

Parker May is executive officer for the whole information program—press, radio, movies. His is the business-office job of trying to figure out where money spent on a certain phase of the American story will do the most good.

Bernice Strong used to be a publicist for Sul Ross College. Now she aims her stories at Latin America, keeping the hemisphere neighbors alert to our doings. Jim Bob Calley did turns on Lubbock and Abilene newspapers. Now she aims her pieces at the Far East, trying hard to tie American interests in those lands to tangible evidence here and abroad.

Charlie Miller of Clyde, Abilene, and El Paso, and Ed Capers of Fort Worth are editors, sorting, selecting, perfecting stories for shipment abroad. Capers works on the wireless bulletin which moves out regularly to American embassies and Foreign Service offices. Local editors in all parts get copies for reproduction, for comment, for information about America.

And in faraway Rangoon, where Uncle Sam looks for friends in Asia, Ruth Lewis, the former Austin American-Statesman drama critic, sees that the bulletin and all other stories of America get to radio stations and native newspapers so they can have the truth. A top-flight operative in American information work since World War II, she will be coming home soon. They have a job for her in New York, writing script for the Voice of America to beam to the Far East.

RADIO INFORMATION SPECIALIST

Also in New York is Vestal Lott, the former Clarendon newspaperman who now is a specialist in radio information for the Voice headquarters, whence stem the 210 hours a week of American words in 33 languages by short wave—to be picked up and rebroadcast.

There are many more Texans out there telling our story—throwing millions of words into the great battle for men's minds.

All you have to do to know their job is big is to listen to or watch Jacob Malik in action. Stalin's UN mouthpiece is the past master of the "upside down" language. His is typical of the tripe that is spread around the world about us. He talks about "Asia for the Asiatics," or "Iran for the Iranians" or "Germany for the Germans." But what he means is Asia for the Russians, Iran for the Kremlin, Germany for the supreme Soviet.

This is the phase of war that surpasses physical combat in planning and precision, and for promise of return. People fear what they do not know. They fear, some of them, the very prosperity and happiness of America. They envy it. They are told ours is the aim of imperialism.

TRYING TO GET TRUTH ACROSS

These Texans and their cohorts are just trying to get the truth across. Russia is spending more and more radio time and more dishonest effort in its propaganda program. We know ours is working because the Soviets are trying to stop it by every means.

We think we have the truth, the faith, the hope of men who want freedom on our side. But we still have some preaching and selling to do.

And in the market place of ideas, these Texans are working for you. They are trying to win friends for your country, trying to sell just one commodity—truth—in daily, direct, throat-cutting competition with the big lie.

Fifty Billion Dollars and No Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the people in Wisconsin want to know what became of the $50,000,000,000 that was supposedly spent for national defense. There are no new tanks, no new Navy, no big guns, no 70-group Air Force. Now we are told that only $1 in $7 actually went to buy arms. Most of the money went for salaries, supplies, freight, and for other services. This is nothing less than bungling and inefficiency on a high level. The Democrats cannot escape the responsibility for this situation.

Mr. Speaker, taxpayers in 4 years of cold war, put on the line, $50,000,000,000 for our military defense, a stupendous sum. That is twice the cost of World War I and we never fired a gun. At that price the American public was assured that it was buying security. Yet the war in Korea today shows the United States to be short of almost everything. Now, Mr. Truman wants ten billion more, just for a starter. Bigger and more staggering sums will be requested after the elections in November. He dares not make additional requests at this time, 6 weeks from the 7th of November.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that high-ranking generals and admirals are asking what became of the $50,000,000,000. They want to know: Where are the guns, the new tanks, the planes that are designed to stop infantry movements, the new weapons that would surely stop any tank? Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Defense said once, not long ago, that these weapons made tanks useless in time of war. Korea, no doubt, jolted him.

We are informed that one-half of those defense dollars have gone to pay military salaries, all of which have been raised above the prewar level. The other half has gone to pay for services and supplies. This includes pay, travel, telephone, freight, rent, and pensions. Food, fuel, ammunition, clothing, and other items are also included.

I repeat again, Mr. Speaker, only $1 in $7 was spent on arms of any kind. One dollar in sixteen has gone for equipment other than aircraft. Only four billion was invested in aircraft and three billion for all other equipment—guns, ships, trucks, radar, new weapons, machinery, and noncombat equipment, such as furniture, typewriters, and passenger automobiles.

Mr. Speaker, this is just a bird's-eye look at our defense spending for which we received so little in the way of ships, guns, planes, and tanks. This situation should be fully investigated. In the meantime it is quite obvious that our spending for war must be increased if we are to win it. However, the question that confronts the American people is: Can we trust the Democratic administration to do the job?

Contract Between Southwestern Power Administration and Oklahoma Utility Companies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. L. J. Wilhoite, chairman of the Electric Power Board of Chattanooga, Tenn., and one from Ken G. Whitaker, secretary of the information committee of the Tennessee Valley Public Power Association. Both these letters are dated July 20, and are addressed to Hon. Oscar Chapman, Secretary of the Interior. The letters commend Secretary Chapman for his devoted public service. I ask that they may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELECTRIC POWER BOARD OF CHATTANOOGA,
July 20, 1950.

Hon. OSCAR CHAPMAN,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have very closely followed the negotiations between the Oklahoma private utilities and the Southwestern Power Administration which resulted in signing the contract last week. I have been kept in close touch with the situation through Ken Whitaker of this organization and Sam O'Neal who represents the Tennessee Valley Public Power Association in Washington.

I say to you in all sincerity that I think that you have made a real contribution to the cause of making electricity available to the greatest number of people at rates within their ability to pay. I feel that you have every right to take a very just pride in this accomplishment. I am familiar with some of the difficulties which you were up against and think you ought to be congratulated most heartily.

Sincerely,

L. J. WILHOITE,
Chairman.

TENNESSEE VALLEY PUBLIC POWER ASSOCIATION,
July 20, 1950.

Hon. OSCAR CHAPMAN.
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAPMAN: I received a copy yesterday of the contract between Southwestern Power Administration and the two Oklahoma utility companies. While I was generally familiar with this situation, through conversations with you and others in your department, I nevertheless enjoyed very much examining the contract.

I think you did an outstanding job in protecting the interests of the preference customers. Not only did you protect the interests of those municipalities who now own their distribution facilities, but you made it possible for any municipality in the future who decides that this is the proper course to be protected as well. There has been some ambiguity in the Congress on the definition of preference customers and I believe this contract will serve to clarify the situation.

Realizing as I do the extreme difficulties under which you were working, I want to again very heartily congratulate you on the way in which you handled this situation. You made a definite contribution to the cause of making electricity available to the largest number of people possible at the cheapest rates consistent with good business. This, in the opinion of our association, is a real accomplishment.

Sincerely yours,

KEN G. WHITAKER,
Secretary, Information Committee.

Denis Hurley Nominates Hon. Herbert H. Lehman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Denis M. Hurley, Esq., of Brooklyn, N. Y., renominating Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN for the United States Senate at the Democratic State Convention at Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Hurley's address follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow delegates, if we have learned nothing else from this great convention, we have once again seen demonstrated the time-honored principle that political success must be founded upon personal sacrifice and upon party unity. We saw this exemplified here, only a few moments ago, when the nomination of Congressman WALTER A. LYNCH for the governorship of the State of New York was made unanimous.

Out of this great convention, I knew that some high honor was eventually bound to come to the Borough of Churches, with its millions of ardent baseball fans, but I did not suspect in what form that honor would come. I take it as a signal tribute to Brooklyn, and to her contribution of the largest Democratic vote in the State of New York, that two of her sons have been chosen to place in nomination the two standard bearers of our party.

Twenty-two years ago, in 1928, I discovered that an outstanding man in the business and financial world was dedicating all his time, his energy, and his talents to stamping out the curse of religious intolerance in this country. The campaign of vilification waged against the Happy Warrior, the unforgettable Alfred E. Smith, of blessed memory, was the signal for the entrance into the political arena of the Gallant Crusader.

For twenty-two years, I have watched the spectacular rise of his star on the political horizon, and, in my judgment, he is still fighting for the same sublime causes.

However, I am not here to nominate a saint with a record of absolute perfection. My candidate is a human being. And so, on occasion, as every American has the right to do, I have disagreed with my candidate's stand on certain public questions. Any statesman, worth his salt, who has the courage to stand up and be counted upon important controversial issues, runs the risk of sharp and violent disagreement with some of the voters. But, disagree with him, as I have at times, I have never once doubted the sincerity of this gallant crusader. I have also had the temerity, once, maybe twice, to disagree with my beloved wife. I soon got over that. But I still love my wife, and I still respect, admire and esteem my candidate. Since charity covers a multitude of sins, then, surely, the spirit of universal charity manifested, through all his years, by this great man, should blot out a few errors of judgment committed without the slightest taint of malice.

It is my proud privilege to nominate one whose name has become synonymous, not only throughout our own State but throughout the Nation and the world, with statesmanship, sincerity, and nobility of purpose, one whose name is as familiar to you as your own—a name that, through the years, has become one of the chief boasts, not only of the Democratic Party but of the people of the State of New York and of the United States of America.

The outstanding record of accomplishment of our candidate for over two decades has already brought him imperishable and lasting fame. Strictly on his merit, and upon the excellence of his performance, he has won a unique place in the historic annals of our generation and certainly has no further need for the honor which we are about to bestow upon him. But like the noble soldier that he is, he will respond when duty calls.

Twenty-two years ago the people of New York State gave him their first vote of confidence as a candidate for State-wide office on a ticket headed by his devoted friend and coworker, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

From 1928 to 1932, during two terms, he served his State well as lieutenant governor, acting as Governor Roosevelt's chief assistant and deputy and as the leader and key member of that illustrious group which served Franklin Roosevelt in his two memorable terms as Governor of New York.

When the American people called Franklin Roosevelt to Washington as President of the United States in 1932, the people of New York, in their great wisdom, turned to the man who had been Roosevelt's right hand and named him as their Governor.

For the next 10 years, through four successive and unprecedented terms, this gallant crusader gave to New York one of the most brilliant administrations in all the history of this State. His very name became a symbol of sound, wise, and progressive government. He carried on as the fearless champion of right and progress, as a fighter for the underdog, and at the same time as a sound and practical business administrator.

A man born in New York City, with roots deep in that metropolis, he nevertheless became, as Governor, a friend and advocate of the farmers, of their interest, and their welfare.

Before entering upon State-wide public service this man of many talents had proved his skill and worth in the world of business and finance. He turned that background to good account by so managing the finances and business affairs of New York State as to leave the State treasury with a huge surplus—a surplus which his successor has found it possible to spend and waste away.

This record of achievement would have seemed more than sufficient honor and glory for any man, but the public interest still clamored for his services. In 1942, with the Nation at war, he was again called to duty in the service of all humanity. He was selected by the unanimous vote of many nations to serve as the first Director General of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. In that capacity, he organized and carried through the noblest adventure in humanitarianism in the history of the world, one of the most difficult tasks any man had ever been called upon to perform. But this gallant crusader for every cause that is good, performed it with such skill and brilliance, with such compassion and understanding, that the name of UNRRA remains today synonymous with humanitarianism throughout the earth.

And, then, only last year, when the Democratic Party of this State called him forth from a well-earned retirement to be its candidate in a special election for the high office of United States Senator, he again, like Cincinnatus, bowed to the wishes of his party and of his fellow countrymen and was again elected in a contest too fresh and green in our memories to need recalling.

In his 1 year as United States Senator, he proved again his statesmanship and grasp of large affairs too numerous to mention. In every one of the vital issues that confronted the United States Senate during the past year, he had a leading voice. The cause of liberalism, the cause of progressive legislation, the cause of the poor, the humble, the friendless, and the underprivileged had a new and bold champion in the Senate of the United States. At the same time, the cause of economy in government, of orderly and constructive and appropriate conservatism in government had also found a friend.

And, finally, the cause of totalitarian communism and godless tyranny found in him a fierce and implacable enemy who never lost an opportunity to urge and to demand all-out military preparedness. His voice was often heard in the Senate urging the mobilization of every force, both our own and those of all our friends and allies abroad, for concerted resistance to the black evil of atheistic communism.

In the lexicon of the Democratic Party, the letter "L" stands for leadership and for loyalty, for liberty, and for liberalism; and now it stands for Lynch, our next governor. But, for many, many years, it has stood and it still stands for this great and good man, for this champion of champions, this fighter against tyranny and totalitarianism, this preeminent statesman, this voice of wisdom and courage in our Nation's councils; it stands for this gallant crusader, whom I now give you as I place in nomination for the high office of United States Senator, the name of Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN.

The Katyn Massacre

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in line with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] let me call your attention to the fact that Lt. Col. John H. Van Vliet filed a report with the War Department 5 years ago showing that the Russians were the ones who murdered these Poles.

That report disappeared, either in the War Department or in the State Department, and Colonel Van Vliet has now filed a supplemental report showing that the Russians murdered these Polish prisoners.

Yet, during all these years this Government has permitted the carrying on of a persecution of the German people that is far worse than anything we southern people went through at the hands of the carpetbag administration during the dark days of reconstruction.

They have been hanging German soldiers, German doctors, and German civilians, in the name of the United States of America, as late as 5 years after the war closed. This has been done largely by an alien element in order to create, perpetuate, and intensify the ill feeling between the Americans and the German people, and thereby drive the Germans into an alinement with the Communists of Russia in case of war between that country and the United States.

I am not for this United Nations investigating this incident. That is the duty of the Congress of the United States. We should investigate and see what the facts are and stop these useless persecutions of the German people in our name.

At this point I am inserting the supplementary letter which Colonel Van Vliet has filed with the War Department giving the facts in this horrible Katyn massacre. I hope every Member of Congress, and everyone else who scans this RECORD, will take the time to read it carefully.

The letter referred to follows:

FORT LEWIS, WASH., May 11, 1950.

Subject: The Katyn case.

F. L. PARKS,

Major General, United States Army,
Chief of Information:

1. Pursuant to your letter of April 26, 1950 (inclosure No. 1), I am personally typing this report of my recollections concerning the Katyn case. I am retaining one carbon copy for my personal file.

2. Since 5 years have elapsed since I made the first report to Major General Bissell this report will have to omit some details, such as names which I have forgotten. In order to assist in locating my original report, here are the circumstances under which it was made:

On May 22, 1945, General Bissell discussed the case with me alone in his private office in the Pentagon for about 20 minutes. He decided that it was important and directed his civilian female assistant (secretary? stenographer?) to go with me to closed room across the hall and take dictation. I dictated my report, she typed it up, and we added the photographs as inclosures. The general read the finished report, directed that it be marked "top secret," and filed. He then dictated the letter directing me to silence, and had me sign a copy of it in his presence. He explained the importance of my remaining silent, gave me my copy of the letter, and thanked me.

3. Narrative: I was a prisoner of war at Oflag IX/AZ in Rotenburg, Germany, in April 1943. It was primarily a British officers prison camp headed by Brigadier Nicholson (who had been the defender of Calais). I was the senior of the 125 (approximately) American officers in the camp. At this time the German press began a big splurge on the Katyn case. So also did the German radio.

(Note: Mention of this radio violates the certificate I had to sign upon being processed as a returned POW.)

Hauptman Heyl, the German camp commander, told Brigadier Nicholson and me that he had orders to send two American officers and one British officer to the railroad station at Kassel, Germany, where they would be met by British Major General Fortune (from another nearby POW camp). He had commanded the British First Division in France.)

Hauptman Heyl stated that I would be one of the two United States officers; that I would select the other one; that together with other Allied prisoners we would be a board of inquiry to investigate the Katyn massacre. I flatly refused to have any part of it. Brigadier Nicholson backed me up on this and together we wrote a letter to the Swiss protecting power which stated that no officers from the camp would make any visit to Katyn or make any investigation, or express any opinion. That if we were forced to go it would be only as individual prisoners under guard and against our protest. That we could not be considered as representatives of the prison camp, our Army, or our Nation, and that we protested violently this apparent attempt to use us for German propaganda purposes.

Our protest did no good. Using armed guards, the Germans took me and Capt. Donald Stewart, F. A. (Regular Army) to the Kassell railroad station, where they expected to meet Major General Fortune. He did not arrive, to the surprise of the German guards. We were then taken to Berlin and jailed in an Arbeits Kommando (sp?)—a building overlooking the Spree River, housing PW's of several nationalities who were performing labor in Berlin.

In this jail we met several United States soldiers who had been brought from a nearby PW camp for the same reason that we had. One of these (I knew Taussig personally) was a Corporal Taussig, who had been in the same regiment with me for the invasion of Algiers by the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Infantry. There were also several British soldiers and a British civilian (internee) as well as Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson (British, South African Signal Corps), and a British captain, Medical Corps, whose name I cannot now remember. In my opinion these men were actually what they appeared to be and did not include any "plants." We prisoners of war were very careful in our efforts to make certain identification.

Soon we were taken, one by one, to the jail office, where we were interviewed by several German staff officers and some civilian officials who appeared to be from both the foreign office and the propaganda ministry. The procedure appeared about the same for all of us. "Since you have volunteered to investigate this terrible Katyn atrocity, we are taking you to the scene. You will, of course, sign a parole not to escape."

"The hell we did volunteer. We don't want to go. Send us back to our camps." Great surprise and much chatter among the Germans. Then the same thing over again.

Finally they announced that since we wouldn't give our paroles they would have to place guards on the airplane with us. This meant that some prisoners would not make the trip, to make room for the guards. The American soldiers were left back.

Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson was from the same camp as Captain Stewart and myself. He had come to Berlin with us. We knew him.

Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson was the senior in the group. We cautioned the entire group to do no talking, to give no indications of opinion, and not to cooperate in any way with the Germans. All agreed. It was evident to all of us that we were involved in an international mess with terrific political implications.

An English-speaking German captain was placed in charge of the group together with an English-speaking Sonderfuehrer, who gave the name of Von Johnson, spoke idiomatic American, and said he had attended school at Rice in the United States of America.

We were flown from Templehof to Smolensk about the 6th of May 1948. At that time Smolensk was about 60 miles from the front and appeared to contain only garrison troops. We were billeted in some of the remaining intact buildings, of which there were only a few. Some sort of a German service unit maintained an officers' mess where we all ate. While in Smolensk we were taken on a sightseeing tour by the local service unit commander and a major who appeared to be an agricultural expert and enthusiast who was trying to rehabilitate the land with the remnants of the Russian peasant population. His efforts included a model village. In my opinion this "hospitality" was spontaneous and was prompted partly by his own enthusiasm for his work and partly because he hadn't had many visitors. It didn't appear to be organized on orders from Berlin.

A German lieutenant (spoke no English) appeared from the group that was in charge of operations at the scene of the mass graves in Katyn Forest. He acted as our guide. We were driven to the site where there was a gate, guarded by young soldiers in Polish uniforms. A sickly sweet odor of decaying bodies was everywhere. At the graves it was nearly overpowering. There were several graves. Professor Herr Dr. Butz (Bootz?) a German expert in forensic medicine was present together with other technicians. Several Polish Red Cross workers were present. Civilian labor was being used to remove bodies from the graves. Each body was searched very carefully, examined, identified, and reburied in a nearby mass grave which was to become a national shrine with suitable monuments. The articles removed from each body were placed in a large manila envelope for safekeeping. The search of the bodies was very thorough, including removal of shoes or boots where it was possible. (Sometimes the whole leg from the knee down came off with the boot.) The examiners wore rubber aprons and rubber gloves. A typist was present recording the findings on each body.

We followed our guide right into each of the graves—stepping on bodies that were piled like cordwood, face down usually, to a depth of about five to seven bodies covered with about 5 feet of earth. About 300 bodies were laid out beside one of the graves. These all had their hands tied behind them with cord. The rest appeared not to have been tied. All bodies had a bullet hole in the back of the head near the neck with the exit wound of the bullet being in the forehead or front upper part of the skull.

The graves on the down-hill part of the slope were more moist than the others. One end of one grave had standing water in it. German photographers were present and took both still and motion pictures of our party while we inspected the graves. Copies of the still pictures were later given to us. We never saw or heard anything of the movies.

After we inspected the graves we were shown several other test holes which had been dug in vicinity, together with very old human bones, i. e., no meat left on them, which were said to have been dug up there. I am inclined to believe the story, although there was no proof. The Germans made much of the fact that this wooded knoll was a long-standing burial site used by the Russian secret police. I forget whether they called them the OGPU, NKVD, or MVD. There was a rustic lodge on the low bluff overlooking the small landing on the river (Dnieper River, I believe). This lodge was alleged the scene of frequent tortures, drinking parties, and various other orgies held by the Russian police as matters of amusement and recreation as well as routine business. The Germans produced an old peasant, Russian, who claimed that this forest of Katyn had an evil reputation—it was forbidden ground—that he had seen big closed vans go from the railroad siding (some miles distant) into the forest and that there were stories of shots being heard very often in the woods. This was supposed to confirm that the Russians had brought the victims to the mass graves by rail and truck some time before the Germans occupied the area.

The British medical captain in the group understood German very well and a little Russian which he had learned while taking care of Russian prisoners.

About a mile down the road the Germans had taken over a house as a field museum and office. The porch and front rooms were filled with glass showcases containing items removed from bodies in the graves. There were sample uniform insignia ranging from general to lieutenant, there were several Geneva arm bands, many letters, photographs, diaries, news clippings, personal souvenirs, etc. These items were just the better samples. In the back rooms of the house there were the individual envelopes containing the items removed from the corpses. This building was also permeated with the smell of the graves, coming from the showcases and the envelopes.

At this point the Germans produced two small drinks for everyone and then we returned to our billets in Smolensk.

We were flown back to the same jail in Berlin and stayed there about 10 days. During this time the Germans were apparently trying to decide what to do with us. (The British soldiers and the civilian internee were returned to their respective camps before the end of this 10-day period—or so we were told—leaving us four officers to wonder what it was all about. An English speaking German soldier or Sonderfuhrer Von Johnson would take us for walks through the Tiergarten every day, along with guards. It was during this walk period that we had a chance to talk without fear of microphones. Our discussion while in the jail always avoided any mention of what we thought about who had committed the murders at Katyn

During these walks, Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson did a lot of talking with the Germans. Told them that he had once published a book and that as soon as he returned home he was going to get permission from his superiors to write a book about this experience. We couldn't get him to shut up about any subject at any time except the big question of "Whodunnit?" He was a windbag. He claimed to be a member of a group of amateur investigators of the supernatural. He even carried a leather in his wallet which he said was from the headdress of the American Indian Chief (spirit) whom he had contacted through a medium in South Africa.

We gathered from the Germans that the front office didn't know what to do with us. There was some hopeful implication that we might be released, possibly through Spain.

One afternoon Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson was bundled off by the Germans on about 10 minutes notice. He seemed very surprised and quite uneasy as he left the jail. We never saw or heard of him again. That night Captain Stewart and I were returned to our original prison camp, where we were met by Hauptman Heyl. We asked him what kind of a story he had told us about going to meet Major General Fortune. He replied that Fortune had been seriously ill with bronchitis.

(I later met Major General Fortune and he had not been sick at all.)

Prior to leaving Berlin we were told that Germany had not and would not make any propaganda use of our visit to the graves or the pictures taken of the visit. I have never heard of their doing so.

Throughout the rest of our time in prison camps Captain Stewart and I refused to discuss our experiences concerning Katyn and never stated what opinion we had formed.

I reached the American lines in the sector of the One Hundred and Fourth Infantry Division near Duben, Germany, at the Mulde River line on May 5, 1945, still carrying the photographs given me at Katyn.

I showed the photographs to G–2 of the One Hundred and Fourth Division. (I had previously showed these to only one other person apart from the German prison camp security personnel who conducted periodic searches, but always allowed me to keep the photographs because they had been stamped "Gepruft." This other person was Col. Thomas D. Drake, senior officer in Oflag 64, who was repatriated for stomach ulcers. Before he left the prison camp to be repatriated Captain Stewart and I talked with him, showed him the pictures and asked that he report the matter to the War Department. He laughed a me and said that I had been taken in completely by the German propaganda experts. I don't know if he ever mentioned the matter when he reached the States.)

G–2 of the One Hundred and Fourth Division recognized that my report was one of interest to both the State and War Departments and provided transportation to Headquarters VII Corps in Leipzig. Gen. J. Lawton Collins then commanded the VII Corps.

General Collins (who has known me since I was a child) discussed the matter with me and set the necessary wheels in motion to get me back to the Pentagon with all haste.

In Paris I stayed with General Barker and at his suggestion discussed the matter with a full colonel (whose name I have forgotten) connected with war-crimes investigations. He decided it was a matter for the War Department and the State Department and took no action.

Colonel Drake, General Collins, General Bissell, and General Bissell's stenographer are the only persons I have ever told of my conclusions concerning who murdered the Polish officers at Katyn (except, of course, the other members of the party who visited the site with me).

4. Conclusions: I believe that the Russians did it. The rest of the group that visited the site stated to me that they believed that the Russians did it. (Captain, now Major, Donald Stewart, Field Artillery, can be asked to verify this. I don't know his present address. He is in the Regular Army.)

5. Discussion: At the beginning of the newspaper publicity concerning Katyn I believed the whole thing to be one huge, well-managed, desperate lie by the Germans to split the western allies from Russia.

I hated the Germans. I didn't want to believe them. At that time, like many others, I more or less believed that Russia could get along with us.

When I became involved in the visit to Katyn I realized that the Germans would do their best to convince me that Russia was guilty. I made up my mind not to be convinced by what must be a propaganda effort.

The apparent weak spot in the German story was the fact that Germany had occupied the ground around Smolensk for a long time before announcing the discovery of the graves. (The exact dates are a matter of record. I do not have the facilities to look them up for entry in this report.)

I wanted to believe that whole thing was a frame-up. Could these be bodies from an extermination camp, dressed as Polish officers and "planted"?

Could the letters, diaries, identification tags, news clippings—all be forgeries?

What about the state of decomposition of the bodies? Did it appear to agree with the German story of when they must have been buried? After all, I am no expert on body decomposition. What about the temperature, moisture, soil bacteria? What about the German statements that Polish families had been trying to locate their relatives, known to have been imprisoned when Russia occupied part of Poland? Was it true that these Polish relatives ceased to get answers from their imprisoned relatives—that a cloak of mystery descended all at once? Where is proof of who killed these men? Who saw it done?

And so on and so on—I tried every way I knew how to avoid believing that Russia had done it. I tried every way to convince myself that the Germans had done it. I wanted to believe that the Germans had done it.

Since the graves were already opened when we were there, it was not possible to see for ourselves what sort of growth had existed on top of the graves, in order to see how long the graves had existed. And if we had been present, how could we know that the Germans had not cleverly transplanted older bushes to give the appearance of age to the graves?

So you see that we pursued every line of attack to weaken the German story and avoid the conclusion that the Russians had done the killing. It was only with great reluctance that I decided finally that it must be true; that for once the Germans were not lying; that the facts were as claimed by the Germans. I have thought about this a lot in the past 7 years, and freely admit that there never was presented to me any single piece of evidence that could be taken as an absolute proof. But the sum of circumstantial evidence, impressions formed at the time of looking at the graves, what I saw in people's faces—all forces the conclusion that Russia did it.

The uniforms on the bodies were obviously of the best material and tailor made. The footwear appeared to be of the best and included many pairs that were obviously made to order. The uniforms and footwear all were obviously well-fitted. This convinced me that the bodies were truly those of Polish officers. The degree of wear on the clothing and particularly the wear on the shoes led me to believe that these officers had been dead a long time, otherwise the shoes and clothing would show much more wear. This was a point that was not called to our attention by the Germans. It is one of the strongest arguments by which to fix the date of the killing.

6. Last summer I receive some letters from Mr. Montgomery M. Green. I wrote the Department of the Army for instructions on how to reply to Mr. Green. In order to clear my files and possibly to be of assistance to Captain Semple, I am enclosing some papers marked: "Montgomery Green and related papers."

JOHN H VAN VLIET, Jr.,
Lieutenant Colonel, Twenty-third Infantry.

Mr. Speaker, the war with Germany has been over for more than 5 years. It is high time that we made peace with the people of Germany, whose support we are going to need if those Communists who are plotting the destruction of our civilization should succeed in plunging us into a world conflict.

We were betrayed at Yalta into turning the victory over to Communist Russia, the worst enemy civilization has ever known. The same elements that murdered those Polish prisoners at Katyn, through an organized racial minority, are now attempting to control the world, overthrow the Government of the United States and wreck the civilization of mankind.

It is about time for the American people, and especially the ones in control of our Government, to wake up, clean house, fumigate, and drive from power every individual who even sympathizes with the enemies of our country.

Echoes From the Threatened Railroad Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a mimeographed statement which Mr. G. Metzman, president of the New York Central Railroad System, sent to the employees of that system on August 24, and a copy of a reply to the mimeographed statement dated September 1, 1950, which Mr. W. P. Kennedy, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, sent to Mr. Metzman. I think the two documents speak for themselves.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To All New York Central System Employees:

Again there has come a threat of a paralyzing national railroad strike. It was called by leaders of the Trainmen's and Conductors' Brotherhoods at the very moment when many of our loved ones are sparing no sacrifices in Korea and need every ounce of military production and other home-front backing that can be given them. It was called within an hour after assurances were given the President of the United States that there would be no strike.

A fact-finding board appointed by President Truman heard all the issues and made its report in June. This board was composed of men of national reputation known for their understanding of the problems of those who work in the ranks. The railroad management, whether they have agreed with board findings or not, regularly have felt that public opinion requires their acceptance. As usual, therefore, the managements accepted the report. But the union leaders, as has happened so frequently, rejected the report.

The management representatives, in their efforts to obtain a peaceful settlement, agreed just a few days ago to do even more than the fact-finding board proposed. At the request of President Truman's personal representative the managements agreed, as a part of a proposed 3-year peace settlement, to accept the board report plus granting an additional 5-cent-an-hour wage increase, plus automatic cost-of-living increases based on the rise in the cost-of-living index. This would have meant a total raise of 23 cents an hour for yard service employees; 5 cents an hour, instead of no increase, for road service employees; and, of course, security against price increases which add to the cost of living. But the brotherhood leaders rejected this also.

Under these circumstances it is shocking even to threaten a Nation-wide railroad strike in such a period of national emergency. Like anything else the right to strike can be abused. History shows that abuse of power inevitably leads the public and its legislative representatives to conclude that such abuses must be stopped—by law, if necessary In the interest of everyone—the unions themselves, if they wish to retain the right to strike, all railroad employees, the American public, and the members of our Armed Forces—the leaders of the Trainmen's and Conductors' Brotherhoods should be brought to their senses before they inflict irreparable harm.

G. METZMAN,
President.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Cleveland, Ohio, September 1, 1950.

Mr. GUSTAV METZMAN,
President, New York Central System, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. METZMAN: Numerous copies of your unwarranted circular of August 25, 1950, addressed to New York Central System employees, have been forwarded to me by our general chairmen and other members on your railroad.

We are disturbed and surprised that one holding the high position of president of the New York Central System did not determine the facts before issuing such a deceptive, vicious circular.

As you well know, President R. O. Hughes of the Order of Railway Conductors and I sent the following telegram to President Truman under date of August 25:

"We wish to personally advise you that at the concluding conference presided over by Dr. Steelman, in the east wing of the White House from 3 to 4 p. m., Wednesday, August 23, 1950, no mention whatsoever was made regarding the calling of any Nation-wide strike, and therefore any statement to the effect that we had broken our pledge is 100 percent false. Respectfully."

It occurs to me that, if, instead of injecting yourself into this controversy at this belated date by posting propaganda on your bulletin boards, you and one or more of the presidents of the principal railroads had long ago come forward to cooperate with the President of the United States and with his mediator, Dr. John R. Steelman, in an attempt to effect a just and peaceful settlement of this 17-months-old controversy, affecting the welfare of your employees, such action might have proved to be more constructive and more effective.

In the second paragraph of your circular you create the impression with your employees that a recommendation of an emergency board is final and binding. As you well know, this is contrary to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act Then you go on to convey the impression to your employees that all recommendations of all emergency boards have been accepted by railroad management. This also you know to be untrue. Daniel P. Loomis, representing the American railroads, testified before the Donnell committee, in an attempt to impose compulsory arbitration upon all railroad labor, testified that on at least three occasions railroad management had refused to abide by the recommendations of Presidential emergency boards.

Nor did you tell your employees that you, as president of the New York Central System, had personally appeared before the Donnell committee, recommending the enactment of the Donnell compulsory arbitration bill, while at no time did you show the slightest interest in effecting a just settlement in the current controversy, which eventually led to the possession of all American railroads by the United States Government, in keeping with the recommendation which the brotherhoods made to the President of the United States as of August 4.

Nor did you advise your employees that on numerous occasions dozens of American railroads, including the New York Central, had refused to apply decisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, which decisions are final and binding, as you well know, under the Railway Labor Act.

In these instances the brotherhoods were required to employ economic strength against the railroads involved to induce the railroads to apply the decisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board.

Reference to the patriotism of railroad workers is wholly uncalled for, entirely out of order, and certainly unbecoming. As you well know, the history of World War I and World War II falls to reveal that the Unknown Soldier was a railroad president or that any railroad president offered his life in combat. On the other hand, the history of these two wars does record that many loyal members of the brotherhoods fought and died for their country, while, in this country and abroad, hundreds of thousands rendered service, which the railroads reluctantly admitted was magnificent.

No need for you to wrap yourself in the American flag and close your eyes to the fact that members of the brotherhoods are now fighting in Korea, while we at home in their interest are fighting to preserve those things for which they stand

Why don't you tell your employees that, in an attempt to force upon the brotherhoods the unjust and unfair and unacceptable findings of Emergency Board No. 81, you attempted to bait us into the acceptance of the same by offering an additional 5 cents per hour with the understanding that all wage and rules requests would be frozen for a period of 27 months, save for a cost-of-living adjustment.

For your information I attach a release which went forward to the newspapers August 21 over the signature of the presidents of the two brotherhoods involved in the current controversy. To be very fair to you and to the presidents of the other American railroads, I will be delighted to publish in the Trainman News your honest answers to the questions which we raise in this release.

Interested as you must be in the promotion and development of harmonious labor-management relations throughout the New York Central System, without which prosperity and profit cannot accrue, I am at a loss to understand how, in justice to your shareholders and to the bankers who hold the working control of your railroad, you went out of your way as a propagandist to promote discord and dissatisfaction among your employees, and then stooped low in an attempt to dislodge the affection and regard which they have for the brotherhoods of which they are a living, vital, and militant part.

Do you not know such tactics belong to the ages and inevitably boomerang?

Very truly yours,

W. P. KENNEDY,
President.

Site for Atomic Bomb Plant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BARRATT O'HARA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted, I am extending my remarks to include a letter from the Honorable Frank Annunzio, the able and distinguished director of the Department of Labor of the State of Illinois, in which he convincingly presents the advantage to the Nation of locating in the extreme southern part of Illinois the proposed new plant for the manufacture of hydrogen bombs. I commend to my colleagues, as well as to the members of the Atomic Energy Commission, a careful reading of the thoughtful presentment of Mr. Annunzio of the advantages of this site in southern Illinois. The letter follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Chicago, September 11, 1950.

The Honorable BARRATT O'HARA
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE O'HARA: A recent announcement that the Atomic Energy Commission was seeking a suitable plant site inside the United States for the manufacture of hydrogen bombs is of particular interest to me at the present time in view of the desirability for locating such project in Illinois, especially the extreme southern part of Illinois, more commonly known as Little Egypt.

The desirability of a Little Egypt location, first, is warranted because of geographical advantages. The area is conveniently situated with respect to rail and water transportation being served by several of the major railroad systems and located close to both the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The need for about 300 square miles of uninhabited land can be met readily without any appreciable displacement of residents. Much of this land is Government-owned which would simplify the acquisition process. It should be noted that during the war, one of the major ordnance plants was built and operated at Crab Orchard Lake and practically all of these buildings are now unoccupied and are immediately available. Another location which has been broached is Metropolis, located at the Ohio River in Massac County.

However, the most important reason for locating the plant in southern Illinois is the abundant supply of manpower. In the six county Crab Orchard labor market area [1] alone, there were 9,750 unemployed as of mid-July 1950 or 16.2 percent of the area labor force. The economic plight of these jobless is substantiated by various indicators such as unemployment, general assistance, old-age pensions and aid to dependent children. Month after month, the Crab Orchard area and the Cairo area [2] lead all other areas in the State in these fields of economic distress. Many of these workers are forced to uproot their families and travel to other areas in order to obtain employment. The shortage of employment opportunities has dulled much of the incentive among the workers of this area to be self-supporting and has forced many of these people to rely upon relief measures. The more ambitious and better talented adults frequently migrate elsewhere and thus deprive the area of much of its potential leadership material. Further, the low income is reflected in substandard purchasing power and this in turn adversely affects local trade.

In the light of the above, I urge you most strongly to give your most capable support to bring the hydrogen-bomb project to southern Illinois. If I can be of any assistance to you in advancing the effort, please call upon me.

Sincerely,

FRANK ANNUNZIO,
Director.

Relief of First, Second, and Third National Steamship Cos.

REMARKS

HON. BOYD TACKETT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, on August 31, when it became the time for Members of the House who wished to speak in support of the rule and on the justice of the bill S. 784, the time allotted to the supporters of the bill under House Resolution 818 was taken up on out-of-order discussions between Members on other subject matters, wholly foreign to this bill.

For this reason I wish to extend my following statement so that Members of the House may become familiar with the facts in this case.

One of the primary arguments advanced by those who oppose S. 784 is that the issues involved in the bill are res judicata by reasons of alleged actions by the Court of Claims in November 1935 and May 1946. In other words, it is argued that because the Court of Claims considered the merits of the case and reported basic facts in favor of the companies, but pronounced a res judicata status as an applicable theory and thereon ruled against the three companies—or Mr. H. O. Schundler, the real party in interest—such issues have been finally and legally disposed of and should not be reopened by the legislative branch of the Government.

[1] Consists of Franklin, Jackson, Johnson, Perry, Union, and Williamson Counties.

[2] Consists of Alexander and Pulaski Counties.

Res judicata is a highly technical legal defense inherited from the common law. The facts do not support this argument, furthermore, the Government of the United States should not employ or attempt to employ such a technical, legalistic shield when the facts demonstrate that the Government is in possession of $384,256.26 which the Fleet Corporation wholly owned by the Government, but now inherited by the Government, secured from the companies of Mr. Schundler and, in return for which sum, no consideration has passed from the Fleet Corporation or the Government to Mr. Schundler.

The res judicata argument has been discarded by the Department of Justice, the final authority in the executive branch of the Government on legal matters, following a meticulous review of all the facts. That argument has likewise been discarded by all other groups and individuals who have seriously studied the facts. The res judicata argument is still insisted upon by spokesmen for one agency of the executive branch, i. e., the recently discontinued United States Maritime Commission.

For 15 years the Maritime Commission has insisted that the Court of Claims' action in dismissing the early cases in November 1935 rendered the issues res judicata. It is unnecessary to recite the circumstances which led up to the Court's action in 1935 because it is clearly apparent, from even a casual glance at the record of the early cases, that the dismissal was not based upon a consideration of the merits of the cases. Those cases were dismissed at the voluntary request of Mr. Schundler, and took status of nonsuits.

The Maritime Commission's contention that the report and action of the Court of Claims in May 1946 rendered the issues res judicata is null and invalid, and it collapses when analysis of the limits of the court's jurisdiction is made and when the intent of Congress and its legislative prerogative is realized and affirmed.

The case decided May 6, 1946, titled "The First, Second, and Third National Steamship Cos. against The United States," identified by the Court of Claims as Congressional Case No. 17764, resulted from a Senate Resolution, No. 327, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session, passed November 19, 1940.

This resolution referred a bill for Mr. Schundler's relief, then pending, to the court with instructions to consider the bill in accordance with section 151 of the Judicial Code—now section 1492, title 28, United States Code—the section which then authorized the court to investigate and determine the facts concerning pending legislation at the request of either House of Congress—and requested the court to—

> Report specifically to the Senate—
> (1) Whether there were any sales of or valid contracts to sell the subject vessels to said companies, and whether the companies breached any contracts, and thereby damaged the United States Shipping Board to the extent of $384,256.26, or any part thereof; and
> (2) whether the payment to said companies on October 7, 1935, was a payment of all of the moneys due and owing said companies on account of the claims of said companies existing on December 31, 1925, notwithstanding any statute of limitations, laches, any release, settlement, accord and satisfaction, or prior adjudication.

The Senate obviously wanted the Court of Claims to investigate the claim fully and, after reviewing all the evidence, to determine whether in fact and in reality the Government had been damaged by Mr. Schundler, and whether in fact and in reality the Government still retained moneys belonging to Mr. Schundler. The court was specifically instructed to disregard the technical legal defenses of res judicata and accord and satisfaction. The court was not asked to enter a judgment, but only to aid the Senate by making two specific factual determinations.

However, the general jurisdictional statute under which the court then dealt and deals with congressional reference cases—section 151, Judicial Code—contains this proviso:

> Provided, however, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court upon the facts established, that under existing laws or the provisions of this chapter, the subject matter of the bill is such that it has jurisdiction to render judgment or decree thereon, it shall proceed to do so, giving to either party such further opportunity for hearing as in its judgment justice shall require, and it shall report its proceedings therein to the House of Congress by which the same was referred to said court.

In other words the court has authority to enter judgment in congressional reference cases, even though the resolution referring the case does not request the court to do so, provided the language of the proposed bill shows that the subject matter, or the issue which would be resolved by the proposed bill, falls within the general statutory jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. The pertinent part of the statute fixing the court's general jurisdiction (sec. 145, Judicial Code) reads as follows:

> The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters:
> All claims * * * founded upon * * * any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States.

Employing the two statutes quoted, and disregarding the absence of any desire on the part of the Senate to have a judgment entered, and further disregarding the clear intent of the Senate that Congress would make the final decision on the merits of the claim (without hiding behind technical defenses), the court decided that the subject matter of the proposed bill was within the court's general jurisdiction and attempted to enter a judgment against Mr. Schundler based on a complete disregard of the rebutted evidence adduced in the court, and in reality obviously based on res judicata and accord and satisfaction.

Thus the court, ignoring the intent of the Senate, and employing the technical defenses the Senate had specifically instructed it not to employ, took the matter out of the hands of Congress and attempted to take on jurisdiction.

However, this attempt of the court and its decision of 1946 did not and could not render Mr. Schundler's claim res judicata because the Court of Claims did not have jurisdiction to enter or attempt to enter a judgment.

The court's jurisdiction was limited to determining the two questions posed by the Senate. When the court went beyond that special jurisdiction, and attempted to take on jurisdiction not granted to it, its actions became void and of no effect.

In ruling and attempting to justify that the subject matter of the bill for Mr. Schundler's relief was within its general statutory jurisdiction, the court said:

> The subject matter of this suit is one over which this court has jurisdiction, damages being laid for breach of contract with the defendant, represented by the United States Shipping Board.

In other words, the court was endeavoring to bring the subject matter of the proposed bill within its general jurisdiction by saying that Mr. Schundler was seeking damages for the Fleet Corporation's having breached a contract.

Without pausing to belabor the fact that in the same opinion the court had firmly stated there were no contracts, that a contract "cannot be erected out of mere negotiations," it was clear from the wording of the proposed bill which the Senate had referred to the court that Mr. Schundler was not seeking damages for breach of contract. That bill, S. 4420, would have directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $384,256.26 with interest to the First, Second and Third National Steamship Cos. as a "refund" of the remainder of "certain sums deposited by or on behalf of those companies in the year 1920."

The bill did not propose to pay $384,256.26 as "damages" for breach of contract. "Refund" means "return a fund." The subject matter of the bill, therefore, was not damages for breach of contract, but the return of a fund wrongfully retained.

The Court of Claims had no authority to render judgment on the subject matter of the bill because that subject matter was not a breach of contract but a tort, specifically a conversion:

> Conversion is a tort, a wrongful act, which in the nature of things cannot spring from the exercise of a legal right. The law of conversion, it has been said, is concerned with possession, not title, conversion being an offense against possession of property. It may either be direct or constructive, and may be proved directly or by inference. The essence of conversion is not acquisition of property by the wrongdoer, but a wrongful deprivation of it to the owner, although a temporary deprivation will be sufficient; and in consequence it is of no importance what subsequent application was made of the converted property, or that defendant derived no benefit from his act. To constitute a conversion there must be either some repudiation of the owner's right, or some exercise of dominion over it inconsistent with such right, or some act done which has the effect of destroying or changing its character, or, as otherwise expressed, there must be a wrongful taking or a wrongful detention, or an illegal assumption of ownership, or an illegal user or misuser. (Corpus Juris, vol. 65, pp. 12 and 13.)

The Court of Claims has no jurisdiction over cases involving torts (see annotations at notes 162–167 following sec. 145, Judicial Code), hence the court had no jurisdiction to render or attempt to render a judgment in this case. Its jurisdiction was strictly limited to the questions posed in the reference resolution.

A judgment rendered by a court having no jurisdiction is a mere nullity, and will be so held and treated whenever and for whatever purpose it is sought to be used or relied on as a valid judgment. (Corpus Juris Secondum, vol. 49, p. 45.)

It is conceivable that the Maritime Commission might argue that the court had jurisdiction, and that the 1946 judgment is res judicata, on the ground that since the fund was held in trust, either express or constructive, a quasi-contract existed, and the existence of such a contract brought the subject matter of the bill within the court's general jurisdictional statute. But quasi-contracts are not implied from the facts in any given situation. Such contracts are implied by law for the purpose of preventing unjust enrichment. The implied contracts over which the Court of Claims has statutory jurisdiction has long been interpreted as not including contracts implied in law, but only contracts implied in fact. Hence the existence of a quasi-contract did not give the court jurisdiction.

Implied contract of which the Court of Claims takes jurisdiction must be one implied in fact, not merely implied by law (Corpus Juris Secondum, vol. 36, pp. 583 and 584).

There is yet another reason why the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction to go beyond the reference resolution and attempt to enter judgment in the 1946 case. In a long line of cases the Supreme Court and the Court of Claims itself have repeatedly held that the latter court has no jurisdiction where the Government claims title to property and denies the title or ownership of the individual seeking return of the property.

The Court of Claims has no jurisdiction to award damages for a mere consequence of lawful governmental action which does not constitute a contractual breach or a taking of private property for public use. Under this provision of the jurisdictional act the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of a claim for private property taken for public use, but, since no contract can be in fact implied therefrom, the court has no jurisdiction of a claim for private property taken for public use under a claim of right by the Government (Corpus Juris Secondum, vol. 36, p. 584; and see annotations at notes 139–140 following sec. 145, Judicial Code).

For these reasons then the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction to enter any 1946 judgment, its attempt to do so is a nullity, and the attempted judgment does not render Mr. Schundler's claim res judicata. First, the subject matter of the bill was not damages for breach of contract, therefore was not within the Court's general jurisdiction; second, the Court has no jurisdiction in cases where the Government asserts title to funds and denies claimant's title.

Neither the 1935 case nor the 1946 case warrants the Maritime Commission's assertion that the subject matter is res judicata. But, as stated above, even if the Court of Claims had jurisdiction, which it did not have, and had decided the case on the merits which it did not do, if it is shown that in actuality the Government now has a large sum of money, to wit $385,256.26, which it obtained from a citizen, without giving that citizen anything in return, it would not be in keeping with our antiauthoritarian form of political organization for that Government to cloak itself in the technical fiction of res judicata.

The undisputable fact remains that the Court replied to the questions it was asked by the Senate. Reference that it found as a fact from unrebutted evidence that the companies breached no contracts and that the companies did not damage the Government to the extent of $384,256.26 or any part thereof and these fact findings and the Court's report thereof were within the province of the Court and its prerogatives or jurisdiction did not go further.

S. 784 provides for the return of the aforesaid sum to the companies.

The Fifteenth Anniversary of the Rural Electrification Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Charles Baker, a very distinguished citizen of the State of Washington, at Walla Walla, Wash., on the occasion of the fifteenth anniversary of the Rural Electrification Administration.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Approximately 15 years have elapsed since the Rural Electrification program was created by Executive order and supplemented the following year by the Rural Electrification Act passed by the Congress of the United States. During these 15 years just passed, amazing progress—as you are all aware—has been made through the medium of this act in bringing electric service to the farms of America. Two billion one hundred and forty-one million dollars in loans have been approved by the REA to REA cooperatives throughout the United States. Almost 1,200,000 miles of lines, it is estimated, have been built, or are under construction, which will serve 3,600,000 farmer-customers. Of this number, 2,167,000 farms are served by REA cooperatives and presently 47 percent of all farms that enjoy electric service are supplied by REA cooperatives.

Probably no act of Congress has been of greater importance in enabling the farms of this country to keep pace with industrial development than the Rural Electrification Act. Electricity on the farms of America today is a must in this highly specialized and mechanical age. Power for irrigation, power for equipment, power for household uses, all are vitally essential to helping the American farmer keep pace in our industrial economy. And had it not been for our REA cooperatives and their rapid program of expansion, hundreds of thousands of farms would still be working in the dark and denied electric service. Not only would those farmers now served by REA's be without this service, but hundreds of thousands of other farmers presently served by private power utilities would doubtless, also, be without service—for you and I well remember the extreme difficulty farmers experienced prior to the REA Act in securing service from our so-called business-managed private utilities. It has been the threat of competition from the REA's that has brought the lines of the private utilities into many rural areas where previously they had refused service.

LEGAL INEQUITIES

I think it might be wise for a moment to review some of the obstacles through which we have had to go during the past 15 years in extending and developing the program. In the first place, restrictions were put into the law to make it impossible for REA cooperatives to serve any customer of a private utility. However, nothing was done to prevent private utilities from moving in once an REA cooperative was projected and taking the heart of the territory to be served and thus make it much more difficult for the REA to have an economical operation. Throughout the past 15 years constant pressure has been brought by the private utilities to harass and to place obstacles in the way of our REA cooperatives. Now, as we look to the future, there is every indication they are launching all-out warfare. I shall have more to say about this problem later, but now we are not so much concerned with the past as we are with the future—our plans and problems, and how best to succeed.

FOUR MAJOR PROBLEMS

It seems to me there are four major points on which our REA's could well concentrate, as we look ahead in the next 10 years.

1. Number one should be to seek to bring rural electric service to every farm in America, insofar as practical, by 1960. Certainly, if the sparsely settled rural areas are to be served, it must, and will, come only through our REA cooperatives. And, in this program of extending service to all farmers, it seems to me serious consideration should be given in planning this program to see that it is carried through in the most economical manner possible. For instance, here in the Pacific Northwest, too often we have seen an area organize and secure an REA allotment of funds, following which Bonneville Power Administration has gone to great expense to build transmission lines into the territory and to give substation service. Frequently, the over-all planning has not included all the farms in the area, which could be advantageously served by this substation, and later on other groups of farmers in the immediate area unable to secure service from the existing REA cooperatives have had to make application to Bonneville for another substation and another line to serve the area. This not only results in higher costs to Bonneville, but it also tends to raise distribution costs for all the farmers in such an area. Sound planning, as we look to the future, having in mind the maximum area that can be served advantageously from one substation, would seem to be basic if we are to obtain maximum benefits in low-cost distribution.

2. The second point which it seems could well receive major consideration, as we look ahead, based on our experience in the past, is that of building our lines with adequate capacity to take care of the great growth in use of electric power which has resulted in almost every instance when the REA has brought service to a rural community. Many REA's in a few short years have found their original construction utterly inadequate to carry the loan which has rapidly developed. Undoubtedly our experience in the past in this connection will result in much less difficulty in the years ahead as new lines are projected.

3. The third point which I think is quite important and one which should not be overlooked is to remove the legal obstacle which the private power utilities have established which prevents REA cooperatives from taking on farm customers now served by the private utilities. I know of no legitimate reason under the free competitive system of America why the private power utilities should have a legal fence built around their customers, thus giving them a complete monopoly, while REA cooperatives are forced to set out in the open and compete with the private utilities to protect their own members. It certainly is un-American and unfair competition and it ought to be removed at once. Let the private power utilities who spend so much of the rate payers' money crying about free enterprise operate on a street that runs both ways, instead of just their way.

Presently, you are serving customers at the rate of from one to not more than three to the mile, generally, on a highly competitive cost price with that of the so-called business-managed private power which serves great congested areas. Were the legal restriction just referred to removed so that you could take rural customers in the areas served by you and presently served by competition, you could greatly increase your load and reduce your unit cost of operation. Speaking from my own personal viewpoint, I have been served by the Pacific Power & Light Co. for many years on my farm. I use quantities of electric power for irrigation pumping. I pay an exorbitant price for this power. I could buy it much more cheaply, were it possible to get service from the REA cooperative in my area. But the law prevents this. I know there must be countless thousands of other farmers who are in the same predicament. Ladies and gentlemen, let's restore honest-to-God competition in the electric power field as it exists in other types of free private enterprise in this country. Let's remove the one-way streets which can only be traveled by the private utilities.

4. The fourth point, and in my opinion the most important, is speedy development to the maximum of the power resources of the Columbia and Snake Rivers. This is a program of great magnitude, and one of basic importance not only to every citizen living in this area but essential to the safety of our entire Nation. The building of great multiple-purpose dams on the Columbia and Snake Rivers embracing navigation, flood control, irrigation, and power development, is probably the greatest peacetime project, in the history of mankind. Its effect upon the economic development of this area, when completed, is staggering. It is estimated that some 30,000,000 kilowatts of the cheapest hydroelectric power in the world will be developed when all the dams projected for this great river system are completed. In terms of economic value, it has been estimated that every kilowatt of power adds $2,500 to the economic resources of an area. If this be true, then 30,000,000 kilowatts means $75,000,000,000 added to the economic resources of the Pacific Northwest and to the strength of this Nation. The great quantity of cheap hydroelectric power developed means new industries, many of them vital to our national defense. It means great increases in population, and this great growth in population means markets at home for a far greater percentage of the farm products that you and I grow on our farms, rather than having to ship them 2,000 and 3,000 miles to markets which in the last 4 years have been pushed some 1,500 miles farther away by a 63-percent increase in railroad freight rates. And, of particular importance to us, it means a long time and continuous source of low-cost electric power for the REA cooperatives, PUD's and municipalities in this area, providing we protect and preserve the present law under which the Bonneville Power Administration now functions.

FISH—POWER SABOTAGE

I am sure I don't need to tell you of the great obstacles that have been put in the way of this great river development program since its early inception some 15 years ago. The railroads, the fish interests, and the private power utilities—particularly the latter two—have left no stone unturned to sabotage the building of these dams. Even within the last 2 years a combination of the private power utilities and the fish interests have made a bitter—and so far successful—fight to prevent the appropriation of funds to start the building of Ice Harbor Dam. Ice Harbor Dam, as you know, is the first of a series of four dams on the Snake River between Pasco, Wash., and Lewiston, Idaho, which, when completed, will make a navigable waterway to Lewiston, and will add more than 1,000,000 kilowatts of power to the Northwest. We are still battling for funds to start the construction of this dam. It is a strategic dam from the standpoint of the over-all development on the Columbia and Snake Rivers. I know some of you perhaps think of it only in terms of local distribution in the area tributary to Ice Harbor. But, let me point out to you, most earnestly, that such is not the case. Ice Harbor power is just as vital to the Eugene area, or the Portland area, or any other section of the Northwest, as it is to the immediate territory surrounding the dam itself. If this power is not made available, then other power will have to be taken from McNary Dam to supplement local needs and make just that much less power available for Portland and the areas in southwestern Oregon.

The building of these dams on the Columbia and Snake River is a regional program—not a State program, and should be considered as such at all times. We should constantly think of it in terms of an over-all program of development of the Northwest that will give us -in the final analysis—flood control, full navigation benefits, complete reclamation development, and the maximum capacity of hydroelectric power. When completed, the power developed on these streams will be the single greatest resource in the Pacific Northwest--one which we will never deplete so long as the snows and rains fall in the headwaters of the mighty Columbia and Snake Rivers.

NATIONAL DEFENSE THREATENED

We need to push this program as rapidly and as aggressively as possible, not only for the economic welfare of the people of the region, but from the standpoint of national defense. Today we are living in a perilous age. Tomorrow all-out war may confront us. If it does we will find ourselves short—if the same demands are made upon the power resources of the Northwest as in World War II by more than 200,000 kilowatts of power. Not only should we make a continuous and concerted effort to bring about a rapid development of the multiple-purpose dams on the Columbia and Snake Rivers, but we also have a keen interest in seeing that this great program of development is coordinated—it seems to me—in order to get maximum efficiency. We should have a keen interest in seeing that transmission lines make available this power to industries and to REA cooperatives in all sections of our Northwest under the policy that has existed since the passage of the Bonneville Act.

PHOSPHATE FERTILIZER INDUSTRY

Here is one example of what the extension of Bonneville transmission lines, carrying low-cost power to the southeastern Idaho area, means to the farmers of the western half of the United States. In southeastern Idaho, in the Montpelier and Soda Springs area, lie phosphate rock deposits representing some 65 to 70 percent of the total phosphate rock available in America. Deposits in Tennessee are depleted and, as we look to the future, the phosphate rock to supply the phosphate fertilizer needs of America must come either from Florida or from south Idaho.

Commercial fertilizer has become an increasingly important item in our farmers' cost of production, during the past 10 years, and particularly here in the Pacific Northwest where consumption during this time has increased some 700 percent. Undoubtedly, a great expansion in the use of commercial fertilizer will continue in this territory. Because of high transportation costs we cannot afford to bring phosphate rock from the deposits of Florida to the Pacific Northwest when we have these great deposits in our own front yard.

As you probably know, there are two methods by which phosphate rock can be processed successfully to make phosphate fertilizer. One is by the use of sulphuric acid. The other, by the use of an electric furnace. Approximately 60 percent of the phosphate rock of south Idaho is of too low a quality to be successfully processed by the sulphuric acid method, but can be processed very successfully in an electric furnace. Furthermore, the cost of sulphuric acid in the Pocatello area is extremely high. By the time the sulphur is shipped in there, and converted into sulphuric acid, or if purchased from other sources, the total cost will approximate $18 to $24 per ton. Were Bonneville power made available to the area, at 2½ mills, it would be equivalent to $8 sulphuric acid. Not only would low cost power greatly reduce the cost of producing treble superphosphate for the farmers, but it would also be more practical because all of the phosphate rock mined could be utilized in an electric furnace, whereas by the sulphuric acid method at least 60 percent would have to be discarded. A number of our large farm cooperatives have already secured very valuable deposits of phosphate rock in the Soda Springs area of Idaho, running into millions of tons, and studies made for us by competent men indicate that if low cost power from the great dams on the Columbia and Snake Rivers can be brought to south Idaho, we can produce treble superphosphate for the farmers of the western half of the United States at a very substantial reduction in cost over any method presently used. This is a major program of development in the interest of our farm people as we look to the future—and strange as it may seem, one bitterly opposed by the Idaho Power Co., which is fighting to the maximum of its capacity to prevent the building of these dams and any extension of Bonneville transmission lines into the south Idaho area which they now serve.

BUS-BARS AND "SOCIALISM"

I don't need to remind you that the private power utilities are vitally opposed to present provisions of the Bonneville Act. They would like to change it so that they could buy the power at the bus-bar and then capitalize on it and force you and other customers to buy from them on their own terms.

One of the steps by which the private power utilities hope to pave the way for this objective is being pounded out now by their great propaganda machines financed by the money paid by the rate payers whom they serve. They are attempting through national magazine articles and advertising and radio programs to convince the people of America that REA cooperatives, PUD's, and municipalities are "socialistic"—that ownership of electric systems by the people themselves is "socialistic"—and that both public and private individuals who support these programs—are "Socialists." That is what the propaganda machines of the private power companies would have you believe.

Nothing could be farther from the truth. The truest types of democracy in America are our cooperative institutions which are merely legal instruments used by the farmers—if you please—and many other types of private business to get better service for themselves and to make more profit for themselves—certainly the two outstanding objectives in our capitalistic system.

TEN-YEAR OBJECTIVE

And, so, as we look ahead in the next 10 years—let's set up as our objective to bring to every farm in America, and particularly in the Pacific Northwest—electric service.

Let's plan our program so that the lines we build today will not be obsolete tomorrow due to inadequate capacity.

Let's plan to serve each area in the most practical and efficient manner.

Let's remove the legal obstacles which now give a one-way street to the power monopolies.

Let's get back to the true, competitive American basis again where we can serve any farmer if he so desires, adjacent to REA lines, regardless of whether he is presently being served by a private power utility.

And, finally, let's not forget that our future source of power for our REA cooperatives all over the Pacific Northwest in adequate quantities as well as our own economic interests lie in pushing aggressively for a rapid expansion of the great system of multiple-purpose dams on the Columbia and Snake Rivers in a coordinated manner, and the preservation of the basic principles of the Bonneville Act which means the building of transmission lines to all areas of the Northwest and maintaining for public agencies, including REA cooperatives, first call for the power needed by their customers. The fight ahead will be hard and bitter, I am sure, but we are equal to the task.

That Spanish Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Daily News of September 8, 1950:

THAT SPANISH LOAN

President Truman has indicated that he won't make the $62,500,000 loan to Spain which Congress authorized in the omnibus appropriation bill he just signed.

However, he left the door slightly ajar, suggesting that he may give the subject further study, as he should.

We need Spain's help if we mean to defend Europe against an armed Communist attack. Spain needs our help to become an effective ally. The question isn't one of religion, ideology, or personalities. It's a practical arrangement, dictated by a mutual desire for security and survival.

The Pyrenees make Spain the best protected beachhead in western Europe. This mountain chain, separating Spain from France, extends 240 miles from the Bay of Biscay to the Mediterranean. The only low passes are at its ends, where the main highways and railroads run between the two countries. Only five passes in the mountains themselves are practicable for unobstructed motorized traffic. A barrier as easily defended would be mighty welcome to our forces in Korea just now.

Spain also has the largest army in western Europe—an army which, properly equipped, could well defend its own boundaries. But it has almost no modern arms. And it needs money to build a modern road system, which could be vitally useful if Allied air bases are established in Spain for European defense.

The problem can't be shelved indefinitely. Providing new equipment for the Spanish Army and training troops to use it would take time. Paved roads and airfields suitable for heavy bombers can't be built in a day.

Our military leaders long have advocated including Spain in the North Atlantic security program. Their views have been suppressed by the State Department on the lame excuse that certain elements in Europe—meaning the left wing of the British Labor Party and the French Socialists—might not like it.

These same elements have been dragging their feet on the whole preparedness program, including their own countries' part. If they are to be permitted to override the views of our best-informed military men, we might as well withdraw to our own side of the Atlantic and stop wasting money on efforts to help people who won't help themselves.

Stockholm Peace Petition Failing Throughout the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, through the courtesy of Mr. Victor Lasky of the New York World-Telegram I have received an article from the New Palestine issue of September by Mr. Mark M. Krug, entitled "Reading the Israel Press." The headline is "The Stockholm peace petition in Israel." The news report is as follows:

The Israel Communist Party and the left-wing Mapam Labor Party have been busy for some time now collecting signatures for the so-called Stockholm peace petition, which asks for the outlawing of the use of the atomic bomb. As it is now well known, the attempt to obtain signatures on this petition is being made throughout the world on orders from the Cominform and the propaganda strategists of the Soviet Union.

But the Communist and the Mapam leaders are meeting with little success in Israel and have so far collected an insignificant number of signatures because of the united opposition of all other political parties and particularly of the Mapai, the powerful Socialist Labor Party. The whole question of whether the so-called peace petition should be signed or not has become a subject of bitter controversy in the Israel press. In this controversy, the official organs of the Communist Party and of Mapam are the only ones urging the citizens of Israel to sign the petition. The other newspapers have vigorously condemned this propaganda trick, aimed to serve the interests of the Soviet Union in the cold war. The North Korean aggression against South Korea has made even those who were undecided on the question of this petition declare themselves as unalterably opposed to a move which asks the prohibition of atomic weapons but does not condemn the use of conventional bombs and conventional arms in an act of open and unprovoked aggression.

MAPAI STAND

The executive committee of the Mapai has published a manifesto directed to the workers of Israel which said in part: "We state that the opposition to war and the desire to assure permanent peace in the world are common to all citizens of Israel. The tragedies that wars have brought on this generation and the terrible losses suffered by the Jewish people in the Second World War have strengthened the opposition against war in the hearts of the masses of the Jewish people and imbued them with a strong desire for peace. A permanent peace is a vital necessity to humanity, to the Jewish community wherever they may be, to the state of Israel, to the great task of the in-gathering of the exiles and the realization of the objectives of Zionism.

"Filled with this determination, the overwhelming majority of our people are supporting the policy of the Government of Israel, a policy of nonidentification with the two warring world blocs and a policy of constant efforts toward the assurance of the peace of the world.

"It is our conviction that a true concern for peace makes it necessary to maintain an attitude of respect for all sides and the omission of a propaganda of libel and smearing. It demands nonidentification with any of the warring sides and the condemnation of all those who endanger the peace and the avoidance of abject subjugation to one side in the controversy.

TOOL OF COMMUNISM

"It is our conviction that this policy is not the policy of the so-called Israel Congress for Peace. This outfit is not ready to fight against all dangers to peace regardless of the side they come from. The Israel Congress for Peace is one of the organizations and one of the tools of the world Communist movement. This congress has only wholesale condemnation for everything that the western democracies are doing and wholesale commendation for the eastern bloc.

"Because of this, we feel that the attempt to obtain signatures on the so-called Stockholm peace petition which is now being made does not serve the cause of the peace of the world and we are convinced that it merely serves the needs of world Communist propaganda."

Answering this statement, the Al Hamishmar, the official organ of the Mapam, wrote: "Let everyone who refuses to sign the petition know that if those who want peace in the world shall succeed in saving the world from danger of an atomic death, that he had no part in this great achievement. Let him also know that if the disaster comes that the responsibility for it will lie also on his shoulders."

Hatzofe, the organ of the Mizrachi, stated the following: "The white pigeon of peace, which symbolizes the so-called peace movement, is being exploited for aims which are neither pure nor naive, because through the celebrations, speeches, and the beautiful words which come from the speakers and through the well-sounding phrases which are to be found in the so-called Stockholm petition, one can clearly see the cold and realistic interest and the propaganda of the eastern bloc behind the iron curtain.

DOUBTS ITS VALUE

"If this peace movement would have been an honest one and even if it would not, as it does now, serve the best interests of the Soviet Union only, even then there would be reason to doubt the good that such a petition would do. In the lands of democracy elections decide the question of war or peace, but the rulers of dictatorships laugh at petitions and disregard them just as they disregard the will of the people.

The Hador, the official organ of the Mapai Party, declared in an editorial: "The leaders of the 'Israel Congress for Peace' are not ready to oppose all dangers to peace; they are not ready to oppose all steps that might bring war regardless of the side they come from. The Congress for Peace is not ready to do so because it is clearly a Communist tool which is conducting a propaganda campaign of libel and deprecation against the western democracies because it serves only the side of the Soviet Union in the cold war.

"Because of this the signing of the petition does not serve the cause of peace but only the needs of the Communist movement, and the workers of Israel are not ready to become the servants and the tools of Communist propaganda."

The refusal of the people of Israel and particularly of its labor to be taken in by the maneuver of the "peace petition" is a clear and decisive indication of where the sentiment of Israel lies in the present world situation.

Mr. Speaker, this is particularly interesting in view of the fact that Israel has established what it describes as a policy of nonidentification in the Korean war. In the face of that, it is obvious that the specious and false nature of this Communist peace petition is well-known to nearly everyone in Israel. It is particularly significant, as Mr. Krug reports, that the widespread rejection of this communistic maneuver provides a clear and decisive indication of where the sentiment of Israel lies in the present world situation.

While I regret that our House Committee on Foreign Affairs apparently is disinclined to even schedule a hearing on House Concurrent Resolution 247 which I filed on July 20, it has been most encouraging to me to have widespread support for this, or some similar, proposal and to have had the opportunity to observe the mounting indignation here in America and in the free countries when the true character of this petition and the motives of its supporters became more fully known. I am more than confident that the excellent counter proposal here in America, the crusade for freedom movement, is gaining much ground. I am certain that by October 24, scores of millions of Americans will have not only contributed to this program but will have gladly given their names as sponsors.

Fire Insurance—An Article From the American Bar Association Journal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARRATT O'HARA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in the American Bar Association Journal of April 1950, appears an article by W. Jefferson Davis, Esq., calling for a reform of the fire insurance business.

Mr. Davis is a distinguished member of the bar of California practicing in the city of Los Angeles. He is a member of the California Commission on Uniform State Laws and president of the American Academy of Public Affairs. He has long been active in the American Bar Association. I might add that in the campaign of 1912 which placed Woodrow Wilson in the Presidency, Mr. Davis, then in his dynamic youth, was prominent as the national president of the League of Democratic College Clubs, of which I was privileged to serve as vice president for the Middle Western States.

Because of Mr. Davis' standing in his profession and his activities as a student of State laws and the ways of bringing about advisable unification, as well as the fact that his article has the high prestige of appearing in the official magazine of the American Bar Association, I am inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that it may have the careful and thoughtful scrutiny of my colleagues.

The subject has seemed to me so important that I have introduced House Resolution 855 authorizing and directing a full and complete investigation of methods and practises obtaining in the fire-insurance business. It may be that the methods and practices Mr. Davis complains of can be defended. It may be that such legislation as may be needed should come from State legislative bodies. But certainly fire insurance does concern, in large or small degree, every person in our country, certainly in very large measure the home owners and the owners of industrial and commercial buildings as well. I think the select committee, for which House Resolution 855 provides, should undertake its inquiry with an open mind, should proceed constructively and make only such recommendations as sound business and financial judgment would dictate after a thorough study of the facts; but such an inquiry and study, conducted in the manner and the spirit I have indicated, would seem to me something that we should not seek to avoid. I would think it possible that the large fire-insurance companies, some at least, would welcome such inquiry and study.

Mr. Davis' article in the American Bar Association Journal of April 1950 follows:

WHAT IS YOUR FIRE INSURANCE POLICY WORTH—THE EVILS OF THE STANDARD INSURANCE FORM

(By W. Jefferson Davis)

How sound is your investment in fire insurance?

If you placed your fire-insurance policy under scrutiny would it stand the test?

Or would you discover, to your dismay, that your policy, in the event of fire, would not be honored for payment by the insurer?

The clamor in our legislative halls for remedial legislation to regulate the business of fire insurance underwriting, and the growing demands for a thoroughly amended standard fire-insurance policy form have focused the spotlight of public attention on a matter seriously affecting the average householder and businessmen.

There are leaders in every walk of life concerned with the present conduct of this enormous business and they unhesitatingly point to questionable practices in some quarters of the fire-insurance field and insist that new methods, procedures, and contractual bases must be speedily introduced if stricter governmental regulation is to be avoided.

In a word they say that the insurance colossus of America, one of the greatest accumulations of entrusted wealth extant, must clean house as it did a score of years ago, or possibly face another "Armstrong" inquiry similar to the one so ably led by the late Charles E. Hughes.

Property owners subscribe in good faith to fire-insurance protection, sometimes under high-pressure salesmanship overinsure their holdings, and seldom, if ever, realize how easily they might have been victimized through innocent violations of antiquated and inequitable provisions of the so-called standard policy. The policyholder would do well to devote one evening to study and analysis of his fire-insurance policy. He might be shocked at his findings.

A sense of security is felt by the average fire-insurance policyholder. He pays hard-earned money in good faith for a protection against loss by fire and assumes that the term "coverage" implies a fact. In his possession is an elaborately phrased document—customarily the so-called standard insurance form—upon which he places his confidence that his future security against loss is sound. Because he has paid a premium to a representative of one of the companies constituting America's great insurance colossus doing billions of dollars of business each year, he holds the belief that his policy means a dollar-for-dollar protection against loss for himself and his loved ones.

Out of habit the policyholder takes a casual glance at his pretentiously prepared document, notes that the entries on page 1 appear to be accurate, and without noting the complex and ambiguous qualifications beyond the typed entries that would challenge the interpretation of a Philadelphia lawyer, tucks the paper into his safe-deposit box.

He is fully covered against loss—he thinks!

POLICY IS WORTH ONLY WHAT COMPANY WILL PAY

Put yourself in his place, if you are a fire insurance policyholder. Do you know what your fire insurance policy is worth to you in event of a loss? You would learn through the unfortunate experience of a fire and the resultant efforts to adjust the loss and obtain payment from the insurance company that it is worth just exactly what the insurer decides to pay you despite the value underwritten and upon which you paid the full premium. The insurance company has an odd conception, if any, of the oft-used term "full coverage."

Your conception of the term is this: You own a $20,000 home. The place cost you $20,000 or more to build. You buy insurance in good faith, having confidence that the insurer will, in the event of a total loss through fire, reimburse you in the amount for which the property is insured. You bought $20,000 of insurance and expect $20,000 in the event of total destruction of your home by fire. You feel you are entitled to full value just as you expect scrupulous dealing and full value in other purchases for your home. Perhaps the thing that has given you greatest confidence in your policy is the large type on page 1 in which such and such insurance company, in consideration of the "stipulations herein named," and so many dollars premium, "Does insure (you)" against "All loss or damage by fire" except as hereinafter provided.

You gazed upon a beautiful mirage as you fondly tucked away the new policy in your safe deposit box. You missed the boat, as it were.

STUDY OF POLICY GIVES YOU SHOCK

If you had taken time to study your insurance document you would have been prepared for the shock that the average burned-out policyholder experiences when he seeks settlement of a loss. Then the full implication of the policy phrases "except as hereinafter provided" and "stipulations and considerations specially referred to" hit you between the eyes.

After the fire you consult your policy and the agent from whom you purchased supposed security. You prepare the proofs of loss, complete inventories and file with the company underwriting your loss the necessary papers. You contemplate payment of the principal sum of your policy, in the event of a complete loss, within a reasonable time. Perhaps in a discussion of fire insurance with business associates someone has mentioned that a negligible few fire losses ever are paid to the full value of policies, that the insurance companies scale down losses under a thousand and one devious procedures and claims, and that the average fire-loss sufferer settles a claim for less than the value of his policy to escape financial inconvenience or expensive litigation. You give little note to these observations until you join at the scene of your fire the company agent and the new character introduced on the scene at this juncture—the adjuster.

This noble exponent of equity is the shock absorber of the insurance octopus and emerges at the time of a loss from an octopus-owned, operated, and inspired adjustment bureau to conduct the three-ring circus that follows your filing of the proof of loss.

APPRAISER RESEMBLES SIMON LEGREE

This man knows all the answers the insurance company wants you to have in your dilemma. If you are skilled in your ability to estimate human values, you'll convince yourself in a hurry that he is a company man. He reflects many of the attributes of Simon Legree, Satan, the county coroner, and the oily politician. His professional airs are most overwhelming (he believes) and you are not overly impressed by his regal and austere approach to the subject.

He rakes through the ashes of what was once your home and castle. You believe your eyes when you observe what you have reason to know is a 100-percent incineration. To you there is nothing left of your home; there is nothing to salvage. "Complete destruction? And you expect payment of the face value of your policy?" He scowls as he makes the observation. "Perhaps we should admit some liability," he condescendingly admits. "I believe we can offer you a substantial sum for partial loss"; substantial to him means 10 percent. "Look! The stone foundation still stands." Like an automaton he can see in his mind's eye only the provisions of the section of the policy under stipulations and conditions entitled in the standard form, "Ascertainment of Amount of Loss."

You heretofore and subsequent to the fire complied with the duties of insured in case of fire. That is a big order in itself and requires the wisdom of Solomon and the ability of a well-trained lawyer.

YOU HAVE TO FIGHT TO OBTAIN WHAT IS DUE

Your faith in the integrity of insurance companies now is waning. You foresee a fight to obtain what you honestly believe is due you. All the unimpressive technicalities listed by the adjuster, the evasive and questionable exceptions he injects into the negotiations and the uncalled-for delays annoy you during the 30-day period, until out of a clear sky you are formally notified in writing by registered mail of the partial or total disagreement of the insurer with the amount of loss you claim. You are told of the company's recognition of the amount of loss, if any, the company admits on each of the different articles or properties set forth in the preliminary proofs or amendments thereto.

Of course the company offer, as is the custom, is negligible; just sufficient to open the doors for them to require you, under the terms of the contract, to submit to appraisement proceedings.

If, within 10 days you and the company fail to agree to the terms offered by the company (the negligible amount offered as settlement in full), after you are notified in writing, the company demands an appraisement of the loss or part of loss as to which there is disagreement. The company forthwith appoints a competent and disinterested appraiser. You have 5 days to do likewise. Then you notify the company in writing you have complied and name your appraiser. You will probably appoint some trusted friend. The policy says he must be competent and disinterested. You are sure he will be. You wish you could feel the same about the disinterest of the company man.

Further delays occur while you await the action of the company's appraiser and the person you have named. They must select a competent and disinterested umpire. You can be forgiven for seeing "red" at this juncture. You ask yourself "What is this all about? Didn't I pay out sound money for protection? Have I bought a leaky umbrella? Does this insurance octopus whose assets have increased one-hundredfold over the years have the temerity to insist my house wasn't worth $20,000, notwithstanding it accepted premium payments on a $20,000 valuation? Can it be that the company virtually obtained part of my premium payments under false pretenses by selling me $20,000 of protection when, in fact (as evidenced by the current impasse) it planned to pay but a part of the full coverage and disputes my claim that my house was worth $20,000? You question the ethics of that deal.

Your appraiser and the company appraiser review the matter, and if they fail to reach an agreement as to your loss, and that is most probable, for your man will not accept the low offer of the insurer, the umpire is called in to decide.

The payment to you, if any, is agreed upon by any two of the arbitrators. Guess who will make the decision? Your appraiser and the company appraiser? No. They have already disagreed. So the company appraiser and the kindly "umpire," a gentleman who frequently eats regularly only because of the largess of the insurance companies, get their heads together and give you the bad news.

SETTLEMENT IS LESS THAN FULL VALUE

You receive and must accept the judgment of the umpire and company appraiser. You won't get $20,000. That would set a bad precedent. You'll get but a fraction of the insurance amount of $20,000 which you understood you bought.

With millions of homes and other properties insured against fire, and with the customary latitude of over-insurance underwritten by hundreds of concerns, it is easy to understand how company assets have increased more than one hundred fold into the billions, and why victims of the iniquitous practice look to the Government for relief, all in vain, of course, because the subject of Federal regulation of insurance is unpopular despite the practices of fire-insurance companies that border on almost universal racket methods.

If you decline the judgment of the appraisers, within 90 days, you then may institute suit against the company. That means added cost to you. You already have been required to pay the fee of your own appraiser, and half the cost of the umpire's fee and expenses. Now you must have counsel if you proceed against the company. More expenses.

First you placed your problem in the hands of appraisers. The decision was not to your liking, so you proceed with litigation and its attendant costs. Trial of the issue may require long drawn out litigation.

Somewhere along the arduous course of negotiations you obtain enlightenment. Never before have you given such serious and profound thought to the importance of fire insurance and how it affects the welfare of your family. You bought your first policy as you would buy a pair of shoes. You got two shoes. Not one shoe for the price of two. You asked for $20,000 worth of protection against fire; the glib-tongued fire insurance salesman approved when you mentioned you valued the home at $20,000 and said you wanted full protection. You thought you were paying for full coverage. At that time it was not a mythical term to you.

You discover that the insurance codes in many States, perhaps your own, provide that before you make payment of the premium on fire insurance you may, if you choose, require an appraisal by a company agent and after it is agreed the writing of, say, a $20,000 policy is justified, you are given a valued policy, under which, in event of total loss, the insurer undertakes to recognize that a $20,000 insurable valuation existed at the time of the issuance of the policy, and the measure of damage in case of loss shall be the amount for which the property was insured. Now, in your dilemma, you wish you had known about the valued policy at the time you applied for insurance.

But despite the fact that the standard (Old New York) fire insurance form is employed in some 28 States of the Union, and in many if not all States, provision is made for issuance of the valued policy, comparatively few, if any, are written.

In California, residents who desired valued policies should benefit by a law of that State that provides for issuance of such policies and the recognition of full value by carriers in event of loss. An arbitrary ruling by the Pacific Coast Association of Fire Underwriters, however, prohibits operation of the beneficial (to the policyholder) statute.

AVERAGE POLICYHOLDER DOES NOT KNOW

Obviously the average fire insurance policyholder is not versed in fine points of law, especially the statutes and rulings governing underwriting of properties against loss. Being untrained and unskilled in attempted interpretation of stipulations, conditions, agreements, or exceptions contained in the standard fire insurance form, what a shock it must be to one if his attorney examines his policy and gives especial attention to, say, the unconditional and sole ownership clause.

In your eagerness to obtain protection against fire loss you give little consideration to what might seem to you a minor factor. Your agent asks if you own the property in fee simple. Of course you do. The policy is made out in your name. You have forgotten that the deed to the property names you and your beloved wife as joint tenants (or tenants in common). Of course you want your wife and family protected against loss, although you have had the policy issued in your name only.

Because you innocently failed to comply with this so-called moral hazard clause and unintentionally withheld the fact that you were, in fact, not the unconditional and sole owner—the insurance company would avoid your policy, holding that the policy was void not only as to the interest of the unnamed coowner (your wife), but also as to the interest of the person named in the policy—you.

Statistics and records reveal that many outstanding policies today are void and unenforceable because of innocent noncompliance with various moral hazard conditions couched in stiff legal phraseology.

FIRE-INSURANCE ABUSES ARE EXTENSIVE

Just how extensive is this abuse by fire underwriters in "living up to the letter of the word" in policies issued, and the inclination the insurance adjuster has to take advantage of trivial technicalities, oversights, and innocent mistakes on the part of agents of their own and policyholders, is reflected in a study made in a Midwestern State. Examination was made in a small community of outstanding fire-insurance policies. Of 581 insurance policies on real property examined, nearly 25 percent were found to be void, due to innocent violation of the "unconditional and sole ownership" clause. The probers reviewed 255 policies on jointly owned real property and found over 50 percent to be void.

If your property were in Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, or Minnesota, you probably would not face entire loss of protection, or even partial recovery, for in these States the so-called moral-hazard or unconditional-and-sole-ownership clause is omitted from fire-insurance policies. Allowance in those States is made for a wife's undisclosed and limited interest in property.

In Wisconsin and South Carolina the vicious and devastating clause does not apply to the co-ownership of property by husband and wife.

Why, you ask, can such a situation exist and entrap one who purchased a policy in good faith only to be penalized and deprived of protection through "technicalities"?

Many insurance executives and legal lights in highly organized and efficient legal departments make the feeble claim that undisclosed co-ownership of real property creates a moral hazard, describing the moral hazard as a risk resulting from the creation of a temptation for the owner of insured property to destroy it himself in order to realize upon his policy.

They contend that undisclosed coownership creates a hazard because the policyholder gains full protection of property in which he has but limited interest. They suggest he might be tempted to destroy the property in order to recover for a full loss and thereby make a profit.

Does it seem justifiable, critics of the system ask, for fire-insurance companies to issue such a large percentage of void policies to innocent persons in the hope of occasionally apprehending a law- and policy-violating incendiary aimed to enriching himself through a ruse? Are not the results too meager for the terrific price the companies assess against the public?

The law says that one who willfully burns his property cannot recover his insurance regardless of the provisions of his policy, should the facts be presented in the proper tribunals.

Little wonder, then, that from every quarter of the country there arise from time to time vehement demands for reform in the fire-insurance practices of supposedly responsible companies.

Over the years the inequities, stumbling blocks, and vicious exceptions of the standard insurance form have victimized innocent policyholders, and in many States where constructive changes have been offered in legislative halls the powerful insurance lobby has succeeded in defeating remedial legislation to the detriment of policyholders.

INSURANCE COMPANIES INSIST ON OLD FORMS

The insurance octopus prefers to hold the majority of the blue chips in dealing with the public; it insists on clinging to the provisions of the old New York policy form in some 28 States, the revised New York form in some 15 or 16 States, and the Massachusetts form in four Commonwealths.

The need for modification, clarification, and refinement of the standard insurance policy (contract), the elimination of its iniquitous provisions, and the adoption of more equitable, honest, forthright, and sound provisions in favor of the policyholder today is widely stressed by advocates of sound business ethics.

Many insist it is high time the board and other fire-insurance companies of America dispense with the so-called adjustment bureaus, the nonverified and "chiseling" appraisals growing out of compulsory arbitration conducted by company-controlled appraisals, and approach the matter of fire-loss adjustment in a business-like manner and afford the policyholder protection to which he is entitled.

Critics of fire-insurance procedures seem to be justified today when they turn the tables and call for the protection of the fire-insurance policyholder from so-called moral hazards created and practiced by some of the supposedly responsible major concerns in alleged illicit practices bordering on "racket."

In many instances policyholders who have experienced complete losses, or unsatisfactory adjustment of losses, today raise the cry that when they in good faith bought insurance protection the concern with which they dealt actually was guilty of obtaining money (premiums) under false pretenses. This view grows out of experiences following consummation of a contract which ostensibly offers protection * * *

Under State supervision, insurance companies in the past have thrived and strengthened their hold, influence, and control of American business and its financing. They have been slow to correct abuses and have allowed in their ranks the spread of a vicious practice bordering on racket. Their fabulously fattened coffers have given them increased power and influence to maintain standards of doing business that are universally conceded to be out of step with the public's appreciation of ethics and equity.

Perhaps there is relief in sight for the downtrodden policyholder. An encouraging light recently has been thrown on the whole disputed subject, not only by those intent upon having the standard forms modernized and causing enactment of new and broader laws regulating insurance in the several States, but by leading figures of the insurance business who from time to time have voiced the necessity of reforms in insurance forums, meetings of bar associations, and other bodies. They are men of wisdom and vision, and have seen the handwriting on the wall.

They are as keen to discourage any move toward Federal control of insurance as are the sound American policyholders who patronize their concerns in good faith and fear any step that would lead to federalization of the insurance business. * * *

In a word, they prefer to have private enterprise—the giant insurance business, one of the greatest concentrations of wealth in the world today—handle the trusteeship of their resources. * * *

Until relief is given the oppressed policyholder, it would behoove him to study carefully every word of present contracts offered him before accepting the supposed protection, and watch for the pitfalls maintained by a blinded and grasping industry that must clean its house and correct its ways, or face certain regulation in Washington.

Providence spare us such a move, yet it looms as a certainty if the insurance companies delay a purge of their business ways. A quarter of a century ago an aroused public caused reforms in insurance practices. Under the able leadership of the late Charles E. Hughes the so-called Armstrong investigation cleansed American insurance and brought about needed reforms.

Can it be that another such inquiry will be required to correct present-day evils of insurance?

Airline Officials on Air Mail Subsidy Separation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD for Monday, at page 15030, I attempted to outline the basic arguments in favor of enacting this bill into law promptly, and discussed briefly the reasons why the objections raised to it are not tenable.

I would now like to provide for my colleagues certain excerpts from reports, statements and letters by able executives of certain of our airlines pointing up the absolute necessity of separating the subsidy paid for carrying air mail. These statements are as follows:

STATEMENT BY AIRLINE EXECUTIVE

EASTERN AIR LINES, INC.

Eddie V. Rickenbacker in a letter to stockholders, April 4, 1949 (reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 7, 1949, at p. 4102):

"The foregoing tabulations (on comparative airline costs, etc.) indicate that frequently the efficient and economical carrier has not been recognized and rewarded in new route and mail pay proceedings, and that the taxpayers have suffered the burdens of underwriting the large subsidies redected in the above charted rate differentials.

"This is indeed a gloomy and discouraging picture. But there are some hopeful signs.

"The President is said to be making inquiry into airline economy; the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is instituting an investigation; the Postmaster General has expressed his desire to see better business principles applied to the transportation of air mail; the CAB lately has instituted investigations designed to develop essential information regarding airline efficiency and economy; measures have been introduced in the Congress calling for a clearly stated separation of compensation and subsidy in respect to air transportation of mail, and providing that as between two identical points a new competitor may not receive air mail pay at a higher rate than that received by the existing carrier.

"The chairman of the CAB in an address on March 23 * * * made this timely statement: 'I believe that the advantages of separating the subsidy outweigh the disadvantages and dangers. From the standpoint of a sound air transportation system these advantages would be to hold constantly before the carriers and the Board the dollar amount of the subsidy. This would provide a considerable incentive to the carriers to put themselves in a sound economic position and it would make it far easier for the Board to determine those areas where service being performed by the carriers was uneconomic.'"

Eddie V. Rickenbacker, president, in a statement before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, May 24, 1949 (Senate Airline Hearings pursuant to S Res. 50, p 1118):

"I believe the President's Air Policy Committee, the Congressional Aviation Policy Board, the Hoover Commission, and more recently a majority of the members of the Civil Aeronautics Board, have recognized the desirability of having a separation of subsidy from compensation. Senator JOHNSON, in S. 1431, and Congressman KENNEDY, in H. R. 2908, have introduced bills to bring about the desired objectives. I am not saying that these measures are perfect in their details, but they are steps in the right direction and they ought to be perfected and carried to enactment at the earliest possible date." (H. R. 9184 is a revised form of H R. 2908.)

Eddie V. Rickenbacker, president, in annual report for 1949, April 4, 1950:

"Some of Eastern Air Lines' competitors receive the equivalent of your company's tax payments from the Government in the form of mail subsidy. There apparently is no restriction placed on the use of this subsidy, and it enables such competitors to engage in wasteful competitive practices in an effort to divert your company's traffic.

"Without mail subsidy, underwritten by your company's tax payments and your personal tax payments, the competing carriers would and should be allowed to succeed or fail on their own merits or deficiencies.

"Your management is continuing to fight for correction of this discriminatory practice."

In the Senate Airline Hearings, page 1116, Rickenbacker also stated that he had urged separation in his appearance before the Finletter committee.

UNITED AIR LINES, INC.

W. A. Patterson, president, in a statement before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, May 9, 1949 (Senate airline hearings pursuant to S. Res. 50, p. 675):

"In principle I approve the separation of subsidy so that we all know exactly where we stand. With subsidy being identified directly as such, it would serve as an incentive for management to increase its efforts to reduce and eliminate subsidy."

W. A. Patterson, president, in annual report for 1949, March 15, 1950:

"There has been considerable discussion in recent months regarding the advisability of separating so-called subsidy and service payments for carrying air mail. Your company favors such separation, believing that subsidy payments should be plainly labeled as such."

NORTHWEST AIRLINES, INC.

Croll Hunter, president, in a statement before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, May 3, 1949 (Senate airline hearings pursuant to S. Res. 50, p. 599):

"Senator, I certainly believe that the separation of service pay and subsidy is advisable."

AMERICAN AIRLINES

C. R. Smith, president, in a statement before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, May 12, 1949 (Senate airline hearings pursuant to S. Res. 50, p. 764):

"The system of merging service mail rates with subsidy payments is confusing, discouraging, and unfair to those air carriers which seek to keep their operation on service rate basis, and free from subsidy. In addition, it is poor accounting, depriving you of accurate knowledge of how the money you provide is being spent and the purpose for which it is being expended.—

"These defects can and should be corrected; their correction can and should be prompt.

"Senator BREWSTER. You would favor, then, an attempt to divide the compensatory payment from the subsidy payment?

Mr. C. R. SMITH. I would be wholeheartedly in favor of that."

More About Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by Ludwell Denny and which appeared in the Washington Daily News of September 8, 1950:

There is still a chance of American aid to Spain, despite President Truman's rejection of the $62,500,000 loan provision in the general appropriations bill.

The outcome does not depend chiefly on the mood of the President and the State Department, as commonly supposed, but rather on the attitude of our British and French allies and on what kind of a bargain can be made with the Spanish dictator.

While both of these decisive factors are still negative, the Anglo-French opposition is somewhat less adamant than formerly, and in Madrid there are faint hints of cooperation. The reason for this softening on both sides, obviously, is the rising Soviet menace to Europe.

As far as Washington is concerned, ideological differences have ceased to be a major barrier. General Franco and his totalitarian system are no more popular here than before. But he is no longer a threat to American interests, as he was when he collaborated with Hitler and his fifth column tried to poison Latin America against us.

The administration here recognizes that our dominant need is trustworthy allies who can deliver. It has not choked on cooperating with other nondemocratic governments for mutual advantage against aggression.

Our military experts are overwhelmingly in favor of gaining Spain as an ally. They think defense of the Western World could be greatly strengthened by Spanish naval and air bases, by Spanish ground forces, and by the Pyrenees barrier in case of extreme need. Political pressures here tend to offset each other. The pro-Franco lobby has grown, while the anti-Franco lobby is less effective because of the critical defense situation. So there is no big obstacle to a changed American policy, provided foreign conditions are favorable.

Of course, no President is ever likely to sign a blank check for Franco such as Congress proposed. If he gets either economic or military aid, it will be under the same safeguards as other recipient nations.

Political obstacles still exist among our allies. The Socialists govern Britain and hold balance of power in France and Belgium. Their old feud with the Fascist dictator is still bitter.

Nevertheless, the British navy is very much interested in Spanish bases, and the French army consider Spain useful for defense of north Africa as well as western Europe. These military pressures are increasingly important in London and Paris.

Curiously enough, in view of all the big talk and wide assumptions, there is as yet no adequate evidence that Franco is willing to give us anything in return for economic or military aid. Would he trick both sides, as he did in the last war, to remain "neutral"? So far he has been very cagey and promised nothing.

Despite all these adverse factors in London, Paris, and Madrid, however, the trend is toward an eventual agreement of necessity.

Our Government Is Abandoning the Orderly Flood-Control Program in North Idaho To Increase Private Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, so much haste and so much pressure has been exerted in forcing through the Government departments and the Congress the approval and the appropriation for the construction of the Albeni Falls Dam project to store water in the Pend Oreille River, the Pend Oreille Lake, and the Clarks Fork River that the rights of the people of Idaho have been totally disregarded and, at the same time, we are abandoning the orderly flood-control program on the Clarks Fork River started with the construction of Hungry Horse Dam in Montana.

This program to build Albeni Falls Dam first and flood thousands of acres of productive land in north Idaho will at the same time, leave the Kootenai Valley with its beautiful city of Bonners Ferry and the diked districts of Boundary County at the mercy of the floods of the Kootenai River.

That the facts concerning this program may be placed before the Congress, there is inserted herewith a statement made by myself before the Senate Appropriations Committee when the deficiency bill containing this appropriation was under consideration.

My statement follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF IDAHO

SUPPORT OF BONNERS FERRY LEVEE PROJECT AND LIBBY DAM, UTAH

Chairman MCKELLAR. I see that Congressman WHITE has come into the room.

Will you proceed, Mr. WHITE, with the matter you wish to take up?

Representative WHITE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I come before you not to make a record, but to see if we can get some help affecting the great State of Idaho and its people in north Idaho on a mistaken policy of the Army engineers and a plan that will just ruin two productive valleys and be in reverse of the whole program of flood control.

I have here a map of Idaho put out by the Bonneville Power Administration showing the streams in north Idaho and the proposed flood-control development of the great Columbia River system.

A part of this river system, as you know, is the Snake River, branching from the Columbia at Pasco which makes the boundary line between Idaho and Oregon and Washington and crosses the State of Idaho and heads up in near the Yellowstone Park. The water of the Snake River is being used to irrigate much land in southern Idaho, but up in the northern part of the State we have two great arms of the Columbia River where the Government has started an orderly flood-control program of a series of flood-control dams by the construction of Hungry Horse Dam. The Hungry Horse Dam is now under construction and will deliver 285,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity. Further downstream on the Clark Fork River we have the Glagir View and the Paradise Dam site. By following this plan we have the program that will control floods on the entire Clark Fork River to the Washington State boundary at Newport, Wash.

North of the Clark Fork we have another valley, traversed by the Great Northern Railroad, on the Kootenai River where we have an approved dam site at Libby. The water of that river flows into the Columbia and will develop extra power at Grand Coulee and down at Bonneville, so that the committee will know the urgent need of building Libby Dam on the Kootenai River.

I want to read to you from a letter addressed to the Secretary of Interior from the Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget, dated February 1, 1950. It has to do with canceling the plan to raise the levees at Bonners Ferry and strengthening the dikes for the protection of the drainage districts in Boundary County.

We have some of the finest land there in Idaho, and I was surprised when they told me that the land contained in diked districts in the Kootenai Valley in Boundary County in Idaho produced 80 bushels of wheat to the acre; 60 bushels of wheat is tops in the rich valleys in North Dakota but that land is so rich out there in the Kootenai Valley they have produced as high as 80 bushels of wheat to an acre and some of it is the most productive land we have in the Northwest.

This land is protected from floods by dikes built by private enterprise as well as the beautiful city of Bonners Ferry, the county seat.

The Government and the Army engineers has had to go in when we had exceptional floods that broke the dikes and repair the dikes and the Government has helped refinance the people on the land. It has a big job and it is a continuing thing that needs protection.

OPINION OF BUDGET BUREAU ON PROJECTS

Here is what the Bureau of the Budget said in their release and why the construction of Libby Dam should be given first priority:

"Benefits to be realized through the raising of levees at Bonners Ferry would be of an interim nature since the protection would not be required after regulation of the stream by Libby Dam. There appears to be a lack of local interest in provision of additional levee protection at Bonners Ferry. Relative infrequency of flood stages sufficient to overtop existing levees appears to render an interim protection at this location inadvisable, at this time. In case construction of Libby Dam is not undertaken within a reasonable period of years, this project might be resubmitted for consideration."

As a result of that recommendation by the Bureau of the Budget the Senate took out $100,000 out of the last appropriation bill that had been put in the bill for the protection of Bonners Ferry and the Boundary County dikes, with the result that two of those dikes broke. If there had not been a very exceptionally cold spring, all the dikes would have gone out and we would have lost everything in the valley this year as a result of the plan to withhold appropriations pending the building of Libby Dam.

What is proposed in this bill? We propose to jump ahead of all of the flood-control projects and go down below Lake Pend Oreille and raise the level of the lake and flood out the lands around the lake and Clark Fork Valley lands, and that are in my home district—and leave the beautiful Kootenai Valley to the mercy of the floods of the Kootenai River.

All of that great wide valley there [indicating on the map] 8 or 10 miles wide and extending clear into Canada from Bonners Ferry is to be left out of the flood-control plan by the Army engineers who now propose to abandon the orderly flood-control program on the Clark Fork and Kootenai Rivers and to jump ahead of all the proposed dams and build the Albeni Falls Dam that will flood out the Clark Fork and Kootenai Valley and all the land around Pend Oreille Lake just for the power generation of which will be less than 1 percent of the power produced when the dams in being and under construction in the Northwest are finished.

The only excuse they raise here for building Albeni Falls first is that they will get more water over Grand Coulee and Bonneville Dams from the water stored in Lake Pend Oreille.

Now, as to the power situation? You have now 14,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually being produced by Bonneville and Grand Coulee.

When the dams that are now under construction in the Northwest are completed, Hungry Horse, McNary, Chief Joseph, and Detroit Dams, you will get another 14,000,000 kilowatt-hours before Albeni Falls will be in production.

The main reason that there is such a pressure for Albeni Falls is that the local power interests have their transmission lines built right to the dam site, and a transformer station nearby, and they are now buying Government power for 2½ mills a kilowatt-hour and distribute this power for industrial use for 1¼ cents per kilowatt-hour.

I am a customer operating a mine, and we are paying 1 cent and 2½ mills. It is easily to be seen that if Albeni Falls Dam is rushed to completion and produces 210,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year, and the local power company can get it all because we will not duplicate their transmission line, there will be $2,000,000 a year spread, or the difference between what they paid for the power and what they will use the power for.

So that is why we are working under a continuous pressure.

To put the Albeni Falls project through ahead of everything else, the Army engineers will abandon the Kootenai Valley and all of the lands that we spent so much money to protect.

It is proposed to flood out our country to produce less than 1 percent of the power that will be generated in the Northwest when the dams now building are constructed.

REQUESTED AMENDMENT FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

I am submitting an amendment to the bill, on page 20, line 24: "$2,900,000 for flood control."

The bill does not provide where. It just says for "flood control." So I am asking you gentleman to earmark that money for flood control and in a logical program and start the work on Libby Dam and protect Bonners Ferry and all that country and leave our country on the Clark Fork River for the orderly protection when they build the series of dams starting with the building of the Hungry Horse Dam.

Senator KNOWLAND. Where does that amendment go in again?

Representative WHITE. Page 20, line 24, after the words, "until expended" insert the following: "and shall be used for the construction of Libby Dam on the Kootenai River in the State of Montana."

That is where that money should go, and that is where it would put twice as much water over Bonneville and Grand Coulee to increase the power generation by those dams. All that Albeni Falls will produce would be 1 percent of the power that will be produced when the dams now being built are completed.

Senator THOMAS. If that amendment is not adopted, where will that money be spent?

ALBENI FALLS PROJECT, IDAHO

Representative WHITE. We are told it will be spent on Albeni Falls. They will neglect one valley in Idaho and ruin another.

As you can see, the balance of the land is mountainous country. The proposed plan would leave us without a nickel of protection.

I was chairman of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee when we handled Boulder Canyon project. Those States were ably represented. The upper basin States came in and the lower basin States came in. The upper basin States got a half million dollars set aside every year for Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

The money is set aside and it is used to build reclamation projects and dams in these four States. In the lower basin States of Arizona and Nevada, they get $300,000 each a year.

Senator HILL. Are both of these projects in the State of Idaho, Mr. WHITE?

Representative WHITE. One is in Montana. They are both approved. You can put the money in either one. They are both approved.

LIBBY AND BONNER PROJECTS AUTHORIZED

Senator HILL. Are both of them authorized by the flood control act?

Representative WHITE. Yes, they are authorized.

But here comes the Bureau of the Budget and tells you that if you build Libby Dam you would not have to build these dikes every year. The Senate dropped out $100,000 this year in response to the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget because they said that if you built Libby Dam, that project would protect Bonners Ferry and the Kootenai Valley permanently.

Then this $100,000, a part of the money that is being spent from time to time, would only be for an interim and won't be needed when the Libby Dam is built.

So the logical thing to do is build Libby and you will get twice as much stored water over the Coulee Dam and over the Bonneville Dam to increase power, if that is what you are after. You will get twice as much power as you would by building Albeni. Albeni will just disrupt the whole program because we are jumping ahead of the Glacier View and the Paradise Dam projects and the whole orderly program.

By building the Albeni Dam first we are jumping ahead and building a dam at the lower end of the lake to flood out all the country along these rivers and around the lake.

When I was a boy I saw the Northern Pacific Railroad tied up for 20 days by the floods in 1894. For 20 days all the railroad in the West was closed because of floods, and now it is proposed to abandon the orderly program of flood control, to go down Albeni Falls, because revenue for power is involved.

I want to file a letter from the county commissioners of Bonner County, Idaho, asking that we oppose the dam until they are taken care of.

Chairman MCKELLAR. That will be put into the record, without objection.

(The material referred to follows:)

COUNTY OF BONNER,
STATE OF IDAHO,
Sandpoint, Idaho, August 17, 1950.

Re proposed Albeni Falls Dam, Bonner County, Idaho.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
Congressman from Idaho,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: You will recall that a year or two ago the suggestion was made that the above-proposed dam be located across the boundary in the State of Washington and as a result thereof strong protest was filed because it was plain to see that the dam would inundate valuable property in that State.

We have recently been informed that the Army engineers are seriously considering the construction of this dam just inside the Idaho boundary and that as a result thereof a lake will be formed across our State to the Montana boundary, a lake which will forever deprive this country of approximately $1,000,000 of assessed valuation and which will ruin the economy of this region as we now know it because our seed-potato industry will be destroyed and our dairying industry reduced in size because of the loss of base properties now existing along the Clark Fork River.

While we of Bonner County and northern Idaho have no desire to stop progress it has been called to our attention by our legal adviser that in the case of the Boulder Canyon Project Act the Congress did considerable to do equity by the State of Nevada, and the State of Arizona as well. Inasmuch as the water to be impounded by the Albeni project as well as the power to be produced is eagerly awaited by potential customers within the State of Washington we feel it is timely that any legislation that is enacted by the Congress for the purpose of authorizing and expediting the construction of the Albeni Dam project should give us the same equitable protection that the Boulder Canyon Project Act has granted to the States of Arizona and Nevada. Turning for a moment to the situation of the Boulder Dam we find not only an annual lieu tax payment to both Arizona and Nevada but we also find that the city of Los Angeles is the second largest taxpayer in the State of Nevada because it owns the transmission lines going from Boulder Dam as well as much of the electrical and generating equipment. It is our understanding that the assessed valuation in Nevada of the city of Los Angeles property is in excess of $5,000,000. It is also our understanding that the city of Spokane and other empire basin communities are to be the beneficiaries of any power produced at Albeni Falls as well as the beneficiaries of any water that is impounded. While the circumstances may be such that it is impossible for the city of Spokane and other interstate areas to build and pay for similar installations within our State in connection with the Albeni Falls project yet it would be a simple matter for the Congress to weigh the power rate charged those communities in order to pay back to our community those sums which we would ordinarily receive in taxes if the venture were a private enterprise undertaking.

As we see the picture, this dam will be a liability to our county and to our State and the natural resources to be controlled and produced thereby would be used primarily for out-of-State purposes.

It has been called to our attention that in 1945 the Massachusetts Legislature provided a method whereby the equities are adjusted by the State treasurer between the taxing districts and the counties which are flooded as a result of the construction of Federal water-control projects, for the benefit of taxing districts and counties lying below. We think that such a practice represents the application of sound equitable principles but unfortunately action in this case by the Idaho Legislature of a similar nature would be fruitless. Therefore, our only protection and our only chance for justice must come through congressional legislation patterned after the Boulder Canyon Project Act.

Our attention has recently been called to the fact that the Congress recently amended the Boulder Canyon Project Act by providing for the payment of tuition to the Boulder City school district upon the children of the Federal employees in the community, the cost of which is reflected by a higher power rate charged the city of Los Angeles. We have been informed by persons who personally handled that subject before the Congress some 2 years ago that the city of Los Angeles was willing to pay said increased costs of some $60,000 per year without a quibble. We feel certain that the power consumers in the Spokane area and other Columbia Basin project communities would act the same toward our school district if we gave them the opportunity by and through the enactment of the necessary Federal legislation.

It has just been called to our attention that an interstate and an interbasin committee is now at work upon a preliminary draft of a proposed interstate water compact affecting the Columbia River and its tributaries. Since most of the plans that we have seen relative to the development of the Columbia River Basin call for the flooding of the fertile valleys of Montana and Idaho for the benefit of States and communities farther down the stream we feel that no such compact would be complete unless it would include the usual provisions for the division of water as between the States and also earmark power for future use for the States of Montana and Idaho as the Boulder Canyon Act does for the State of Nevada, and, furthermore, that no such compact would be complete unless it provided an equitable method for the creation and distribution of lieu tax payments to the school districts and counties which are to be flooded for the benefit of downstream areas.

If all parties concerned are unwilling to do equity of that character the dam should fall back upon private enterprise because in that way taxes will be paid in perpetuity upon reservoir sites as well as upon transmission lines and generating equipment.

Unless and until the Congress is willing to come to grips with the problems raised by our letter we request that you vigorously oppose any and all attempts to expedite the construction of the Albeni Falls project as a Federal undertaking.

We would appreciate it very much if you will meet with us either at Sandpoint or in Spokane on Saturday, September 23, at 1 p. m., for the purpose of discussing this subject with us. In the meantime, we repeat our request that no action be taken until Congress has done as much for northern Idaho as it has done for the State of Nevada.

Respectfully submitted.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS, BONNER COUNTY, IDAHO,
M. D. HART, Chairman.
GLENN REED, Commissioner.
CALVIN HUFF, Commissioner.

Representative WHITE. Our county of Bonner is going to lose the tax revenue on a million dollars' worth of property and they want some protection just as the other States receive, just as the upper-basin States and the lower-basin States on the Colorado River receive.

Gentlemen, do not rush into this thing. Do not let them come over on the Idaho side and make our people carry all the load, when we see the protection they are getting in all these other States.

COMPARISON OF STORAGE CAPACITY OF LIBBY DAM AND ALBENI FALLS DAM, UTAH

There is another program of putting in this Libby Dam that will protect everybody and save two valleys in Idaho instead of one. Here are the figures on Libby Dam:

There will be a storage of 4,250,000 acre-feet at Libby, while at Albeni Falls it would be only 1,000,000 acre-feet of storage.

If you switch this money to Libby, you get double storage and double production of power from the control water at Bonneville and Grand Coulee.

REQUESTED AMENDMENT, GENERAL PROVISIONS

If you will not do that, if you will not put in that amendment, I am submitting a second amendment, to insert the following on page 20, line 24:

"No part of the appropriations made in this chapter shall be expended on the Albeni Falls Dam project until the widening of the narrows in the Pend Oreille River at Priest River is made a part of the Albeni Falls Dam project and included in the construction plan and provisions are made to reimburse the State of Idaho for the loss of tax revenues for the land that will be damaged or overflowed by the construction of the Albeni Falls Dam project."

The Army engineers come to us with a program and tell us that they are going to control the flood levels of Lake Pend Oreille. We know that cannot be done under the present plan, we organized in Bonner County a drainage district or a drainage association a long time ago. We did not propose to lower the level of Lake Pend Oreille.

All we wanted was protection from those unusual floods that periodically overflowed all our good farming land. Our drainage association hired engineers. These engineers went down and looked the river over. Previously to their survey everybody was telling us, "Go down Albeni and blow out those rocks and you will have no more trouble."

TERRAIN AT ALBENI FALLS DAM

Our engineers went down and made a survey at Albeni Falls, and they came back and reported that the cause of the floods in the lake was not at Albeni Falls at all; that it would do us no good to blow out those rocks down at Albeni because of the barrier to the outflow of floodwaters was at the narrows 5 miles upstream into the stream at Priest River.

The floodwater chokes there and no matter how wide you open your gates down at Albeni, the water will be choked above there and the Army will be as helpless to control the level of Lake Pend Oreille in floodtime, as it would be if they opened all the gates down at Grand Coulee.

Senator HILL. Can you point out Lake Pend Oreille on the map?

Representative WHITE. It is right here [indicating]. The lake is much bigger. This is a kind of exaggerated map.

Lake Pend Oreille has a surface area of 40,000 acres.

Senator HILL. Where is your Albeni Dam?

Representative WHITE. It is right here on the Idaho line [indicating]. Right there you see where these big transmission lines and the transformer station are located. Power company now sends the power around the lake to these customers and these towns above.

So when this is built, they will be in a position to take all the power right at the busbar.

Senator HILL. The other dam, Libby Dam, to which you want the money to go, is in another part, is it not?

Representative WHITE. Yes. It is further north and will protect the land of the Kootenai from floods and will store and put twice as much water over these dams downstream. The records of the Army engineers will show you that if you build Libby Dam it will store twice as much water, put twice as much water over Bonneville and Grand Coulee than Albeni Falls. The only excuse for building Albeni is that it will store water in low-water season and regulate the flow of the river by letting it out.

But while you are doing that you will ruin all the good farm land around it.

Senator HILL. How many acres is that?

ACTION REQUESTED ON LIBBY DAM

Representative WHITE. I do not have the exact acreage, but I know it will back the water clear from the Washington line at Newport and clear across the State to the Montana line. We have only two valleys in the Idaho panhandle that are farm land.

Gentlemen, protect us. We ask you to switch this appropriation to Libby Dam. That will be carrying out the flood-control provision in this bill. Make the job stick.

Senator HILL. What if it is left like it is?

Representative WHITE. They will use it for Albeni and flood our valley and leave the Kootenai Valley at the mercy of the floods up there.

I want to get this across to the committee in all seriousness, because we had flood appropriations one after another over there in the Koontenai Valley. We have 13 dike districts and they are left at the mercy of that river. If you will earmark this money you will do a good job all around.

This plan will leave the Clark Fork Valley as it is and protect Bonners Ferry.

Chairman MCKELLAR. We will give it the best and most sympathetic consideration that we can.

We are very much obliged to you for appearing, sir.

Representative WHITE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Role of the Federal Government in Combating Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on The Role of the Federal Government in Combating Crime, delivered by Attorney General McGrath before the criminal-law section of the American Bar Association this morning.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROLE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN COMBATING CRIME

The Federal Government does not exercise general police powers in ordinary criminal matters. Basic criminal law enforcement is and should be performed at the local level in the States. The Federal Government has only such jurisdiction over criminal law enforcement as is given to it by the United States Constitution. We cannot avoid being acutely aware of this division of governmental responsibilities in dealing with crime. The Federal Government has exclusive criminal jurisdiction over such matters as violations of the postal regulations, protection of the United States currency, enforcement of revenue and tax statutes, and in general those which protect the operation of the Federal Government itself. By their very nature these laws must necessarily be enforced by the Federal Government. In addition to the strictly Federal matters, Congress is given by the Constitution the exclusive power to regulate commerce between the States; and it is in the exercise of this power that much of the Federal criminal legislation is based.

While both the State and the Federal Governments have primary responsibilities in combating crime, their fields of operation are separated by constitutional limitations and well-established concepts of States' rights. May I state at the outset that so long as I am the Attorney General it will not be the purpose of the Department of Justice, the chief Federal law enforcement agency, to usurp the functions of the State and local police or to conduct activities that extend beyond constitutional limitations, or the usages of our people. We must never lose sight of the fundamental principle that local responsibility, fully realized, makes for sound government and healthy law enforcement. That is the true meaning of States' rights and home rule. Conditions which breed contempt for law can only become worse if we allow ourselves to be lured away from sound principle by the temptation to pass off State and municipal responsibilities to the Federal Government. Nevertheless, adherence to this view will not detract from the common purpose of the Federal and local agencies in devising means for aiding each other, within the limits of law, nor of the Federal Government assisting and complementing local law enforcement agencies charged with primary responsibility.

It was with this idea in mind that in February of this year there was called the Attorney General's conference on organized crime. Attending that conference were representatives of the major law enforcement associations throughout the United States, such as the National Association of Attorneys General, American Municipal Association, the United States Conference of Mayors, the National Institute of Municipal Law Officers, as well as representatives of the United States Attorneys Association and other Federal agencies. This conference was called by me in an effort to find a way of greater cooperation among all law enforcement officials to the end that a more efficient and successful fight against organized crime might be conducted at municipal, State and Federal levels. The President of the United States appeared and gave his wholehearted support to the undertaking. At that conference, as well as from many of the representatives of the States and municipalities with whom I have talked, there was almost unanimous agreement that one of the most serious threats to efficient law enforcement and good government was the apparent increase in organized crime which had resulted from a flourishing of the most lucrative field of all criminal activities, that of organized gambling. While historically the fight against gambling had been a matter of State concern, yet it became apparent that State agencies were having considerable difficulty in combating this insidious evil; and that the Federal Government might well find means to assist the States in this fight without encroaching upon any of the powers of the State in this field. Because of the general agreement that the major problem was one of organized gambling, legislative committees were appointed and immediate study was directed toward formulating constitutional means of aiding the States in this fight. Following extensive study by the legislative committee of the crime conference, drafts of two proposed bills were submitted to Senator JOHNSON of Colorado who introduced them in the Senate. One of the bills, S. 3357, was designed to prohibit the transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce. The other bill, S. 3358, was intended to prohibit the transmission of gambling information by communication facilities through interstate channels. Both of these bills were the result of special resolutions enacted at the conference endorsing the idea of Federal legislation which would prohibit the transmission of gambling devices or information through communication facilities in interstate commerce. The committee on interstate and foreign commerce in the Senate reported the slot machine bill favorably 8 days after its introduction and 7 days thereafter the Senate passed it unanimously. It has now been amended and passed by the House of Representatives on August 28, and is awaiting Senate approval of the House amendments. Extensive hearings were held by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the other bill, S. 3358, and a modified form of the bill was reported out on May 26, 1950.

These bills are examples of the means by which the Federal Government may aid the State in its primary responsibility in combating crime. In the history of Federal-State relationships the use of the Federal power to support State policies has had a number of important precedents. For example, in the field of liquor-law enforcement, Congress enacted the Wilson Act (26 Stat. 313, now 27 U. S. C. 121), which provided that all fermented or intoxicating liquors transported in interstate commerce must be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of the State into which they were shipped upon arrival in that State. The Wilson Act was held valid in In re Rahrer (140 U. S. 545). The Wilson Act, therefore, permitted the State to take away from interstate-commerce shipments of liquor the privilege attaching to such shipments—that is, the right of the original purchaser after receipt to sell liquor while still in the original package, even though the State law prohibited such sale. Following the enactment of that legislation, Congress passed the Webb-Kenyon Act of 1913 (37 Stat. 699, now 27 U. S. C. 121), which statute prohibited shipment or transportation of liquor into any State where the receipt, possession, or sale of such liquor was prohibited by State statute. The Webb-Kenyon law was approved by the Supreme Court in Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway (242 U. S. 311). Still later the Reed Amendment of 1917 (39 Stat. 1069) enlarged the statute to include a criminal provision punishing any individual who "shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce." This supplemental amendment to the Webb-Kenyon Act was upheld in United States v. Hill (248 U. S. 420).

By these statutes Congress aided the States in controlling the distribution and sale of liquor: The interstate transportation of intoxicating liquor into a State where the law forbade the bringing in of intoxicating liquor was prohibited, while allowing for its continuous interstate transportation through the State (18 U. S. C. 1262); its transportation where it was to be used in violation of the law of the State was prohibited (27 U. S. C. 122); it was subjected to State laws regarding intoxicating liquor (27 U. S. C. 121). As the Court stated in the Clarks Distilling Co. case, supra:

"Congress * * * considered the nature and character of our dual system of government, State and Nation, and instead of absolutely prohibiting, yet so conformed its regulation as to produce cooperation between the local and national forces of government to the end of preserving the rights of all. * * *" (242 U. S. 311, 331).

Of course, ever since the decision of the Supreme Court in the lottery case of 1902 (Champion v. Ames (188 U. S. 321)) holding that Congress may prohibit the interstate carriage of lottery tickets, there has been no room for doubt of the authority of Congress to exclude from the channels of interstate commerce various forms of gambling paraphernalia, as well as other illegal activities and fruits of crime. What the Court said almost 50 years ago is equally appropriate today.

"We should hesitate long before adjudging that an evil of such appalling character, carried on through interstate commerce cannot be met and crushed by the only power competent to that end. We say 'competent to that end,' because Congress alone has the power to occupy, by legislation, the whole field of interstate commerce. What was said by this Court upon a former occasion may well be here repeated: 'The framers of the Constitution never intended that the legislative power of the Nation should find itself incapable of disposing of a subject matter specifically committed to its charge.'" In re Rahrer (140 U. S. 545, 562).

There are many additional statutes which employ the Federal Government's power over interstate commerce in an effort to eliminate from these channels other types of illegal activities as well as the fruits of crime where the criminal attempts to escape State enforcement officials by taking advantage of jurisdictional limitations. Examples of these other statutes are the Mann Act, National Motor Vehicle Theft Act, Fugitive Felon Act, Stolen Property Act, and others too numerous to mention.

Today the problem of combating crime is more complex and difficult than ever before, but it is not insurmountable. It will require constant vigilance of the law-enforcement officers and citizens alike, for that is the price of our liberation from the domination of all unlawful elements. The criminal today has become smart, at least in the sense of becoming organized, and utilizes every technical advantage available under our system of dual laws and divided jurisdictions and geographical limitations. By becoming organized the criminal elements have become wealthy and through the use of big money have become powerful. But that is all the more reason why there must be close and constant cooperation between the Federal law-enforcement officials and the State. In this fight the Federal Government can play an important role in assisting the States by depriving the criminal element of those advantages he seeks through the utilization of interstate commerce channels, upon which the State officials may not encroach under the Constitution. It is in this role, which the Federal Government may constitutionally assume, that the President of the United States and I have pledged the cooperation of the Federal law-enforcement agencies toward the end that we may present a united front with the State officials in the fight against this serious menace to good government. I have offered the facilities of the Department of Justice to the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate, and I have pledged to Senator ESTES KEFAUVER every possible cooperation that we may give him. To accomplish this cooperation I have instructed all United States attorneys (circular 4133, July 31, 1950) to cooperate in every possible way with the members of this committee and those assisting it in its investigation of organized crime.

Griffiss Air Force Base

OF
HON. L. GARY CLEMENTE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Speaker, I urge the immediate passage by this House of S. 3727, to authorize certain construction at Griffiss Air Force Base and the establishment there of the Air Force Electronic Development Center.

The overwhelming merit of this legislation is shown by the wide approval it has received. The plan to move the Watson Laboratories from Eatontown, N. J., and to establish an Air Force Electronic Development Center at Griffiss Air Force Base first received the unqualified endorsement of the Department of the Air Force and was approved by outstanding scientists. After introduction in the Senate on June 9, 1950, S. 3727, the bill to carry out the above plan, was referred to the Senate Committee on Armed Services. A subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services and then the full committee voted unanimously to report the bill favorably to the Senate. The Senate, after full debate, passed the bill on September 13, 1950. On September 18, 1950, the House Committee on Armed Services voted, by an overwhelming majority, to report the bill favorably to this House. The bill therefore comes to the floor with the impressive record of support that it deserves.

The Air Force has stated with every indication of total urgency that it was necessary to make this move to install these laboratories at Griffiss Air Force Base, where they will have unusually good facilities in order adequately to carry on the vital development, engineering work, and testing in the field of electronics which these laboratories perform.

The Department of the Air Force has, as recently as August 23, 1950, explicitly stated in a letter from the Honorable John A. McCone, Under Secretary of the Air Force, that the recent international crises give additional emphasis to accomplish the desired transfer at the earliest possible moment. The Air Force has stated that in view of the inevitable acceleration of the electronic program an even more urgent requirement exists now than heretofore. The transfer of Watson Laboratories to Griffiss Air Force Base with its air field, space for expansion, and permanent buildings capable of more efficient utilization will in the considered opinion of the Air Force enable that Department to accelerate many vital projects.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us involves a vital question of national defense and security, as well as one of economy and efficiency.

The main witness who appeared on September 18 before our Committee on Armed Services to represent the Department of Defense and the Air Force on this legislation was Maj. Gen. Gordon P. Saville, Deputy Chief of Staff for Development of the Air Force. I have never seen a more complete, cogent, and convincing explanation of the urgent necessity for this legislation than is contained in his statement before the committee. After giving very fully the history of this project, he enumerates the seven factors which the Air Force found to be essential for the permanent location of the Air Force Electronic Development Center, namely:

First. Permanent buildings for laboratories, storage, and test facilities.

Second. Adequate airdrome handling all types of aircraft under all weather conditions.

Third. Existing facilities to minimize cost of land and new construction.

Fourth. Space for expansion for both buildings and runways.

Fifth. Flying atmosphere where engineers associate intimately with flying problems, requirements, and people.

Sixth. Housing for personnel.

Seventh. Accessibility.

General Saville then proceeded to show item by item that Griffiss Air Force Base fully met all these standards and that the present location of the Watson Laboratories most emphatically did not. One of the points made by General Saville which most impressed me—and I may add that I believe it also impressed the distinguished chairman and other members of our committee—was that the present location of the Watson Laboratories in the congested New York air traffic area prohibits, by CAA regulations and proper regard for air safety, test flying under any but unlimited visibility conditions. He stated that the special routes and altitudes which must be flown during such tests endanger routine civilian and military air traffic, or must be continually interrupted at great expense and delay. As General Saville particularly pointed out, this congested New York air traffic area has the highest density of civilian air traffic in the world.

Some other startling facts were brought out by General Saville. Griffiss Air Force Base, with a value of $36,000,000, is a permanent installation with permanent type buildings, machine shops, and facilities, while all of the buildings and facilities at Watson Laboratories are of a temporary nature and would require replacement. Watson Laboratories could not be expanded in time of emergency except at exorbitant cost. Griffiss Air Force Base includes an adequate airdrome in a suitable geographic location and in a low-density air traffic area. Watson Laboratories has no airdrome, and even if one were provided it would not be suitably located from the standpoint of flight test efficiency and of hazard to civil air traffic. The Watson Laboratories' fire hazard is excessive in these temporary buildings and they house equipment which cost millions of dollars, the loss of which would have incalculable effect particularly in time of emergency. The proposed movement of the Watson Laboratories would take them out of an area where air traffic density, air collision hazard, and lack of provisions for commercial air safety prevent them from fully accomplishing their part of the Air Force mission of national defense and keep them from operating at high efficiency. This movement would put these laboratories in suitable, permanent buildings which are now available, at a construction cost savings of about $15,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. After the laboratories are located in their permanent quarters at Griffiss Air Force Base, there will be a saving each and every year of at least $1,000,000 due to reduced operating, overhead, and maintenance costs.

Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly endorse the statement made by General Saville before our committee on September 18, and I urge in the best interests of national defense the immediate adoption of S. 3727 by this House.

The complete statement of General Saville is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. GORDON P. SAVILLE, USAF, DEPUTY CHIEF OF STAFF, DEVELOPMENT HEADQUARTERS, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES, ON S. 3727 AND COMPANION BILL H. R. 8788, TO AUTHORIZE CERTAIN CONSTRUCTION AT GRIFFISS AIR FORCE BASE, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you very much for this opportunity to testify in behalf of the Department of Defense, before your committee in support of S. 3727 and companion bill H. R. 8788, a bill authorizing certain construction at Griffiss Air Force Base.

My name is Gordon P. Saville, major general, United States Air Force. At present, I am Deputy Chief of Staff for Development, at Air Force headquarters here in Washington. Although the matter you are considering today is not a new one to your committee, I should like to recapitulate briefly, in an attempt to show the growth and changes of our plans with regard to electronic development facilities. I believe that such a resumé will be helpful in your evaluation of the soundness of our plan to move the Watson Laboratories from Eatontown, N. J., to Rome, N. Y.

We in the Air Force strongly believe that, to discharge our heavy responsibilities to this Nation within budget and manpower ceilings, we must place our primary reliance on technical superiority of our weapons. With this object in mind, immediately after the last war, we took stock of our research and development facilities, and realized that we had inherited a veritable hodgepodge of laboratories and test establishments, most of them hurriedly constructed during the war, to meet critical and constantly shifting needs as the war situation changed. Our Air Matériel Command, charged with conducting technical research and development for the Air Force, was therefore directed to prepare a long-range facilities plan.

The establishment of an electronics development center grew out of this study. In the area of electronics, with which we are concerned today, we found that we had three major centers of research and development activity: Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Dayton, Ohio; Watson Laboratories in Eatontown, N. J.; and the Cambridge field station near Boston, Mass. In addition, there was the Florida field station of Watson Labs, primarily for engineering testing, and a portion of the proving ground at Eglin Field which was also devoted to electronic testing. With the exception of three laboratories at Wright Field, all of these activities were housed in temporary wartime structures, or leased warehouse-type buildings. It was possible, almost immediately, to consolidate all of the Florida test facilities at Eglin, thereby eliminating the Watson Labs Florida field station. Our plan also called for the consolidation of Watson Laboratories and Cambridge field station at a permanent installation, Griffiss Air Force Base at Rome, N Y. This base was originally constructed as an air depot at a cost of approximately $36,000,000, offered many fine permanent buildings as well as excellent concrete runways, but had become surplus to our needs. Many of the repair shops originally constructed for depot facilities lent themselves readily to laboratory work; others could be made suitable with a minimum of conversion.

At this point I should like to digress for a minute to discuss the nature of the work performed at these different laboratories, which will explain subsequent modification of our plans. The process of providing the operational groups and squadrons of the Air Force with new weapons systems starts with basic research in such fields as chemistry, physics, or biology, where new phenomena are discovered and explored which might have military application eventually. Those which look promising are given further study—this we call applied research. Basic and applied research in the general area of electronics are the responsibility of Cambridge, but much of the actual work is done in universities and industrial research laboratories. Cambridge is responsible for evaluating their results and funneling them into the military development machinery, as well as actually performing some of the work internally, particularly in highly classified areas. To date, the results are largely ideas—paper studies, not hardware. When it has become reasonably certain that a particular combination of new techniques has military application and will provide a better means of doing a specific military job, development starts. Components are fabricated in breadboard form—they do not yet look very much like the finished end product, but the essential operating characteristics are brought out and refined. Early development models undergo various tests, and finally some prototypes are constructed by hand which have substantially the outward appearance as to space and weight of the eventual production model. It is this area which, for electronic material, is the responsibility of Watson Laboratories. At Wright Field, some research and development intimately connected with aircraft and airborne equipment is conducted. Since all three of these establishments work for the Air Force, however, developing Air Force weapons and equipment, almost everything they do is quite closely related to aircraft and guided missiles. Even though the Watson Laboratories has been largely responsible for developing ground terminals of navigation and communications systems, the equipment they work on is only one part of an air-ground loop. To test the effectiveness of their equipment realistically, it must function as part of the complete system, requiring extensive use of flight-test facilities.

We began effecting our master plan with the move to Rome, N. Y., of the research laboratories at Cambridge field station. As soon as our plans were announced, we ran into strong opposition from many of the distinguished scientists who had worked with us during the war at the Radiation Laboratories and the Radio Research Laboratory of the Office of Scientific Research and Development. While these men all strongly supported the creation of a centralized, modern, and vigorous electronic development center by the Air Force, they urged that our basic and applied research be conducted separately, and pointed out the manifold advantages of leaving this activity in the Boston area, close to a great concentration of skilled personnel in this field. Please remember that the Air Force, until 1945, had depended on the Army Signal Corps for all of its technical work in this field. We had comparatively little staff experience in the management of such work. Accordingly, we asked a special committee of scientists, of our own employees, and of Air Force officers, presided over by the chairman of the Electronics Committee of the Research and Development Board, to investigate this question fully and to recommend the best course of action.

Dr. Stratton's committee recommended against the move of the Cambridge Laboratories. Their report was accepted and our plans were modified. Instead of one combined research and development establishment, they advocated two: A development center at Rome and a research center at Cambridge.

Watson Laboratories, at present devoted almost entirely to development, located in very poor buildings, at a distance of 44 miles from the nearest adequate military air base, we feel must be moved to Rome, where we have an existing installation surplus to our needs, with excellent buildings and runways. A small portion of the present Cambridge Laboratories, which is more closely related to initial development than to applied research, we feel should at some future date be consolidated with the development facility at Rome. Similarly, the laboratories at Wright-Patterson have certain electronic projects which will eventually be moved to Rome. It is as yet too early to make specific recommendations on the exact nature and extent of these moves—they must be carefully investigated from all angles and spread over a period of time to minimize delay and disruption of vitally important work, as well as hardship to employees. Our ultimate objective, however, is clear: To create a sound, vigorous group of laboratories, located so as to be able to provide the Air Force with the best possible new weapons and equipment economically and rapidly, making full use of our military and civilian resources. These are generalities. To make them valuable in the actual selection of sites for these laboratories, we enumerated seven essential characteristics our new development center should possess. We then measured all possible sites against these criteria. I should now like to review these with you briefly, and later submit to the committee secretary detailed factual supporting data which is too voluminous to warrant your attention at this time. I would like to point out, however, that the figures quoted therein fall into two categories:

(a) They are extracted from operating records and represent actual costs in recent months, or

(b) They are detailed estimates by professional people in their own specialty, bids made by potential contractors, and the like.

In all cases, the source and authority for the data is indicated.

I have also some maps of the Watson Laboratories area and the Rome area, showing the geographical relationships of the various facilities under consideration, as well as a map of commercial airways in both places. The booklet also contains photographs of typical buildings at Watson and at Rome.

Let me turn to a chart which shows the major factors influencing the choice of a suitable location:

1. Permanent buildings for laboratories, storage and test facilities.
2. Adequate airdrome handling all types of aircraft under all weather conditions.
3. Existing facilities to minimize cost of land and new construction.
4. Space for expansion for both buildings and runways.
5. Flying atmosphere where engineers associate intimately with flying problems, requirements, and people.
6. Housing for personnel.
7. Accessibility.

I would like to make a brief comparison of the two bases against the major factors mentioned above and shown on the chart.

1. Permanent buildings: Watson Laboratories has only temporary wood or cinderblock buildings with tar-paper roofs as against Griffiss Air Force Base which has permanent steel framework, brick and concrete buildings.

2. Adequate airdrome: Watson has no airdrome at or near the base as against Griffiss which has an airdrome adjacent to the buildings planned for laboratory use. The runways are hard-surfaced and will handle any of the types of aircraft in the test squadron.

3. Existing facilities: Watson has no permanent buildings while Griffiss has existing supporting facilities, such as a central heating plant, and permanent laboratory buildings available now.

4. Space for expansion: Watson has no suitable space for expansion whereas Griffiss has space for expansion of both buildings and runways.

5. Flying atmosphere: Watson has no airdrome and no aircraft assigned to the base while Griffiss has a fighter squadron, an electronic test squadron, and aircraft assigned to the base, operating regularly from good runways. Watson has few flying personnel while Griffiss has many pilots concerned with operational problems and needs.

6. Housing for personnel: Watson has no housing on the base for officers or airmen. The housing in surrounding communities is similar to that in other areas within commuting distance of New York or along the New Jersey coast. On the other hand, Griffiss has some houses and apartments for the families of officers, airmen, and civilian employees, and sufficient housing for bachelor officers and airmen. The adjacent city of Rome has two recently constructed apartment developments with vacant apartments.

7. Accessibility: Watson is not near a main line railroad and is 40 miles from a commercial airport. Griffiss is only several miles from the main line of the New York Central and has three commercial airlines operating from airports in Utica and Syracuse within 15 and 35 miles, respectively.

We then asked the question: To what extent does Watson Laboratories possess these essential characteristics? If it does not measure up to our minimum requirements, is it possible to provide them? How much would it cost?

We found that Watson Labs did not measure up to minimum requirements, and that certain essential facilities could not be provided at any cost. One of the principal missions of the laboratories, for example, is to develop the ground electronic equipment we must have for all-weather flight. This task simply cannot be accomplished without adequate flight-test facilities, as we have learned from the experience of the past several years. The present location of the Watson Laboratories in the congested New York air traffic area prohibits, by CAA regulations and proper regard for air safety, test flying under any but unlimited visibility conditions. The special courses and altitudes which must be flown during such tests endanger routine civilian and military air traffic, or must be continually interrupted at great expense and delay. This area has the highest density of civilian air traffic in the world. Nonetheless, detailed estimates were made on the cost of providing permanent laboratory, test, storage, and airdrome facilities at Watson Laboratories. These estimates come to about $18,000,000.

We then considered all of our other available bases and measured them against the seven major requirements. By a process of elimination, we determined that Griffiss met our needs more completely than any other base available for the purpose. It was built during the war years for a supply and maintenance depot. It was well equipped for the overhaul of conventional piston engine aircraft. But we have less and less need for such facilities in an age of jet and turbine engines, and less need for depots designed like the one at Griffiss. It was therefore decided in 1947 to discontinue repair and overhaul work there, but to retain Griffiss as a specialized storage depot. This made available many fine buildings and paved the way for our subsequent decision to use them for laboratories and development testing.

REASONS FOR CHOICE OF GRIFFISS

The final decision was made in February 1948 to move Watson Laboratories and associated electronic activities to Griffiss Air Force Base. That portion of the plan to move the 3171st Electronic Experimental Squadron from Middletown, Pa., to Griffiss Air Force Base has been completed. This squadron does the experimental and developmental flying required by Watson Laboratories.

The decision was based on the following:

(a) Griffiss Air Force Base with a value of $36,000,000 is only partially utilized (the value of Watson Laboratories is $1,860,000).

(b) Griffiss Air Force Base is a permanent installation with permanent type buildings, machine shops and facilities while all of the buildings and facilities at Watson Laboratories are of a temporary nature and would require replacement; Watson Laboratories could not be expanded in time of emergency except at exorbitant cost. The Watson Laboratories temporary buildings require excessive maintenance cost to prevent deterioration; the permissible floor loading of many of the floors is limited; fire hazard is excessive, and they house equipment which costs millions of dollars, the loss of which would have incalculable effect, particularly in time of emergency.

(c) Griffiss includes an adequate airdrome in a suitable geographical location, and in a low density air-traffic area. Watson Laboratories has no airdrome and even if one were provided it would not be suitably located from the standpoint of flight-test efficiency and of hazard to civil air traffic.

(d) Economy in general: The overhead personnel cost (for supply, administration, security, transportation, personnel, etc.) of two bases is inevitably decreased by the consolidation of activities at one base. Further, the maintenance and utilities costs after consolidation at Griffiss would be less than the total required by the two present bases. The savings after consolidation will amount to $1,000,000 per annum.

(e) Now let us compare the construction and/or modification costs, considering on the one hand the movement of Watson Laboratories to Griffiss Air Force Base, and on the other, the provision of permanent buildings and facilities for Watson in the Eatontown area. Doing the job in the Eatontown area would cost about $12,000,000. If we consolidate at Griffiss, the cost would be about $3,000,000. Subtracting one from the other we see that about $15,000,000 of the taxpayers' money would be saved by consolidation at Griffiss.

SUMMARY

In the foregoing, we have indulged in considerable detail. Actually, our objective can be stated quite simply. Here it is: "Buy a full dollar's worth of defense capability with each and every dollar entrusted to the Air Force by the American people." Let us summarize and see whether our plans for the movement of Watson Laboratories to Griffiss Air Force Base meet this objective:

(a) We remove Watson from an area where, in air-traffic density, air-collision hazard and provisions for commercial air safety prevent it from fully accomplishing its part of the Air Force mission of national defense and keep it from operating at high efficiency.

(b) We put it in suitable permanent quarters, at a construction-cost savings of about $15,000,000 of the taxpayers' money.

(c) After Watson is located in its permanent quarters at Griffiss, we save at least $1,000,000 of the taxpayers' money, each and every year thereafter.

These facts, then, should point out the advisability of this proposed consolidation, and the Air Force, representing the Department of Defense, urges the enactment of this legislation.

Nehru's Ideas for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Nehru's Ideas for Peace," published in the September 15, 1950, issue of United States News and World Report. I ask that this article be inserted in the RECORD at the request of Mr. Raymond Wilson, of the Friends Committee.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEHRU'S IDEAS FOR PEACE—AN INTERVIEW WITH THE PRIME MINISTER OF INDIA

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—What do the hundreds of millions of people in Asia see in the conflict that has put a United Nations army into combat against Communist aggression for the first time? To get the views of one of the outstanding political leaders in Asia, the editors of United States News and World Report arranged an interview with Prime Minister Nehru of India by overseas radio communication. The questions on these pages were submitted to Prime Minister Nehru through the Ambassador of India in Washington. The Ambassador has forwarded the following replies to us from the Prime Minister. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has been the Prime Minister of India since that country became independent of Great Britain after World War II. The Nehru government was among the first to extend diplomatic recognition to the Communist government in China—and it also was among the first to support the United Nations action denouncing Communist aggression in Korea. Early in the Korean fighting, Prime Minister Nehru proposed that Communist China be admitted to the United Nations as a way to end Russia's boycott and speed the peace in Korea. His proposal was rejected, but the Russians returned to the Security Council anyway.)

Question. Mr. Prime Minister, why do you believe mediation of the Korean dispute should be considered at this time?

Answer. Your question presumably refers to my approach to Marshal Stalin and Secretary of State Acheson. This was not an attempt at mediation, but an effort to bring the new China and the U. S. S. R. into the United Nations Security Council, so that the Korean problem could be considered in association with those major powers.

Even though my personal appeal did not succeed, I do not regret having made it. At any rate, it has made people think that something possibly can be done to stop the onward rush toward catastrophe.

Question. Many people in the United States feel military victory over North Korea should come first. What is your view, and why?

Answer. Military victory need not necessarily precede efforts for peace. Since prolongation of warfare will increase the threat to world peace through an extension of the area of conflict, efforts at a peaceful solution would be preferable before a greater feeling of bitterness and hatred has taken hold of the minds of people everywhere.

Question. Do you believe a formula for settlement of the dispute can be made without first determining responsibility for the underlying causes of the Korean war?

Answer. The underlying causes are well known and no practical purpose will be served by trying to determine responsibility at this stage. Whatever the past history, it is perfectly clear that North Korea launched a full-scale and well-planned invasion and this, in the context of the United Nations Charter, has already been described as an aggression by the Security Council.

A search for a formula of peace is, however, always desirable and although none has yet been devised, attempts to explore all avenues for a peaceful settlement should not be given up.

Question. Do you think that the United Nations report on the origin of the Korean war was adequate, or should it be supplemented by further investigation?

Answer. It would not be fruitful at this stage to consider the adequacy or otherwise of the report of the UN Commission on Korea. It is impossible at this stage to supplement the report by any further investigations owing to the existence of a state of war in Korea. Peace must first be established before any fruitful investigations can even be considered.

Question. Do you think mediation should be undertaken by governments as a separate effort, or should it be done directly by the United Nations machinery?

Answer. Any method for a peaceful settlement of the dispute should be considered acceptable. If mediation appears hopeful, it does not matter whether it is done within or without the Security Council, so long as it is done with the consent and cooperation of the United Nations and in conformity with the principles of the United Nations Charter.

Question. If mediation fails, do you think the Korean dispute will lead to world war III?

Answer. There is not doubt that if all efforts at a peaceful settlement end in failure, then the chances of an extension of the conflict with all its dangerous consequences will be greatly enhanced.

Question. What is the viewpoint in Asia toward communism? Is it regarded as wholly controlled by Moscow or are the national movements independent of control of Moscow?

Answer. The birth of communism in Asia is largely due to its alliance with nationalist movements fighting for independence from foreign domination.

The widespread hunger and poverty of the peoples of Asia to which centuries of colonial exploitation have contributed also makes communism look attractive by contrast.

Thus, communism is strong in places like Indochina, where foreign domination still exists, and weak in countries like India, which have already attained their independence and are now actively engaged in bettering the living conditions of their people.

The tendency of Asian nationalist movements to follow the leadership of the Communist Party is dependent on the degree to which their deep-rooted anticolonial impulse is ignored by the western powers. Communism throughout the world no doubt draws ideological inspiration from Marx and Engels, Lenin, and Stalin; there is no evidence of direct control of the Communist movement in India from Moscow. So far as the nationalist movements in Asia are concerned, they are genuine and indigenous.

Question. Would you say that communism in China is a national movement and that the Government of China is independent of Moscow control?

Answer. The Government of China is a national coalition with the Communist Party as a dominant partner. The coalition is composed of all sections of the nation, including some members of the Kuomintang pledged to work a common program of democratic advance.

Mao Tse-tung [head of the Chinese Communist Government] has openly declared that China at this stage is a new democratic state preparing itself for socialism. It has a mixed economy as its immediate objective and a coalition government as its present machinery.

The Chinese revolution appears to be following the law of its own development—influenced by others, but chiefly influenced by the conditions prevailing in China. In our view, the Government of China is entirely independent.

Question. How long ago did you take the position that Communist China should be admitted to the United Nations, and what were your reasons for doing so?

Answer. Ever since we [India] recognized the new People's Government of China, it was natural that the consequences of such recognition would follow. We recognized it for a variety of reasons, the main reason being the fact that a sound and stable government existed over the whole continent of China.

It was none of our business to like or dislike it. In recognizing countries, normally one does not go by likes or dislikes, but by the fact that they do represent stable governments. It, therefore, seemed to us not only illogical but exceedingly unreasonable not to accept the consequences of that recognition, which were that the new China should function in the United Nations.

The United Nations was never intended to be a group of nations thinking one way and excluding other nations. With new China and the U. S. S. R. and some other nations out, the United Nations would assume a new shape. It will cease to be what it was meant to be, and if this state of affairs were allowed to persist the outcome would probably be a world war.

Question. Why does India regard the settlement of the Korean dispute or the solution of the Communist China problem as vital to her interests?

Answer. We have historical and almost immemorial ties of culture and friendship with China. For us, situated as we are and where we are, the friendship of China is desirable and natural.

The importance of free and independent China is a most effective assurance of stability in Asia.

So long as a nation of 450,000,000 people remains outside a world organization, that organization cannot be regarded as fully representative.

As for Korea, India is vitally interested because the peace of Asia is involved.

Question. Does India view with alarm the Communist efforts to control Tibet? If so, why?

Answer. India has no political or territorial designs in Tibet but is interested in that country because of cultural and other associations that have grown up through geography and the intercourse naturally between neighbors. The Indian Government has suggested to the Chinese Government the desirability of settling the Tibetan question peacefully through negotiations.

AN END TO COLONIALISM

Question. What should be done by the western powers to assist non-Communist countries in Asia to combat communism?

Answer. The habit of thinking only in terms of military and economic power unfortunately persists in the west, and while it is not possible to ignore the force of arms or of money, there are strict limitations to what arms and money can do if they go against the prevailing mood of millions of people. There has been ample evidence of this in Asia.

The first thing, therefore, should be an attempt by the western powers toward a better understanding through the mind and heart of Asia. Tagore, our great poet, expressed this very vividly when he said: "You do not open a lock with a hammer, you open it with a key devised for the lock."

Certainly we cannot open the lock of men's hearts with hammers, bayonets, and bombs. The strongest urge in every country in Asia today is the anticolonial urge of which the positive side is nationalism. Remnants of colonialism must, therefore, be completely ended and the national movements receive support.

The other powerful urge in Asia is the social urge. Asia is poor and backward in many ways. It has not profited by the great wealth poured into the world since the industrial revolution. In fact, Asia has been exploited and has been a passive witness of that revolution. But now Asia is wide awake to these differences and feels her poverty and distress, and wants to remedy it and does not want to wait too long in the process.

Question. What is your attitude toward communism in India?

Answer. Theoretically, communism in India, as elsewhere, offers to solve the problems of poverty, inequality, and low living standards which cause discontent among the masses everywhere. The Communist Party in India is banned in two states, but in other parts of the country it is permitted freedom of expression so long as it adheres to peaceful methods. Like the United States, India has a democratic constitution which guarantees fundamental liberties to the citizens.

In practice, however, the Indian Communist Party has indulged in the technique of fraud and violence to disrupt established institutions. It has functioned as a terrorist group, and to that extent has been dealt with according to law.

In India, since 1947, communism has come into conflict with nationalism and progressively isolated itself from the masses it sought to convert.

Question. Do you agree with the view that the future status of Formosa should be settled by the United Nations?

Answer. In order that the United Nations may arrive at a decision which is acceptable to the parties concerned it is necessary that the People's Republic of China should occupy its rightful place in the Security Council and other organs of the United Nations. No decision relating to Formosa should be taken by the United Nations in the absence of new China.

Question. What are the essentials to a settlement of the dispute in Indochina?

Answer. The desire of the people of Indochina for their independence is legitimate and should be respected. It is not a military problem to be solved in terms of strategy, but a human one. No outside help should be given to bolster up the colonial regime in Indochina. The Nationalist movement, on the contrary, should be encouraged.

NEED FOR MUTUAL TRUST

Question. What are the principal factors necessary to a better understanding between Asiatic peoples and the people of the United States?

Answer. To come closer to each other there must first be trust of each other's motives. The United States has the opportunity to assist the nations of Asia to develop their resources and raise their living standards. Such assistance would be welcomed if made in the right spirit. It is also important that in all matters concerning Asia, decisions should be taken only after close consultation with the free countries of Asia.

Question. Is India in a position to send ground forces to assist United Nations forces in Korea?

Answer. Any military assistance is beyond India's capacity and would make little difference. India's defense forces have been organized essentially for home defense and not for service in distant theaters of war.

The best assistance India can render in this grave crisis is to help to limit the area of conflict, and in ending it.

Question. Can you give us your reasons why it was not desirable to go to Peking (capital of Communist China) at this time?

Answer. This question does not arise because no formal invitation has been received from the Peking Government.

Hon. Donald Jackson, of California, Speaks on the Korean Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, on September 9 our colleague, Mr. DONALD JACKSON, of California, delivered the keynote address at the King County Republican Convention in Seattle, Wash. The consensus of opinion of the approximately 2,000 people in attendance was that Mr. JACKSON'S speech was the finest, most timely, and masterful that it had been their privilege to hear. I take the liberty of inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an excellent document on the Korean situation and the present foreign policy as it affects the Far East. Mr. JACKSON'S speech follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great privilege and an honor to be invited to appear here in the great State of Washington, and to have the honor of addressing this convention. These are truly days of decision * * * days in which all of us are quite rightfully concerned with the momentous problems confronting our beloved country and its traditional institutions. It is also the period that will long be remembered as the era of "the skeleton in the closet," and the years in which the favorite colors in Washington, D. C., were

"whitewash white," and "Communist Red." History will record it as the period when a President of the United States was unable to tell a vast and menacing cloud of subversion and espionage from "a red herring" and that tragic era when a Secretary of State refused to "turn his back" on a convicted perjurer, whose lies were born in treason against his own land and his own people.

Yes, it has been a weird and fantastic period. It has seen men and women in positions of trust and responsibility hailed into court, charged with peddling America's top military secrets to foreign agents. It has witnessed a long procession of court favorites and Government workers charged, though seldom convicted, with such innocent little pastimes as the presentation of gift deep-freezers to friends in high places; the obtaining of special favors in the way of hard-to-get construction materials for race tracks when veterans and their dependents were unable to obtain a board-foot of lumber for the smallest of homes. It is the day of the "five-percenters" who had ready access to the great and near-great in his quest for immense Government contracts.

It has been the era when a pall of Kansas City politics crept eastward to envelop the dome of the greatest capital in the world. It has seen reprisals inflicted upon those who refused to "go along" with administration policies, and the smearing of those who had no patronage of which they could be deprived. The age of the "legislative blackjack" has dawned on Washington, D. C., and it is indeed a relief to be able to inhale fresh, clear air uncontaminated with the nauseous odors of political sewers.

We are reaping the whirlwind of blind stupidity which passeth all understanding. At Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, under the guise of winning the war we lent ourselves and the power of this great nation to the dismemberment of China and the enslavement of millions of human beings. As a bribe to bring the Soviet Union into a war in the Pacific that was almost finished in victory, we made one of the most unsavory deals ever consummated in human history. We sold Chiang Kai-shek down the river of rubles, from which no nation and no people once engulfed have ever escaped. We let the Lattimores, the Jaffes, the Hisses, and many another architect of disaster undo in the span of a few short years all that had been done in a hundred years to create a friendly, free, and democratic China. As a result of the construction job accomplished by these great "builders of a new order," war has flamed in Korea, China lies under the heel of the Red Fascist masters, and all of Asia lies open to the threat of new aggressions. If we had deliberately set forth to accomplish the downfall of China and the complete degradation of her millions, we could have devised no more certain course of action than the one foisted on us by the intellectual appeasers who had so much to do with foreign policy during and after World War II.

Some small measure of consistency is essential to the development and subsequent implementation of any foreign policy, but consistency, that rare jewel, must long since have taken refuge far removed from the intelligence that has dictated foreign policy in the United States for many years. On the one hand we berate dictatorships in general, and Franco's brand in particular. In the same instant we embrace Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia and try to wean this international kidnaper of thousands of Greek children into the freedom-loving camp. The administration excludes cheap labor from the American market, with the same stroke of a pen permitting the products of that labor to flood the domestic market place. While American fishermen seek to provide themselves and their families with a decent living, ship loads of Russian crab meat arrive at the dockside in New York.

Intent upon establishing a great and voracious bureaucracy in Washington, D. C., the administration proclaims its "paramount right" to the tidelands of the several States, and seeks to establish a precedent, which once defined and accepted can and will threaten every last remaining segment of State sovereignty, few as they are today. Already, the Federal Government holds clear title to more than 50 percent of the land in seven Western States. If any country in the world ever stood in need of land reform, this one does. By a process of gradual encroachment on the taxing authorities of cities, counties, and States, the Federal Government has closed channel after channel of legitimate taxation sources, upon which local subdivisions of government have long depended for revenue. As a result, the elected officials of the several subdivisions must now come to Washington, hat in hand, to beg for Federal largess with which to carry on the essential functions of home government.

Yes; ladies and gentlemen, the bite is on.

False promises based upon false premises have led us well along the rosy road to destruction. The opiate of the social state has done its work well. Only now is the great fury of a disillusioned and angry people commencing to make itself evident. The one bright spot in the whole black picture is the fact that a sharp weapon is at hand, ready to be wielded in defense of ideals and principles. That weapon is the Republican Party. It is a weapon forged in the fiery faith of millions of good Americans, who are not only completely loyal to their country, but determined to salvage what is left of our national heritage. Millions strong, the GOP in every State stands ready, anxious, and willing to join battle with those who contend that everything and everyone has a price, and that human cupidity is stronger than devotion to the general welfare of all and the human dignity of the individual.

These false premises we indignantly deny.

These premises we will destroy.

Expediency rules the roost in Washington today and the god of opportunism is the idol before which the present administration lays its burnt offerings.

The hour has arrived when we must put other hands on the wheel of the Ship of State, and start the financial bilge pumps working if the battered old vessel is ever to make port. The quarrels on the bridge of the great old ship have resulted in a course that zigzags from primeval chaos to destruction. There have been too many navigators with too many divergent ideas of seamanship to ever make port.

The ineptness and bungling of those charged with the development and implementation of foreign policy, together with those responsible for the national defense has brought us to the verge of total war, unprepared in both manpower and matériel. In spite of the bright flashing lights of international danger; in spite of testimony before committees of the Congress that to embark upon the Korea military action might well result in tragic consequences, the President on June 27, last, completely reversed his previously announced position and ordered sea and air cover for South Korea. Within a few days American ground forces were engaged in action. In spite of the fact that the Congress had voted more than $10,000,000 in military assistance to the Republic of South Korea, only $200 worth of combat wire had arrived in that country previous to the outbreak of hostilities on June 26. In spite of the fact that the Congress had appropriated ample funds for the national defense, arbitrary acts on the part of the Executive and the Secretary of Defense resulted in the impounding of more than a billion and a half dollars of this amount. While tragedy was stalking our national footsteps, the President of the United States was assuring the people of this country and the world that we were "nearer to peace" than we had been for many years. The Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson, was following a like line in telling the American people that our defenses were in order and that if an enemy attacks us at 4 a. m. we will be on the march by five. So decimated was the United States Marine Corps that no more than 5,200 combat troops were immediately available for action in spite of the fact that the wartime Marine Corps strength had been over 500,000 men. With a cavalier disregard for the public interest and with near criminal disregard for the evident handwriting upon the wall of our national destiny, the administration toyed with our essential preparations for security here at home and abroad. Important statements of military and naval officials in the field have been censored by the Executive. The Wedemeyer report, which clearly pointed out the dangers which lay ahead, was kept from the public knowledge for several years, and when released, did not include General Wedemeyer's comments and recommendations with respect to Korea.

Today, in a frantic effort to disentangle itself from the tragic maze, the administration has the temerity and the brashness to assign to the Republican Party responsibility for its own failures and mistakes. But to no avail. The record is too clear and too unmistakable to escape. In this connection I want to read to you from the committee hearings on the Korean-aid measure in order that all of you may properly understand the position taken by our military authorities at the time Korean economic aid was under consideration in the House of Representatives, statements which influenced many thinking Members of the Congress in their opposition to the administration program of economic assistance to South Korea, unless such assistance was adequately bolstered by military supplies in sufficient quantity to insure delivery and utilization of the capital goods and supplies.

Former Secretary of State George C. Marshall was asked in testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on February 20, 1948, whether the position of the United States in South Korea would be untenable if North Korea and Manchuria fell to the Communists.

"I think it would not be tenable," he replied.

"Would you say that without American help there is great danger of a collapse of the Chinese Government within the next few months or a year or so?", asked Representative JUDD, of Minnesota.

"I would say that deterioration is dangerously rapid now," was the reply. "Unless something is done to halt it, it can rapidly run away and bring about the fall of the Chinese Government."

The National Assembly of the Republic of Korea adopted a resolution on November 20, 1948, imploring the continued presence of United States troops until security forces of the new Republic should be fully capable of maintaining national security. The South Koreans recognized as the shadow of the bear something which the Democrat administration saw as the silver lining to a cloud.

On December 12, 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations called for the withdrawal of occupying forces from Korea "at the earliest practicable time." That declaration must have caused hearty laughter in the Kremlin, but to the starry-eyed idealists in our Department of State it was greeted with the reverence usually accorded Holy Writ.

With a great and audible sigh of relief the Department of the Army, on June 30, 1949, announced the withdrawal of the only force that stood between the Soviet and its goal of domination of the whole of Korea. Fifty thousand men departed the peninsula, and the ill-trained and ill-equipped South Koreans were left to their own devices, aided only by the presence of 500 American officers and men left behind as a "training mission." Scarcely were the American transports out of sight before a long series of border incidents commenced in the vicinity of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Maj. Gen. Charles E. Helmick, former military deputy to the governor of Korea, was asked by Representative CHIPERFIELD, of Illinois, during testimony on June 9, 1949, before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

"If we withdraw our troops out of South Korea, is there anything that would stop the Russians from taking over South Korea if they decided to do it?"

"If they decided to do so, they could take over South Korea without any great military difficulty, sir," replied General Helmick. "They are right there with large armies. Any troops that we have there would suffer another Bataan."

On June 21, 1949, the committee witnesses were Brig. Gen. E. M. Hamilton, Chief of the Policy Division, Directorate of Plans and Operations, United States Air Forces; Rear Adm. E. T. Wooldridge, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations; and Brig. Gen. T. S. Timberman, Chief of the Operation Groups, Plans and Operations Division, United States Army.

Representative JAMES P. RICHARDS, of South Carolina, asked General Timberman: "Is it your opinion, General, taking into consideration world conditions as they are * * * that it would not be wise to keep troops in Korea?"

"Yes, sir, it would not be wise," was the reply.

"I concur," said Admiral Wooldridge.

"I concur fully, and that has been the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff," said General Hamilton. "It has been unanimous. There have been no differences as far as I know."

But what do we find 11 months later on July 25, 1950, when Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson told a House Appropriations Subcommittee an entirely different story. Representative HARRY SHEPPARD, of California, inquired again into the decision to withdraw United States troops from South Korea. He asked: "That was a decision of top echelon and not at the moment a part of the military conclusion as such?"

"Correct, sir," replied Johnson.

Washington has every reason to believe that the Secretary referred to the White House and to the State Department as "top echelon."

On July 26, 1949, and I stress that date, ladies and gentlemen, because it was almost 1 year to the day before the invasion of South Korea, five Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, including your speaker today, joined in a minority report opposing a proposal to supply $150,000,000 in economic aid to Korea. I quote the minority report in full because I feel that it, perhaps more than any other statement or document, expresses the position of the Republican minority in the Congress with respect to the Korean problem as it existed at that time and in light of the hostilities which were to follow. The minority report, ladies and gentlemen, reads as follows:

"Bill H. R. 5330 is a measure designed to furnish $150,000,000 for aid to Korea. The aid is of an economic nature and is frankly intended to resist communization of that portion of Korea lying south of the thirty-eighth parallel of latitude. Proponents of the measure contend that our national interests in the Far East demand immediate assistance to this peninsula which projects southward from the land mass of Asia and which is presently divided in two parts at the thirty-eighth parallel, with the Communists in practical control of the northern half of the country, and with the new Republic of Korea dominant in the south.

"As desirable as are the aims of those who would furnish economic assistance in Korea at this time, there are factors which indicate that such a program is foredoomed to failure. Korea is hopelessly outflanked by the adjacent land mass of China, and the peninsula has no connecting link with any friendly continental power. Every ton of supplies contemplated to be furnished under the terms of this legislation must be transported vast distances, only to be put down in the midst of a complex and daily shifting Pacific picture, in which the rapid and undeterred spread of communism is the salient feature.

"Nor are there in Korea the considerations of our national security which 2 years ago brought the United States to the aid of Greece. The flanks and the frontiers of South Korea are open to attack at any time by the militantly hostile forces of Communist aggression. Recent disturbances in widely separated parts of South Korea must be interpreted as evidence of Communist infiltration and agitation. Political assassination, together with serious constitutional differences between the executive and legislative branches, indicate a situation of internal turmoil and dissension, which may be expected to increase under the prodding of nationalists and subversives.

"Every authority who has testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to the Korean situation has acknowledged the fact that there could be no effective defense against an armed aggression originating in the northern half of the country. Nor has any satisfactory evidence been produced to indicate that a determined political attack could be long withstood. Guerrilla activity in the vicinity of the thirty-eighth parallel during recent weeks presages to many the institution of a campaign of harassment and terror not unlike that which has proven so successful in the mountains of northern Greece.

"It was reported from Seoul, Korea, under date of July 6 last, that eight Soviet soldiers had been wounded by national army forces in the fighting on Ongjin Peninsula. The Office of Public Information stated that the Ministry of National Defense had 'confirmed the fact that Soviet troops are taking part in the battle in the Ongjin area.

" 'It is reliably reported,' continued the announcement, 'that Soviet troops, attached to the North Korea puppet government armies, are in positions of command, as well as acting as advisers.' "

If this is the case—and there is no reason to doubt the report of the South Korean Government—the Soviet has actually entered the conflict along the frontier. This development may well presage the launching of a full-scale military drive across the thirty-eighth parallel. Unless this Nation is prepared to meet force with comparable force, economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety or the integrity of South Korea. To the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the lending of economic assistance at this time will only enhance the prize to be taken by force of arms and internal intrigue.

"Our forces, with the exception of an advisory mission, have been withdrawn from South Korea at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation. With our forces on the scene of action, there might have been advanced substantial arguments in favor of economic assistance, but without the presence of an adequate force to protect delivery of, and guarantee practical utilization of, the great volume of matériel and supplies, it appears folly of the highest order to embark upon the program.

"While we are in full agreement that Korea is a logical showcase for the wares of democracy in the Orient, we are also certain that the Soviet Union appreciates this fact and will go to any lengths to defeat our efforts in that part of the world. The conditions and circumstances which have rendered the European recovery program a success in western Europe are almost totally lacking in the case of Korea. The successes of the western European nations have been rendered possible through a strong interlocking of national interests and economic destinies in a wide and defensible belt, extending from the Baltic on the north to the Mediterranean on the south. There are no gaps in the defense wall of western Europe. In the Orient, however, the conditions are exactly reversed. To expect Korea to withstand the aggressive political tactics of the Soviet in a surrounding climate of rampant communism would be to expect an isolated and powerless Luxemburg to repel the ideology and the tactics of a Hitlerized Europe.

"One can imagine and respect the Korean people without sacrificing reason and logic. Again we are confronted with the constantly recurring specter of piecemeal and stopgap legislation. Admittedly, this country has no policy with respect to the Orient; nor has any program been put forward which would tend to develop such a policy. We labor with the mountain of Asia and succeed only in bringing forth the molehill of economic aid for South Korea. Disregarding the raging tides which threaten to wash away the foundations of every constitutional government in Asia, we are asked to content ourselves with the construction of a dike of sand around the southern half of Korea.

"What Korea requires, what China requires, what the United States requires is a statement of policy with respect to our future conduct in the Pacific and on the land mass of the continent of Asia.

"Should this measure be passed and should the aid furnished to Korea prove to be in vain, we shall have suffered a greater loss in national prestige than the same disaster would occasion in western Europe. The proposed program is a double-bitted ax, and one which may well be turned against us in the future. Already, along the thirty-eighth parallel aggression is speaking with the too-familiar voices of howitzers and cannon. Our position is untenable and indefensible. The House should be aware of these facts."

Even Professor Lattimore, certainly no Republican, and equally certainly an unofficial "consultant" to the Department of State, described the proposal of the $150,000,000 in economic aid to South Korea, after the withdrawal of United States troops, as follows, in an article in the New York Compass, on July 17, 1949:

"The thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall, but not let it look as though we pushed it. Hence, the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000."

No, ladies and gentlemen, the Democrat administration, with its Truman, its Johnson, its Acheson, its Vaughan, its Pendergast antecedents, its clowns, court favorites, five-percenter friends, its reds, its pinkos, its wobbly intellectuals and out-of-work and out-of-place college professors, its crackpot economists and Communist fellow travelers, cannot successfully shift any of the blame for their too-obvious shortcomings onto the shoulders of the Republican Party. For many, many years, the GOP has raised the only effective voice to be heard in protest of the administration's policy or total lack of policy in the Far East. Today, after those warnings went unheeded and the protests unnoticed, and after millions upon millions of Asiatics promise fair to align themselves with our enemies and against the West, it would be out of character if the President and his architects of disaster did not run true to form in a big-lie effort to shift responsibility for a succession of errors that no sane individual or party would dare to acknowledge.

Korea is much more than what the President calls a police action. Korea is a hot war that will likely become much hotter before it ever starts to cool. Perhaps you and I will never see the end of this so-called police action in our day. Korea is a Democrat war * * * the third Democrat war within the short space of little more than one generation. It is a war for which this Nation was not prepared, and represented, for all practical purposes, another Pearl Harbor. Let us hope to heaven that it will not end as another Bataan.

Now that we have been launched into war 7,000 miles away from our shores, it becomes a personal charge upon each of us, and the Republican minority in the Congress has met the challenge by giving full cooperation to the war effort. We must each of us take up a few notches in our belts and put our shoulders to the wheel. But lest the infant war go through life under the stigma of bastardy, it's paternity should be placed on record. If we achieve eventual victory over the foreign counterparts of our domestic Alger Hisses, it will be because of the valor and ability of our fighting forces. It will certainly not be due to the foresight of our diplomacy or to our advance military planning.

The bitter fact remains that even to this moment we have no policy with respect to the Orient. The President's statements on Formosa are a mass of sheer gobbledegook, the utterance of which by a Third Secretary of Embassy in the field service would serve to confine the offender to the nearest mental institution. Certainly, the pronouncements to this time have left the vast majority of the American people in a state of confused bewilderment.

The attack on Formosa may be launched at any time. There is evidence of large barge and junk concentrations on the Chinese coast. The people of the United States have every right to know if we intend to resist an attack on this vital outpost of our national security with every resource at our command, or whether our alleged diplomacy is going to dictate abject surrender.

If we do not intend to forcibly resist an attack upon Formosa, the American people and our few remaining Chinese allies both have a right to know. In spite of evidence that the administration has some doubts about the matter, the fact remains that this is still a free and sovereign nation of 150,000,000 people.

We Republicans will continue to fight communism whenever and wherever it appears. We are no "Johnny-Come-Lately" in this battle. Since the treachery of the Soviet was disclosed following Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam we have nurtured no illusions as to the end goals of the Communists. While the President was berating the Committee on Un-American Activities for its prosecution of Alger Hiss, and terming the committee members "more un-American than the persons being investigated," the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress was meeting the challenge by drafting and passing the Mundt-Nixon Communist Control bill. While the President roared "witch-hunt," the Republicans in the Congress, aided by many a fair-minded and honest Democrat, were citing Eisler, Josephson, and others of like slimy ilk for contempt of Congress in refusing to disclose the nature of their subversive activities.

Only last week Members of the House of Representatives who had never supported the Committee on Un-American Activities, and who had never voted one red cent for the continuation of its activities, practically fell over each other to pass again the self-same Mundt-Nixon bill, which had died previously in the Senate.

Republicans were anti-Communist when it was considered anti-social in Washington to say anything derogatory about "Good Old Joe Stalin," to quote the President's own words. We Republicans have fought a continuous and bitter rear-guard action against the philosophy that saw only boyish pranks in the theft of top secret documents from the files of War, Navy, and State Department's documents, and only girlish enthusiasm in the transfer of such secrets to the agents of the Soviet Union.

There may well come a day when atom bombs will plunge down upon our own cities, spreading terrible death and monstrous destruction. At that time the tortured, the suffering, and the torn can lay their agonies to what can only be termed a disregard for the public safety that has approached the criminally negligent.

If these be harsh words, I make no apology for them. They are intended to be not only harsh, but shocking enough to bestir Americans to their obvious duty. It is past time that our people awoke to the unpleasant knowledge that they, together with the Poles, the Chinese, the Czechs, and a dozen other free peoples, have been sold down the river to a lust for power and more power. True, our people have been given large doses of the administration's prime panacea, "Dr. Truman's Security Lozenges," but the opiate of "everything for nothing" is commencing to wear off.

We have frittered away our national resources and our great substance in a never-ending procession of economic aid grants, when reason and logic both screamed for effective and ultra-modern prototypes of aircraft and tanks. In the face of world-wide aggression, we have attempted to stem the roaring tide of Red-Fascist aggression with garden seed and tons of manure.

This country needs new leadership today as it has never needed it before. It needs leadership in full accord at policy level, and leadership to whom the battle against communism is a holy crusade. We cannot expect that type of dynamic leadership from a party whose spokesmen have been apologists for enemy espionage agents, and who have made every effort to defeat prosecution of domestic spies.

In April 1777, Gen. Benedict Arnold deserted his post and fled from West Point to the British Fleet. He carried with him important and secret papers of state.

When Gen. George Washington, the Commander in Chief of the American Army, heard of his defection, he was grieved—almost as grieved as Dean Acheson must have been when informed of the Alger Hiss tragedy. But Washington, unlike Acheson, did turn his back on an old and trusted friend. Furthermore, he issued an order to the army that evening—an order which we might well adopt as our slogan for the coming campaign. General Washington said:

"Put none but Americans on guard tonight."

Let, us in this hour of turmoil, put none but those whose records are clear on guard today. The tragedy of Korea is likely to be but the first fruit from the Tree of a Lack of Knowledge. Inevitably, there will be other and more serious aggressions. The present administration has failed, but the high principle, the ability and the unquestioned loyalty of the Republican Party are all at the disposal of the country.

We Republicans must fight as we have never fought before—fight with the gloves off and with no holds barred. This is no hour for another campaign based in light, harmony and soft words. We must displace those who have failed—those who are corrupt—those who corrupt. We must raise standards of honesty and decency around which the disillusioned and the heartsick may rally with faith and enthusiasm.

There is no other course of action which we can in good conscience follow. To fail in our mission is to destroy forever the sacred fabric of the greatest way of life ever devised by human mind. To succeed is to win a great victory, not alone for the Republican Party, but for all honest men and women of good will everywhere.

The Menace of Organized Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject the Menace of Organized Crime, delivered by me before the criminal law section of the American Bar Association today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MENACE OF ORGANIZED CRIME

The first thing I shall say to you today is something I heard Joe Keenan, then an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, say in 1934 in Milwaukee:

"Crime—as one writer put it—is the great sewer of society."

Sewers are not pleasant, and—after 6 months of living it--I can assert with confidence that crime is no more palatable than sewers.

This is a problem that addresses itself primarily to the legal profession. Lawyers represent and counsel criminals. Lawyers suggest changes and improvements in our laws and judicial system. The lawyer understands the extent to which corrective measures can be taken within the limitations of the constitutional guaranties of basic freedom.

So, I am glad that a majority of our Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce—Senator HERBERT O'CONOR, of Maryland, Senator ALEXANDER P. WILEY, of Wisconsin, and myself—are lawyers; and lay members—Senator LESTER HUNT, of Wyoming, and Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY, of New Hampshire—have served as chief executive of their States. (As a matter of fact, I am the only non-ex-governor on the committee.)

Too long, I think, we have left the crime problem to policemen, prosecutors, prison wardens, and social workers. When I say "we" I refer to the general public as well as to the legal profession. At the same time, those of us in government and in the profession must not seek to escape our primary obligation in this matter by contending that it is the people alone who are responsible for proper law enforcement.

The public in general seems to fall naturally into several classifications so far as law enforcement is concerned:

1. Those who are indifferent.

2. Those who tend to glorify crime and criminals.

3. Those who are hostile to any governmental coercion in enforcement on the theory that personal freedom is restricted.

4. Those who hold to one cure-all for the problem: such as legislation of gambling.

5. Those who make it their active civic responsibility to suppress crime and/or cheer on others who lead in the fight.

You have asked to consider here the Menace of Organized Crime. That subject implies, first that criminal operations in America are organized; and, secondly, that these activities constitute a menace to our way of life. Unfortunately—to the point of great concern—both of these implications are too true.

Since the middle of May, pursuant to a resolution of the United States Senate, a committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has been probing into the subject of crime in the Nation. For 4 months now my colleagues and I, with the assistance of a capable, trained staff of investigators, have been lifting the lid on organized crime conditions in various parts of the country.

We have been trying to find out a good many things about crime. Is it organized on a local or national basis? Who are its leaders on whatever scale it exists? Is there a national crime syndicate, and if so, is it headed by a single overlord? What criminal activities ply across State lines and can Congress do anything about them? What effect are criminal operations having on the general public? And probably most important of all, to what extent is crime subverting and corrupting law-enforcement and Government officials?

Right here I would like to correct a misconception which has existed in the minds of some people about the committee's function. We are not a law-enforcement authority. We have not been organized to supplant, correct, or even to supplement the regular Federal law-enforcement authorities, all of which are doing an excellent job in their fields. Nor have we the authority or the personnel to supplement local-enforcement officers in the various States. Operating with a budget of $200,000 over a period of 10 months, at the end of which the committee expires, we have a total investigative staff considerably smaller than the number of men that regular law-enforcement authorities frequently put on one case. We would do a disservice to ourselves and to the country were we to attempt to ferret out all crime in 48 States.

Those who look to our committee to cure corruption and local crime, therefore, have misconceived our function. It is our task to ascertain the extent to which organized criminals, working across State lines and utilizing the channels of interstate commerce, have been able to thwart the existing agencies for the enforcement of law. We must concentrate our efforts on organized, interstate crime. Using their immense concentration of wealth and the legal advantages which they gain from operating in 49 different jurisdictions, gangsters have been able to thrive in violation of the law and to corrupt many officials who should prosecute them. Our committee will seek to learn the facts about such operations so that it can suggest curative legislation.

In 4 months of intensive investigation we have learned the answers to some of these questions. To some of them we have only partial answers. But this much we can say unequivocally: Crime is definitely on an organized basis in the United States. So widespread are organized criminal operations and the conditions under which they are permitted to continue that they threaten to make a shambles of law enforcement and to create such a universal disrespect for law that our entire system of government may be endangered.

Whether there exists one or more big-time criminal gangs operating on a country-wide basis it is too early in the investigation to say. We do know, however, that there is some sort of rapprochement between gangs operating in various sections, a sort of gentlemen's agreement among gangsters—if gangsters may be so termed—that one gang will not invade the territory or activities of another.

Occasionally the hoodlums call upon each other for cooperation in a venture; they sometimes pool their capital or manpower or influence for a joint venture. They have large resources at their command; they have been able to capitalize on a unique situation to control the gambling business of the country as a practical monopoly.

How big this industry of gambling may be nobody knows with certainty. But the lowest figure for the amount of money that changes hands each year through illegal gambling in the United States that has been given the committee by experts is $15,000,000,000—a billion or so more than the current year's appropriation for national defense. My personal opinion is that the actual figure far surpasses this estimate.

We have been asked why we have concentrated on gambling. To be sure there are other forms of organized criminal activity. The narcotics traffic continues, but not nearly on the scale of former days. The Treasury Department's Bureau of Narcotics has seen to that. Counterfeiters still make and pass bogus currency, but only at the greatest risk. The Secret Service has seen to that. White slavery has been reduced to a minimum through the vigilance of the FBI.

But when it comes to gambling there is no Federal law enforcement agency under whose jurisdiction its suppression, or even its control, might come. For gambling, as it is practiced far and wide in the United States today, is not a Federal offense. This is undoubtedly one of the principal reasons why it has been chosen by the present-day racketeers as their main activity.

Another reason for its popularity as a racket is that it involves no merchandise which has to be handled. There are only two commodities involved in gambling—money and information. It is easy to pass both of these when compared with the last big-money racket of these same gangs—the illicit liquor business.

For they are the same gangs that operated on such a high-handed, even murderous, basis in the "roaring twenties." There is still the Costello mob in New York, the Capone gang in Chicago, the Purple gang in Detroit: The names are the same, and—to the extent that their owners have survived inter- and intra-gang feuds and massacres—the faces are the same, too.

From information so far gathered, it would appear that there is hardly a community in the United States that is not stained with the brush of gambling, either on horse racing or the numbers game. The gangs have taken control of these two major gambling activities through monopolistic distribution of the racing wire service. Gambling on its present Nation-wide scale couldn't exist for 24 hours were it not for the racing wire service—which there is strong evidence to show the racketeers control.

We saw this in Florida when we investigated the activities of the S. & G. Syndicate, a betting combine of five individuals who reported to the Internal Revenue Bureau a total gross business of more than $26,500,000 for 1948. When a Chicago mobster, believed to be a "front" man for the revitalized Capone gang of that city, came to Miami early in 1949 and insisted on being taken into the combine, the refusal of S. & G. to make him a partner was promptly followed by a shutdown of their racing wire service, which, by the way, comes out of Chicago. Within 2 weeks this fellow was made a partner; his share of the 1949 "take" is estimated at somewhere near $100,000. And we know that S. & G. is not the only—or perhaps the largest—criminal combine in Florida.

When it comes to monopoly, the organized gangsters of the United States could give wild cards to some of the big corporations which have been the targets of antitrust action, and still win.

This tremendous betting business cannot proceed without an organization. The big shots don't come down to the street corners or the cigar stands to write the numbers or book the horse bets from the general public. That phase of the operation is carried on by the small fry number writers or the bookies.

There are probably several hundred thousand persons employed in these activities across the country. S. & G. Syndicate alone employed some 300 bookmakers in Miami Beach; they were not the only bookies operating at that resort, either. In the bigger cities, the number of writers and bookies runs into the thousands in each place.

In every State except Nevada, it is illegal to "make book" away from the track enclosure. In 27 States, bets are legal within the track limits, but even in those States betting away from the track is illegal. Nevertheless, gambling goes on everywhere.

It stands to reason, therefore, that gambling away from the track could continue only through the connivance or negligence of the law enforcement officers of the respective communities. When a law enforcement officer does not do his duty, it is for one of several reasons: Either he has been ordered not to do it; or he has been paid—bribed is the general term used under the circumstances—not to do it; or he feels the uselessness of it all.

Any orders to a law enforcement officer to look the other way while the law is being broken must come from his superiors; they in turn generally get their orders from those who are responsible for their appointments and the trail thus leads to political levels.

Without fear of contradiction, I say that corruption of law-enforcement officers is rampant in many American communities today on a scale that makes the corruption of prohibition days look like kindergarten play. I say further that in a number of communities where organized crime flourishes there are tight alliances between the racketeers and the politicians many of whom undoubtedly cut in for their "split" of the profits of these gambling operations.

That is one of the menacing aspects of this Nation-wide crime situation. Corruption is fast becoming part of our everyday pattern of life; a thing which 50 years ago was one of the most abhorrent elements in public affairs, today rolls off the public conscience like water off a duck's back. We tolerate it, smile at it—yes, we have almost even come to expect it of some of our police and Government officials.

Our committee is not naive enough to believe that gambling can be stopped. No amount of legislation was able to keep people from drinking liquor during prohibition days. Nor is any amount of legislation going to be able to keep people from gambling; in my opinion. So long as human nature is what it is, and so long as somewhere there exists the possibility of procuring an easy dollar, not through any work or effort, but merely by wagering on the fleetness of a horse or by a guess on the odds to be paid at a certain track on a certain race; just so long will some people find a way to gamble. And if it isn't on horse races or numbers, it will be on something else. But interstate organized gambling which systematically fleeces people and especially the poor people in many communities is a matter about which we must have great concern. This is particularly true when organized crime uses its great influence to corrupt public officials.

We must find some means of stopping this tide of corruption—and we must find it without delay. We must maintain honest, fearless and incorrupt law enforcement to make safe our democracy. Once these pillars of good government crumble, no man can say what oppression and evil may result.

The lawyers of the Nation have a great share of responsibility in this situation. Being a lawyer myself, I believe that every man is entitled to counsel when accused of a crime. But sadly enough, our investigations in some parts of the country show that lawyers in some instances have gone much further than providing representation to gambling defendants. Shocking as it may seem, we have found cases where lawyers were actually partners in gambling enterprises.

We have found other instances where the tie-in between certain attorneys and the organized gangs were so close that when small-fry associates of the gang were arrested in raids, lawyers retained by gang headquarters appeared on their behalf without having been called by the defendants—in many cases without ever having known the defendants.

Such close affiliations between organized criminals and lawyers can have only one result—to bring contempt and disrespect for the legal profession, which would hurt every practicing lawyer, regardless of his clientele.

There is another menacing aspect of this organized crime picture that I want to advance briefly. The profits from gambling are enormous. A single dice game at Miami Beach has shown as much as $600,000 profit in a 3- or 4-month season. The modern-day racketeers have taken a lesson from Al Capone's book; they don't want to go to jail for income-tax evasion so they hire accountants to keep their records and make out their income-tax returns.

Some of them pay a lot of money in taxes. We suspect, however, that since gambling is virtually an all-cash business, a good bit of the income still goes unreported. Certainly such money they may pay for protection—"ice," they call it in Miami—does not appear on their books for obvious reasons, either coming in or going out. One reason is that the recipient doesn't report it as income, either.

So they accumulate immense hoards of cash. Invariably the first thing a racketeer thinks of when he has made a lot of money is to make himself appear legitimate and find a business that will serve as a front. Consequently you will find racket money in innumerable apparently legitimate businesses and industries.

Hotels, women's clothing manufacture, real estate, oil wells, laundries—all these and countless other business ventures have been founded on capital that came from the big bookmaking and numbers operations of the racket leaders.

To these businesses, in many instances, the gangsters have brought from the underworld their peculiar methods of competition—intimidation, monopoly, and the threat of the strong arm. It seems that as much as he may want to "go legitimate," a racketeer will never compete honestly and fairly if he can cut sharp corners.

That's why a great deal of racket money can be found invested in scarce commodities, so that the gangsters can take advantage of black markets with quick and outlandish unconscionable profits which again, largely go unreported in their income-tax returns.

Established modern business takes pride in the quality of its merchandise. You can pretty generally trust the label on the merchandise you buy in a dependable store. But when you buy the product of a racketeer business—unknowingly, in most cases—you are unwittingly furthering the fortunes of a gangster or a group of gangsters who would not hesitate to skimp on quantity or quality any more than they would hesitate to take your money away from you with loaded dice.

Profiteering is demoralizing. Carried on as it has been and might be again by those organized gangsters, it could break and back of public morale in the days of dark shadow predicted for us in the not-distant future. The President has already indicated that he will institute price controls in our economy if the situation warrants; it is important that we prevent these gangsters from torpedoing our economic ship in its home waters.

As we said in our first interim report to the Senate on the results of the investigation in Florida, it is essential that the true nature of this evil of organized crime be recognized. We are not concerned with the question of whether gambling is morally good or bad. We are concerned, however, with the total effect on the people of this country when powerful groups of criminals are allowed to utilize the channels of interstate commerce to gain great power and a monopolistic control of illegal enterprises, which they now possess.

We are especially concerned with this because through this monopoly the gangs are corrupting and controlling local government and are constantly reaching higher and higher in their level of control.

We do not believe that the people of the United States want to be governed directly or indirectly by racketeers and gangsters any more than they want to be governed by a ruthless, cold-blooded dictator. By pointing out to the people what might happen, by directing their attention to the real menace of organized crime, we hope to break into their apparently sympathetic apathy and bring about the enactment of legislation that will make impossible the continued existence of this criminal empire in the United States.

To whatever extent you are willing and able, we ask the legal profession of these United States to assist our effort.

The American Bar Association and other bar associations can assist us by joining in our effort to work with the organized bar on certain studies. In this work we have been greatly aided by Mr. James Bennett, Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who has made many fine suggestions and given unsparingly of his time. Thus far the response from various bar associations has been good. We are anxious to have your help in analyzing both the substantive and procedural laws which should be changed or passed in order to meet the menace of organized interstate crime. In this connection we have sought and welcome the suggestions and studies which can be made by committees of the organized bar.

The committee also is seeking your advice in its efforts to ascertain the sociological causes and reasons for the existence of large-scale organized crime in this country. In this work, too, we have had a fine initial response from the bar, but here also we will welcome every assistance members of this association and local bar associations can give us in studying the factors which have led to the growth of organized crime. In the future organized crime may be minimized if its causes are understood.

Finally we need and welcome the assistance of every member of the bar in the continuing personal and individual fight which every citizen must wage against crime. Lawyers in particular are equipped to lead the battle to defeat racketeers and gangsters. Public acquiescence and apathy are the gangster's greatest asset. Such apathy must not carry into the legal profession itself. The very presence of you gentlemen here and your interest in these proceedings is an assurance to me that you intend to carry on the fight.

Our Domestic Sugar Producer in the World Setting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, Mr. Lawrence Myers, of the Commodity Credit Corporation, delivered an address to the Western Beet Growers Association at its meeting at Brookston, Minn., on September 6, dealing with the difficult and complex problem of world sugar supplies and the relation of the Sugar Act to that problem. The speech details in a very factual manner the splendid stabilization results which have proceeded from the Sugar Act and from the administration of that act under the Secretary of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed at length in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR DOMESTIC SUGAR PRODUCER IN THE WORLD SETTING

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is a real pleasure to get back to my home State of Minnesota and to participate in this annual meeting of the Western Beet Growers Association. It is also a pleasure to get back to Crookston and see the developments that have taken place in the 24 years since I was here last. However, I shall not take time to tell you about the good hunting and fishing of those days.

The world sugar situation has been changing so violently over the past few weeks that it reminds one of the joker's reference to the weather: "If you don't like it, just wait a few minutes."

When I agreed to talk on the subject of our domestic sugar producer in the world setting, I expected to discuss the normal situation in which there is a world sugar surplus with depressed world sugar prices. I intended then to tell how the Sugar Act cushions domestic producers against effects of such world conditions. That was a few weeks ago. Now we are confronted with a world sugar shortage and for the time being Cuban producers can obtain more for their sugar by selling it in the world market than they can by selling it to the United States. The Sugar Branch, while in the midst of winding up liquidations on what was to have been our final sugar-purchase program, has again purchased a large quantity from Cuba to protect this country's requirements and to prevent inflationary prices.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the chronic world sugar surpluses and the temporary shortages, such as we are now experiencing, come largely from the same fundamental causes. The world sugar surplus problem that is normally with us arises primarily from the fact that consumers in many parts of the world are unable to pay the prices charged in their countries for sugar. Consumers in the United States utilize directly and in sugar-containing products around 100 pounds of sugar each per year. We are among the largest sugar users in the world. Moreover, our prices to consumers are among the lowest in the world.

In many foreign countries excessive tariffs, excise taxes, monopoly prices, and other restrictions force sugar prices to levels far above those in the United States. Consumers in such countries frequently use only a fraction of the sugar used by consumers in the United States. As a result, there tends to be an und reonsumption of sugar in many countries of the world. Sugar coming from the beet fields and cane fields tends to be dammed up in warehouses instead of moving into consumption. The resulting surplus can properly be likened to the floods occurring here in the Red River Valley when ice farther north retards the spring flow.

The world sugar surplus has been made worse over the years by the extremely low wage rates prevailing in a number of the tropical sugarcane growing areas. Prewar wages in some cases were as low as 15 cents per day. With production costs based on such wage rates, low sugar prices had little effect on production.

To make matters still worse, some countries have subsidized exports. Both Poland and Czechoslovakia are important sugar exporters. Yet, sugar prices in those countries are kept so high that per capita consumption in Czechoslovakia is only about 53 pounds and that in Poland is only 40 pounds per year. High internal prices check consumption in those countries and thereby leave a residual supply for sale in the export market at far lower world prices.

Only about 10 percent of the world's sugar produced in the prewar period was sold in the so-called free world export market, that is, in export markets in which the sugar had no preferential. In the prewar period, world sugar production amounted to about 35,000,000 tons, and only about 3,600,000 tons were sold in the world market. A change of 1,000,000 tons would be only 3 percent of the world total supply but it would exceed 25 percent of the supply for the export market. A very small percentage of the world sugar supply, therefore, exercises a dominating influence in establishing prices in the world market. The importance of supply changes is greatly magnified.

If barriers to trade and consumption of sugar throughout the world could be reduced to the level of those in the United States so that prices to consumers would be reasonably in line with prices in the world markets, it appears that world consumption could be greatly increased. The larger supplies and freer flow of sugar in world markets should add stability to the world sugar situation. The greater stability that could be achieved in world markets would be of great benefit to our producers as well as to our consumers.

In an effort to turn the world sugar economy in the direction of freer trade and greater consumption, the United States has supported the proposals made by Cuba for the development of a new international sugar agreement. The position of the United States Government on this matter was adopted after a public hearing and consultations with the various branches of the domestic sugar producing and consuming industries. The International Sugar Council held a meeting on the matter in London starting June 26. In addition to the official delegation selected from among the various agencies of the United States Government, there were present also a representative of domestic beet processors, a representative of domestic beet growers, a representative of the Hawaiian industry, and a representative of the Puerto Rican industry. This industry group worked in close collaboration with the Government delegation throughout the meeting. Certainly the representatives of all countries attending the conference found that the United States sugar industry, as well as the United States Government, wish to develop a program in collaboration with the other countries of the world to bring about a greater consumption and freer trade in sugar.

The conference adopted the American draft agreement as a starting point for the development of its own draft. The conference draft embodies the various suggestions made by representatives of the many countries in attendance. Naturally, no country is committed to adopt any agreement and some of the proposals in the draft are mutually contradictory and included as alternative suggestions. Nevertheless, many of the problems of fundamental importance to the world sugar economy were considered and the present draft embodies various suggestions as to extent and manner of dealing with them. When the time arrives to deal further with sugar surpluses the work done in London should furnish the outline for a new program.

The outbreak of fighting in Korea touched off a heavy buying movement in the United States and the rest of the world. There is strong evidence that consumer buying has subsided in most sections of the country. Nevertheless, it has been necessary to provide sugar to protect the requirements of the domestic market, especially in the East, until new crop Puerto Rican and Cuban sugar becomes available in February. To do this, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased 600,000 tons of Cuban sugar, most of which it will make available to the domestic market as needed during the remainder of 1950. This sugar was purchased at a price of 5 38 cents per pound, f. a. s. Cuba, which is approximately equal to the current price of 6 25 cents per pound, duty paid, c. i. f. New York. It is of significance that at the time negotiations were completed for the purchase of this sugar, the world price was one-half cent per pound above the price Commodity Credit Corporation was required to pay. Although the Sugar Act is not designed to protect this country against the effects of world shortages, the fact is that domestic prices remained relatively stable during the heavy buying period while world prices rose sharply.

Cuba protected its long-time market in the United States in preference to seeking the temporary gains of selling a larger quantity in the world market at the present high price.

To satisfy the present high demand at stable prices the determination of sugar requirements was raised to 8,700,000 tons. That is more than 1,100,000 tons above the quantity distributed in 1949 and it is more than 600,000 tons above the record quantity distributed in 1941, when a hoarding movement was in progress for the entire year. The only Cuban sugar available for meeting this increased requirement was the 600,000 tons owned by Commodity Credit Corporation, and a part of that was required for carryover and other purposes. Therefore, 400,000 tons of the increased quota were reallocated to domestic areas. In round figures, Puerto Rico received 150,000 tons; Hawaii and the beet area each received 100,000 tons; and the mainland cane area received 50,000 tons. This should enable these areas to market without restriction during the remainder of 1950. Incidentally, this should meet the problem of overquota supplies this year in our domestic areas.

Since 1934 when the Jones-Costigan Sugar Act was written, this country has developed a new type of protective program for sugar. The present version is contained in the Sugar Act of 1948. This program recognizes the needs of consumers as well as those of producers. Moreover, it contains the flexibility which is essential in dealing with changing domestic and world conditions. Supplies for the United States come primarily from six producing areas. Four of these are domestic: The beet area, the mainland cane area, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. Cuba and the Philippines, of course, are the major foreign suppliers of our market. The sugar programs since 1934 have done much to keep each of these six competing areas in a healthy, fighting condition. The advantages of having several competing sources of supply are always evident from the standpoint of consumers. The advantages were especially great during the recent war period—first, when supplies from the Philippines were cut off, and later when the submarine menace and the shortage of ocean shipping facilities restricted shipments from Puerto Rico and Cuba. The advantages of giving equitable treatment to producers is demonstrated at the present time by our large supplies from Cuba and the domestic areas.

The ample supplies of sugar that now prove so welcome are traceable in large part to the operations of the Sugar Act during the past 3 years. In the spring of 1948 the price of refined cane sugar fell from $8.40 to $7.40 per 100 pounds. To check the decline in prices it was necessary to reduce quotas from 7,800,000 tons to 7,200,000 tons. In all probability prices would have gone somewhat lower, temporarily, if quota reductions had not been made. There followed a moderate recovery in prices, although the price in June 1950 was only $7.70 per 100 pounds. The loss of confidence on the part of growers while prices were falling, and the return of confidence when the market was stabilized probably had more effect on production than the actual level of prices.

In 1948 our production of beet sugar fell to 1,300,000 tons. This year it may exceed 1,900,000 tons. Production in the mainland cane area, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico has also increased during the past 3 years, although prices were probably not the dominating influence in those areas. Even in Cuba the stability given the industry under our Sugar Act helped bring about the increase in production in 1950 in contrast to the sharp cut that came in 1949 following the low prices of 1948.

Certainly the operations of the act checked the decline in prices that took place in the first half of 1948. Certainly also consumers would have gained temporarily if that decline had continued. Consumers would be paying dearly now, however, if we did not have the large 1950 supplies which can be attributed to the price stabilization in 1948 and 1949.

In administering the sugar program, we recognize that in the Sugar Act of 1948 Congress provided for a program of stabilization for the protection of the proper interests of both producers and consumers. The flexibility permitted under the Sugar Act is the great advantage this program provides in maintaining stability under greatly changing conditions. In 1948 when consumer demand fell, supplies made available under the quota system were reduced from 7,800,000 tons to 7,200,000 tons. This year, when consumer demand has increased sharply, the supplies have been raised from 7,500,000 tons to 8,700,000 tons. Such flexibility is necessary if we are to deal with a widely fluctuating demand situation and undertake to give the American consumer what he wants when he wants it.

Under the Sugar Act domestic producers have been afforded a very effective protective system under which they can supply a large part of the needs of the domestic market with confidence that they will be protected against a part of the price declines that frequently occur in the world market. The great and growing efficiency of our domestic producers is adequate testimony of the keen competition existing between the six major suppliers of the United States' market. It is essential that producers, both farmers and factories, strive for ever-increasing efficiency in production if they are to keep abreast in the competitive race of selling their products.

In the future it should be possible, through cooperation of all or a major portion of the nations of the world, to develop a freer international economy for sugar that will simplify the problem of protecting the interests of producers and consumers in this country. While the present conditions continue in the world sugar economy, however, and while tremendous uncertainties confront us in other respects, both our producers and consumers need protection they are receiving under the Sugar Act.

New Foreign Studies Course at University of Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Des Moines Register of September 4, 1950, entitled "New Foreign Studies Course at Iowa," along with a portion of a letter on the same subject from President Virgil M. Hancher of the University of Iowa.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Des Moines Register, September 4, 1950]

NEW FOREIGN STUDIES COURSE AT IOWA

We are glad to see the new program of foreign studies in the general cirriculum of the University of Iowa this fall. Our times call for a broader knowledge and a deeper understanding of peoples and lands which a shrinking globe is bring ever closer to us.

It is not enough for us to learn a country's mean annual rainfall, the ratio of its imports to its exports, its form of government and the important events in its history.

These facts are important, but to be really meaningful they must be tied together into the whole that constitutes a people and a nation. We need to know the people as human beings with certain important motivating traits and traditions. We need to know what social forces have shaped their hopes, their fears and their prejudices. We need to speak to them in their own language instead of waiting for them to learn ours.

By regrouping into one unit isolated courses from four departments—geography, history, modern languages, political science—the university hopes to provide this broader knowledge. Germany and Austria, France, Spain, and Russia are the nations that will be studied.

The new studies will be of special interest to students who expect to work or travel abroad or go into government service, of course. But they should find their largest field among those who will remain at home, to be active citizens in forming our world policies.

Describing this new course, President Hancher, of Iowa University, has written to my office, in part, as follows:

"I have your inquiry about our program of foreign studies which we are initiating at the university this fall.

"In a meeting of the graduate college of August 1, referring to the critical international situation I suggested that the faculty submit programs of teaching or research which might be useful in connection with the present defense program and the role of our country as a leader among the nations of the world.

"Following this suggestion a program of foreign studies was organized by an informal committee and approved by Dean Dewey B. Stuit, of the college of liberal arts. The program resembles in a general way the area and language program of the ASTP of World War II. Our program differs from that of the ASTP in that it brings together a large number of departments—geography, history, modern foreign languages and political science—and emphasizes the importance of this type of training not only for defense purposes but in particular to give students the preparation they need if they are to function effectively in international affairs—business, governmental, professional, and scientific. The goal of the program is to familiarize the student with the geography, the political and economic concepts, the cultural traditions, and the language of a foreign area to an extent where he may use his knowledge as a member of our Armed Forces, in the diplomatic service of this country or as a business representative.

"From a general educational viewpoint the program will give the student a broader outlook and better understanding of other nations and enable him to understand and judge the international situation in a more objective manner."

Speculation on the Commodity Exchanges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a part of the text of a radio interview by Mr. Charles Collingwood with Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, broadcast last Sunday evening, September 17, over the Columbia Broadcasting System, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. This portion of the broadcast refers directly to speculation on the commodity exchanges, a problem with which the Senate attempted to deal through the amendment offered by me to the Defense Production Act of 1950 which was eliminated in conference.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. COLLINGWOOD. Do you consider the Defense Production Act satisfactory from the agricultural standpoint?

Secretary BRANNAN. Aside from the fact that it does not include one necessary type of authority, it seems to be a very good piece of legislation. We're still in the process of making a thorough study of the provisions and getting organized to carry out the parts of the act for which the President has made us responsible.

Mr. COLLINGWOOD. You said you're organizing to carry out the Agriculture Department's responsibilities under this act; is that anything comparable to setting up a War Food Administration?

Secretary BRANNAN. No, nothing like that. We'll have a few people watching the supplies of materials and facilities needed in farm production and food processing. We'll keep an eye on requirements for food and other agricultural products and make any allocations that become necessary to insure that all essential needs are met, both domestic and foreign. And we'll have a few people keeping up with the price picture.

Mr. COLLINGWOOD. When you said the Defense Production Act failed to provide one necessary type of authority, what were you referring to?

Secretary BRANNAN. I meant authority to hold down excessive speculation on the commodity exchanges. Wild speculation speeds up a boom and it speeds up a bust. It's downright dangerous. In a few weeks beginning with the Korean outbreak, speculators in soybeans had a field day. Prices mounted so that they could take profits of as much as 270 percent on their margins or down payments. They could buy soybeans for 20 cents a bushel down payment—less than 10 percent of the price—and in just a short time prices went up 54 cents a bushel.

While housewives were being shamed for buying an extra 5 pounds of sugar, a speculator with $400 could buy a sugar contract calling for future delivery of 112,000 pounds of sugar—then worth about $6,000.

The new law restricts the use of credit for buying homes and the goods we all use. I don't think the speculators ought to be treated as a privileged class. The Government should have authority to control the margins or down payments in the commodity futures markets just as we have other kinds of credit control.

American Garrisons Over the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Garrisons," written by Vermont Royster and published in the Wall Street Journal of September 20, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GARRISONS

(By Vermont Royster)

A subtle but significant shift is taking place in America's world role, a shift that now in the midst of a war seems like a matter of small moment and yet one that has far-reaching implications for us at home and abroad. For it is an alteration that will not undo itself even when peace comes again.

We are being transformed, partly by circumstance and partly by design, from a nation that exercises world power from a home base into a nation that will wield its power from armed outposts located not only in our possessions and protectorates but also in friendly countries all over the world.

This change, and it is a change in the kind of nation we will henceforth be, comes from the fact that our temporary armies of occupation in Europe and Asia are to become permanent garrisons set in the midst of free peoples.

It may seem like a small change because we have already become accustomed to the fact that we have interests in Asia and in Europe and we have perforce undertaken long-range commitments in both places. It may seem a small matter, for instance, to move from the Atlantic Pact, which pledges us to defend Europe, to the establishment of a permanent armed force in Europe to support the pledge. It may seem, too, nothing new because we have long maintained similar outposts in such places as Panama and Guantanamo, Cuba.

Yet, in truth, to change the label on the Army from "occupation" to "garrison" and to dot those garrisons all over the world means that both we and the world must adjust to thousands of new problems.

The armies of occupation in Germany and Japan have their problems, but at least they are all-of-a-piece. There the occupation is the government. It is justified to the occupied on the grounds that they are a defeated nation, an understandable if not pleasant reason. The cost is justified to ourselves because we must reorganize the vanquished. But to both viewpoints it is temporary; it is not a permanent alteration in the way of living.

Now the United States plans to negotiate a peace treaty with Japan, to return the country to the Japanese. But the Army will not leave; it is to remain behind as an outside force in but not of the country. When that happens, the whole relationship must alter, not only the individual relationship between Japanese and United States soldiers but the relationship between the two governments. And most important of all, the time element changes. Neither we nor the Japanese can look forward to an end of it.

In Europe we are not only going to put our permanent garrisons into the lands of former enemies; we will place them in countries with which we have never been at war, completely sovereign countries. Unlike Panama and Guantanamo, these garrisons will not be isolated points cut off from the rest of the garrisoned country. They will be intermingled, both geographically and politically, with the life of the country itself.

The countless personal irritations that will arise may be passed over, not because they are unimportant but because they can probably be surmounted. Anyway, there are other, more important implications.

The moment we set down a permanent garrison in, let us say, France, both we and France have given hostages to one another. The size, the organization, the training and supply of the French Army would become instantly a matter of vital concern to us.

We could not—and would not—avoid interference.

On the reverse side, the French could not—and would not—give us carte blanche to locate our forces or to fortify them as we see fit. Our garrison commander, too, becomes subject to the ideas and orders of an alien, though friendly, government.

This is only part of it. When we have an American garrison in France we are entwined with France's economic well-being, with her politics, with her foreign policy, for these things all would affect the operation and security of our garrison. To what goes on in France we are more than an interested observer. We are then an anxious party.

In theory our garrison might not touch France's sovereignty or restrict our own freedom of action. In practice we could not ignore what France did. In practice we would not be free to follow our own policy within this sphere; our military policy would have to be adjusted to the internal, as well as foreign, policies of France.

The rest of the world—the non-garrisoned part—would also have to make adjustments. To all of Europe the United States would cease to be a country over the sea (albeit already a powerful one) and become a country with fingers permanently stuck in their areas. The army of occupation can be treated as a passing matter; the garrison would be ever-present evidence of empire.

The garrisons will likewise bring new tasks for us at home. The armies of occupation mean sending men abroad, they mean heavy costs, they mean wrestling with the internal problems of other lands. But with armies of occupation there is the aim—and the expectation—of "bringing the boys home" as soon as a certain job is done. The garrisons are something different.

Even if the Korean war should not be followed by another outbreak, the garrisons would not end for they are not planned as temporary measures. Once we undertake to garrison Europe and Asia, when do we come home?

The meaning of this, in its simplest terms, is that we must be prepared to maintain very large armies permanently all over the world. We must be prepared to pay the cost of them in manpower, in taxes, in the willingness to intervene in domestic affairs abroad, and in the willingness to have our own domestic affairs regimented in "peace" as in war. And the outlook for all this is permanent—or for as long as "permanent" is in history.

Two world wars have changed the United States from a continental island into a world power. But soon the far-flung garrisons will change it into something it never was, a world-wide empire with outposts of power even in peace and in the midst of friends. It is not an easy role to play. Hereafter we shall have to live differently at home. And the world and we will have to learn to live together—differently.

Mobilization of Moral and Spiritual Resources for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement prepared by me, together with excerpts from an address which I delivered last night before the Philadelphia Chapter of the Gold Star Wives of America, on the subject of mobilization of our moral and spiritual resources for national defense.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MARTIN OF PENNSYLVANIA

Home front support of our fighting forces will not reach its full effectiveness unless we mobilize all our moral and spiritual resources for national defense, United States Senator MARTIN said last night in an address to the Philadelphia chapter, Gold Star Wives of America.

Senator MARTIN spoke at a dinner marking the installation of officers of the organization held in the Ritz-Carlton Hotel. Its members are World War II widows.

"One of the most serious problems which arises in war time grows out of greed and selfishness," Senator MARTIN said. "There is danger to our country from the chiseler, the profiteer, the black-market operator, and all others who seek to enrich themselves out of the blood and suffering of our fighting men.

"Those who stoop to such outrageous practices betray their country at a time when American lives are being sacrificed on the altar of patriotism.

"We must fight the sabotage of the unpatriotic chiselers with all the righteous influence of real Americanism. We must mobilize all the moral and spiritual resources in complete support of our national defense effort.

"Your organization was born of sacrifice for our country and our flag. Your members know the tragedy of total war. In your hearts there is hope and prayer that the present conflict in Korea may soon be ended in victory for freedom and that our beloved country may be spared the terrible horrors of another war.

"But I am firmly convinced that we must put forth every effort now—not after the November election—but now—to place our country in a state of total preparedness.

"This is no time to play politics with the lives of our boys who are fighting in the mud of the Korean battlefields.

"This is no time to dilly-dally with rising prices. This is no time for higher profits, work stoppages, or demands for increased wages.

"To deal effectively with inflation we must freeze prices and wages now—not after the November election. We should act before the damage is done—not some time in the future when it may be too late."

Victory for Senator Tydings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "A Real Victory for Tydings," published in the Washington Evening Star of September 20, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A REAL VICTORY FOR TYDINGS

Senator TYDINGS seems to have suffered his worst defeat before the votes were counted. There have been a lot of tall tales about what his brush with the mighty Senator MCCARTHY had done to him in Maryland and how he was up against the toughest fight of his career—tougher even than 12 years ago, when President Roosevelt tried to purge him.

But when the votes were counted, the Senator seems to have done all right. For Maryland Democrats not only nominated him for a fifth consecutive Senate term—a precedent for the Free State—but by the size of his majority gave him a vote of confidence with a pat on the back. It would not appear that he has much cause for anxiety in November and the number of converts won by Senator McCARTHY is not staggering. Senator TYDINGS deserved what he won and the Star, for one, finds some satisfaction in the result, not only because of the Senator's personal triumph but because of the implied repudiation, in Maryland, of McCarthyism.

Governor Lane's victory, after a particularly hard-fought campaign, lacks the substance of real triumph for most of the voters in Maryland preferred his opponent. While the unit system of convention nomination seems to put him in the clear, he still has a hard fight in the election.

In nearby Montgomery and Prince Georges Counties, the regular Democratic organization won without difficulty. But voters in both counties should have something to apologize for. When only about 10,000 out of 56,000 registered voters in Montgomery and only 11,600 of Prince Georges' 48,000, turn out to cast their votes—popular government has received a set-back, no matter who wins.

What Should Be Our Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a discussion on what should be our foreign policy, which occurred on the American Forum of the Air on Saturday, September 9, 1950. The two participants were the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] and the junior Senator from California.

There being no objection, the text of the discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT SHOULD BE OUR FOREIGN POLICY?

(By Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN and Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND)

ANNOUNCER. What's ahead in the Far East? What should we do about Formosa? What should be our foreign policy?

The National Broadcasting Co. presents the American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the NBC Theater in Washington, D. C.

Now here is your moderator, Theodore Granik.

Moderator GRANIK. The Republican National Committee recently issued a campaign white paper entitled "Background to Korea," contending that administration policies on China, Korea, and Formosa, had "boomeranged" disastrously.

In a 20,000-word document, the committee charged, through quotations from party officeholders, that Republicans had not been consulted about far-eastern decisions.

Last week came a restatement and a clarification of administration foreign policy, in a fireside chat by the President. He defined the United States aims in these words:

"We do not want the fighting in Korea to expand into a general war. * * * We want peace and we shall achieve it. Our men are fighting for peace today in Korea. We are working for peace constantly in the United Nations and in all the capitals of the world. Our workers, our farmers, our businessmen, all our vast resources are helping now to create the strength which will make peace secure."

So spoke the President.

In view of every American's vital interest in our foreign policy, the American Forum of the Air has asked two distinguished United States Senators to give us their views: Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican of California, one of the Senate's foremost authorities on far-eastern problems, and Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, Democrat of Alabama, who was recently appointed as a delegate to the United Nations.

Now, Senator KNOWLAND, what do you think of the recommendation by Gen. Douglas MacArthur that Formosa should not be allowed to fall into unfriendly hands?

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Granik, I believe that the recommendation of General MacArthur was a sound one. I do not know a single responsible commander, military or naval, in the far Pacific area, who does not recognize that the falling of Formosa into unfriendly hands will pierce the American defense position that runs from Japan through Okinawa to the Philippines. And what jeopardizes the defense of this country, jeopardizes the defense of the entire free world.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Well, I think that the unfortunate part about General MacArthur's statement relating to Formosa was the fact that he proposed unilateral action instead of relating it to the United Nations. We must never forget that the fighting in Korea is being done under a directive from the United Nations and is not merely a United States action. As quick as we moved into Korea, the President announced that he had instructed the Seventh Fleet to neutralize Formosa to protect our flank; not to see that we protected it forever, or that we should occupy it, or anything of that kind. And it seems to me that General MacArthur ignored that particular part of our program; that it was a United Nations action. And, by the way, he is the United Nations commander.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND, do you think that unilateral action on our part would break up solidarity of the United Nations?

Senator KNOWLAND. No; I do not think that unilateral action on our part would break up the solidarity of the United Nations. I think we must recognize the fact that we are involved in a war in Korea at the present time, that although it is called a police action, there are men dying as we are meeting here tonight. That is largely because the United States had not properly equipped the Army of the Republic of Korea to withstand the type of aggression which came down from the north and had been supplied by the Soviet Union.

I do not believe that it makes for peace for us to more or less indicate to Communist China, which is a satellite of the Soviet Union, that Formosa is theirs for the plucking.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Well, I don't think we are indicating that Formosa is China's for the plucking. I think our attitude is that Formosa is still a problem that the United Nations must settle, and that we must not move in on it in an effort by ourselves to settle it alone.

Senator KNOWLAND. Of course, I think that the problem that my friend from Alabama does not quite appreciate is the fact that the legal government of China, of the Republic of China, has its temporary capital on the island of Formosa at Taipei, the Republic of China is a member of the United Nations, it is a permanent member of the Security Council, it has wholeheartedly supported every effort of the United States to withstand aggression in Korea, and it was the first nation outside of the United States to offer troops. It offered 33,000 troops, which were not accepted, but that is a larger number of troops than offered by all the other United Nations with the exception of the United States put together. And up to the very hour when we meet, outside of the forces of the United States and the Republic of Korea, there are only 1,500 ground troops from other United Nations countries, and all of those are from Great Britain.

Senator SPARKMAN. Senator KNOWLAND, you do not believe, do you, that we should have accepted the offer of troops by nationalist China?

Senator KNOWLAND. I would say that as long as the Republic of China is a member of the United Nations and a member of the Security Council, and inasmuch as we are faced with the problem of the Communists charging western imperialism, one of the ways of withstanding that would be to accept the offers by Asiatic powers to help uphold international law and order. I would be happy if India had offered some troops against aggression in Korea. The fact of the matter is that up to this very hour when we meet, the only forces India has offered are some ambulance units. And you are not going to stop aggressive communism either in Asia or the Middle East or in Europe just with ambulance units.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator Sparkman?

Senator SPARKMAN. I certainly agree with you. I wish very much that India had offered some troops. I was very glad to see little Thailand offer some troops. I want Orientals in. But I think there is a real reason for not using Chinese troops, and I think it was well stated at the time. As a matter of fact, I think General MacArthur is the one who sent in the declination immediately. Because we must recognize that China is engaged in a civil war.

Senator KNOWLAND. So is Korea.

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, but we were pledged to support the South Koreans. If we accepted in the Korean war the troops offered by nationalist China, of course there would be every excuse for Communist China to come in on the other side. And we know that it probably would have meant an all-out war.

And I think Senator KNOWLAND will agree with me that we are not ready for an all-out war. We are not in any shape today to fight an all-out war.

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, I would say to the Senator from Alabama that in my judgment, and I think it can be confirmed by the facts of the situation, the Chinese Communist Forces have permitted men who were fighting in China just a short time ago, and other people who fought with the Russians at Stalingrad, to cross over the Manchurian-Korean border and to reinforce the North Korean aggressive forces. I don't think there is anyone in our own Government or anywhat his brush with the mighty Senator this infiltration. Now, it is true they are not coming as organized Chinese troops; but, that they are coming as individuals, battle-seasoned veterans, to add to the problem of our men in Korea is, I believe, without doubt, a fact at the present time.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, I admit that that is true. We all know that it is true. For our own satisfaction, we know that Russia has been giving aid to the North Koreans. But at the same time, I don't think the Senator from California would say that that would be justification for our declaring an all-out war against Russia.

Senator KNOWLAND. No. But I think if we are going to have a system of international law and order so that the peace of the world will be secure for ourselves and our children, we must stop yielding to international blackmail. Now, the Soviet Union and the Communists have been carrying on that type of international blackmail for a long time. They did it at Berlin, when they put on the blockade and made us have the airlift. They have done it in this situation in China. They have threatened that if we go north of the thirty-eighth parallel, they will come into the war. I think it is time that we stopped yielding to Communist blackmail throughout the world.

Senator SPARKMAN. I will say that I am in thorough accord with the sentiment that we ought to maintain a strong attitude toward Russia. I think our moving into Korea, our moving into the Security Council and asking the United Nations to intervene in Korea, was an action that Russia did not anticipate.

Senator KNOWLAND. And I think it was an excellent action, and I think all supported it on both sides of the aisle. It was the only move that could be made unless the United Nations was to die on that date.

Senator SPARKMAN. That is correct. And I think perhaps the Korean situation may have at least one happy outcome, and that is that it may very well revitalize the United Nations.

Senator KNOWLAND. And it may also warn the people of the United States, as well as the United Nations, that the Communists' talk about peace is but a mask for aggression.

Senator SPARKMAN. Well, I think we all agree with that statement. We all know that we have a very difficult situation to deal with.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN, many people are asking why our Defense Establishment was so unprepared for that Korean war, when the administration spent some $50,000,000,000 in the last 5 years.

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes; that is true. A great many people ask us. I am sure Senator KNOWLAND has had many inquiries, as I have, and as every other Member of Congress has had. What has become of the $50,000,000,000 that we have appropriated for the Armed Forces since 1945, since the end of the war? Well, as a matter of fact, the biggest single part of that appropriation has gone for pay, maintenance, clothing, supplies, and things of that kind. Another sizable item has gone for obtaining equipment and ordnance, munitions, heavy munitions. When you break it down and see what has actually become of the money, you will realize that not a great deal of the money has gone into building up, making an army stronger.

Of course, it is easy for us looking back upon it and using hindsight to say that we made a mistake. We did make a mistake. We should have spent many additional billions of dollars. But I think if we would just, in all fairness, review the situation over the past several years, we would realize that the American people, the taxpayers, were calling upon us to cut down, cut down, cut down. And when Secretary Johnson, a year or so ago, announced that he was going to cut down by $1,000,000,000, the applause that went up from all over the country was tremendous.

Moderator GRANIK. Do you think it came from the Republican side of the House?

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes; from all of us, and from the taxpayers out over the country generally. I think we ought to keep those things in mind when we are talking about that.

Senator KNOWLAND. I don't quite agree with my friend from Alabama in that regard, I think in the first place, one reason the American people had great admiration for Winston Churchill was that even during Britain's darkest hour he took the British people into his confidence. He gave them the cold, hard facts of life, whether it was good news or bad news. He treated them as adults, and they responded as such.

Now, as a matter of fact, the Congress of the United States appropriated money that would have gone a long ways toward building a 70-group Air Force. The President of the United States froze those funds and did not use them. The Congress of the United States appropriated all of the funds asked by the Military Establishment, and they could have had more at any time they requested. They did not even expend the funds which the Congress had appropriated.

Now, I just happened to look up to see what a bazooka costs. A 3.5 bazooka costs $63. You could have had a thousand bazookas for $63,000. A thousand more bazookas in Korea of the 3.5 variety at the time of the outbreak of hostilities might have made a great difference. I believe that we have not been sufficiently alert to recognize that the people in the Kremlin will only be impressed by a force in being and not one on blueprints.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, I will say one word on that. I don't differ greatly with my friend BILL KNOWLAND in that statement As a matter of fact, I supported the 70-group Air Force every time it came up. Now, he throws the blame on the President. Let me remind you that it came up in the Congress of the United States. And when it was voted on in the Senate, there were only nine Senators that voted in favor of a 70-group Air Force. I was one of the nine.

Senator KNOWLAND. And the Senator will recall that I offered the amendment, and the Senator supported it. But to give the entire story, one reason why a great many of the Democrats and Republicans did not support the amendment was because they were told that the President would not use the funds even if the amendment was adopted So, I think, in fairness to some of the Senators who did not vote with us on that day, that background must be given as a matter of fairness to them.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Of course, that is true. But at the same time, there had been very strong support for a 70-group Air Force, there would have been greater support for the amendment offered by my friend, the Senator from California. There were only nine Senators that voted for it. There was a time when Congress had the right, and the privilege, had the power to show the President what the people of the country wanted, if they wanted that. And only nine voted for it.

Senator KNOWLAND. Yes; but I will say, John, that as a matter of fact, in conference, funds were provided for 52 groups, despite that Senate action; and that bill went to the President, the funds were provided, and the President froze the amount and did not use any more than would take care of 48 groups.

Senator SPARKMAN. And that was about the time that Secretary Johnson was putting on his economy campaign that met such widespread approval of the people of the country.

Senator KNOWLAND. Yes; but I am afraid we cut out some muscle as well as some fat.

Senator SPARKMAN. I know we did. But, Bill, you and I were on the same side. We voted for the funds. However, a great many of the people who are now raising these cries are profiting from hindsight rather than foresight.

Moderator GRANIK. Gentlemen, may I take a question from the audience?

During this past week, the Marine Corps League had an exciting convention in Washington, particularly with the visit of President Truman.

We have invited some of these distinguished marines to attend our program today. I see the commandant, Clay Nixon, of Seattle, in the audience, and I am wondering if he would like to ask a question.

Mr. NIXON. I think both Senators could answer this.

Gentlemen, do you feel that—I am speaking as a Marine Corps League official on behalf of a lot of marines who will go to immediate duty—there should be a demand by the United Nations for an atomic inspection of Russia as well as all of the world, that we could avoid the so-called police action?

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND?

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, of course, I think, Mr. Nixon, that you can have no worth-while international control of atomic energy unless you have full inspection and as you well know, the Soviet Union has refused that type of inspection, without which there can be no real control. I cannot quite understand from your question whether you are proposing that we should demand that they open their doors to inspection and take such action as our national interests require if they do not do it.

Mr. NIXON. You believe that we can avoid what we should have asked for years ago, the matter of "put up or shut up" at this time?

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, I think that we are either going to have a system of international order or we are not. Certainly as far as I am concerned, I believe that it is time for the free nations of the world to establish a line behind which they will no longer continue to retreat.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. Yes, I think we have pretty well established that line, certainly in some parts.

Senator KNOWLAND. In Europe.

Senator SPARKMAN. In Europe. I think we have done it very well. One thing that I think we need to keep in mind is this. In this fight against Communist aggression, it is necessary to follow somewhat the same pattern that we found it necessary to follow during World War II. I know that the forces that were out in the Pacific cried for help. My friend, BILL KNOWLAND, at the time, insisted on our sending more help to the Pacific. Instead, we simply held in the Pacific until we completed the job in Europe, and then we turned toward the Pacific. I think we have to conduct some such campaign as that in this holding of Communist aggression throughout the world. As my friend, BILL KNOWLAND, has said, we have pretty well now drawn the line in Europe.

Moderator GRANIK. What do you think about his comment, "put up or shut up?"

Senator SPARKMAN. I think we are doing a good bit of that. I think the Korean instance has indicated to many that we are not going to take just anything and everything.

Senator KNOWLAND. The only thing that disturbes me is the current policy of appeasement at Lake Success and in Washington relative to the seating of the Chinese Communists in the United Nations. Now, the proposal is being made that if that is done it would give us another arsonist in the town fire department, so to speak, where you would have a Chinese Communist Malik there to disturb and sabotage and obstruct the activities of the United Nations Security Council. I think our Government is very weak in that policy. We have said we would not vote for it, but we will not try to line up any votes, we will not utilize our veto. I think we should take a firm stand, vote against it, line up against it, line up others to vote against seating the Chinese Communist, and, if necessary, use our veto as the Russians have done many times in the past.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KNOWLAND, do you not think that our new delegate will alleviate some of that confusion?

Senator KNOWLAND. I certainly hope so. Knowing what an able statesman and an able legislator he is, I hope he will bring some sense in that regard to our foreign policy.

Senator SPARKMAN. Bill, I want to say this, that the thing you were talking about was talked about when Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, returned from the conference of the big ministers several months ago, but I do not believe there has been any such talk of that since the Korean outbreak. I do not go along with you when you talk of the existence of a spirit of appeasement. I think we are through appeasing and I do not believe that there is any great spirit present regarding the seating of Communist China, certainly I do not want to see them seated.

Senator KNOWLAND. At the very moment the representatives of the new nation of India are in Peiping assuring Mao Tse-tung's representative that they will do everything that they can to line up votes to seat Mao Tse-tung's representative at the meeting that will be held in New York this very month. So I hope you will double check that question quite carefully.

MODERATOR. Let's take another question. There is another convention in town, the thirty-second annual convention of the new Beta Epsilon law fraternity. Some of the delegates are present. Would one of you gentlemen like to ask a question?

Mr. GOLDBERG. My name is Joseph A. Goldberg, of Winnetka, Ill. I would like to address this question to Senator SPARKMAN. Do you believe that the United Nations army should stop at the thirty-eighth parallel if and when they drive the North Koreans to that point?

Senator SPARKMAN. I believe that that question should be determined by the United Nations. And again, I want to stress this necessity now, if we believe in the United Nations; and we have declared our faith in them when we put this problem in their lap, and we are fighting under the assumption that this is a United Nations war—and it is; 53 of the 59 United Nations have pledged their support.

Oh, it's true not many of the ground troops are there yet, but more than 30,000 have been pledged and some of them are there and some of them are on the way while others are coming. I think it is one of the most hopeful things that has happened; that is, that 53 out of 59 members of the United Nations came to our side in this fight. Now, it is a United Nations action. I think that we must keep faith with the United Nations and a decision as to what will happen above the thirty-eighth parallel will have to be decided by the United Nations.

Moderator Granik: Senator KNOWLAND?

Senator KNOWLAND. I would like to amplify that a little. Of course, it is a United Nations action but we are going to have some part in what that determination is. If we only go back to the thirty-eighth parallel and allow the Communist Government of North Korea to reorganize, to get new equipment from the Soviet Union, it will be a continual threat to the peace of the Republic of Korea. Unless the world now can give a United Nation to the Republic of Korea, all of this bloodshed will have been in vain and we will have to face the same thing over again. I think our policy should be clear, we should take some leadership in it, and it should be that these aggressives are going to be moved out north of the thirty-eighth parallel. If they want to go back into Communist China, let us chase them back into Communist China and let them be there with the ideological conditions that they apparently want but let us not plague the free people of Korea with this aggressive force by merely letting them again take up their positions north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. I would just like to add this, that I still say that the ultimate decision ought to be left to the United Nations. Naturally, we are going to have an important part to play in making that decision. I do say that whatever we decide to do we ought to make certain that they will not be in a position to exercise this aggression any more.

Moderator GRANIK. May I take another question? Go ahead, sir, please.

Mr. MATSON. My name is Earl Matson and I am a delegate from Chicago, Ill. My question is addressed to Senator KNOWLAND.

Is there any necessary validity in the opinion which many people express to the effect that the only way to achieve a sound foreign policy is to have a sound internal government?

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, of course, I think that foreign policy and domestic policy tie in very closely together. One of the great problems, I think, that we have is that we have allowed our foreign policy commitments to exceed our Armed Forces in being and that is always a very dangerous thing to do. It is necessary, I think we found from World War II, not only to have a strong Army and Navy and Air Force but it is necessary to have a sound industrial capacity and sound economy as well so they all tie in very closely together.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator SPARKMAN?

Senator SPARKMAN. I have no argument with that. I certainly agree with that statement, that they must develop and go hand in hand.

Moderator GRANIK. Gentlemen, we have just time for summaries. Senator KNOWLAND, will you give us your summary?

Senator KNOWLAND. I would say that I have supported our foreign policy in Europe because I thought we had a policy that made sense to the American people and to the American Congress. That was that we would help rehabilitate the war-torn world, we would help maintain a free world of free men. I have differed with our policy in the Far East because we had no such policy there. In other words, we have closed the door to communism in Europe and we left our door wide open in the Pacific. We tried to encourage a coalition between the Chinese Communists and the government of the Republic of China. When I was in China last November one of the leaders of the Republic said to me, "Senator, you know there cannot be any real coalition with a tiger unless you are inside the tiger." That has been the experience with every country that has tried coalition with communism.

I think that it is time that we give some real support to the Republic of China and see to it that the Island of Formosa does not get into unfriendly hands.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you, Senator KNOWLAND.

Senator SPARKMAN, may we have your summary, please?

Senator SPARKMAN. I will go back to the statement that I made earlier in this discussion and point out again the fact that we called upon the United Nations to aid in this Korean situation. As a matter of fact, it was a problem that rightfully belonged to the United Nations. We should be pleased with the response that we have received from the United Nations in this first program of offering armed resistance to Communist aggression. There are 59 members of the United Nations; 53 of them definitely came to our side and pledged their support and several of them are sending armed forces. I think it is one of the most hopeful things that has happened. I think we must continue to make it a United Nations action, and we must realize that the time is past when we, acting alone, can determine all of the foreign policy.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

You have been listening to a discussion on our foreign policy. Our speakers have been Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, Democrat, of Alabama, and Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican, of California.

Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Address by His Eminence Samuel Cardinal Stritch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, some 2 weeks ago I had the profound privilege of listening to words of wisdom from a great American at Albuquerque, N. Mex., my home city, when I attended a dinner honoring a son of the South. That worthy and great person was His Eminence Cardinal Stritch, now of Chicago.

Cardinal Stritch made an address which in my opinion could have been made anywhere, whether in religious circles, in a meeting of civic leaders, or anywhere else. It was a patriotic American address, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, together with the introductory remarks by Archbishop Byrne.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIS EMINENCE SAMUEL CARDINAL STRITCH'S ADDRESS

Archbishop BYRNE. Right Reverend, Very Reverend, Monseigneur, Honorable Ernest Everly, distinguished Senator of the State of New Mexico in Washington, ladies and gentlemen, and friends, it is very gratifying to me as your Archbishop to see the reverent way in which you have received today a Prince of the Church. From the moment he entered the confines of the city of Albuquerque this afternoon, the greatest honor has been bestowed upon him by all. Evidences of profound respect, reverence, and love and the presence of such a large number of Albuquerquians is evidence that you realize the grandeur of this occasion; that you all realize that we have with us this evening one who is higher than anyone who has ever come among us, one that is closer to God and to the Vicar of God on this earth, His Eminence brings the Pope with him wherever he goes. He is an extension of the Holy Father, and those of us who have had the privilege, the sacred privilege of meeting His Holiness and recognizing the keenness of mind of Pope Pius the Twelfth, the warmth of heart that he has, and his holiness of life can see the counterpart of Pope Pius the Twelfth in His Eminence Cardinal Stritch. Verily he is another Pius the Twelfth, and no greater tribute could be paid to him than that, and so with the greatest of reverence I present to you this evening His Eminence and ask all to rise.

Cardinal STRITCH. Mr. Toastmaster, Most Reverend Archbishop, Most Reverend Bishops, Mr. Senator, Mr. Mayor, Monseigneurs, Very Reverend and Reverend Fathers, Surrogates, my dear friends, I want first to thank your Archbishop and you for giving me this visit to Albuquerque. The several reasons for my thanks are going to appear from what I shall say to you this evening. But one reason is personal. It is very personal. You know, some of the thinking in everyone's life goes back to his childhood. Every boy has somehow on some occasion conceived a desire and that desire has lasted to such an extent that the thinking of the grown man is not right until the desire is satisfied. This visit satisfies a desire which goes back to the time when I was in the fourth grade in elementary school down South. We had a teacher from New England, a most unreasonable person. I remember we used to call her Miss Prissy. It was our conviction that before examinations she would sit up all night trying to figure out trick questions. One time she announced an oral spelling examination, and we studied our spelling. When the day came and we lined up before her with that perfect discipline which she commanded, she looked at me and said, "Young man, spell 'Albuquerque.'" Of course, I couldn't spell Albuquerque. So I had to write it 100 times. That stuck in my memory. After this incident, every chance I got I tried to find out something about Albuquerque. I read stories about Albuquerque. Every news dispatch in which there was reference to Albuquerque intrigued me. I have always wanted to come to Albuquerque. Tonight I thank the Archbishop for giving me this opportunity.

These days in New Mexico have been wonderful. I have met with nice people, very nice people. These wonderful days have led me to do a little meditating. As I went about, your good people told me about what is old. They pointed out to me the impress the Spaniards left on New Mexico by this civilizing hand, how they imprinted indelibly some of their culture upon this territory. Then I would think of New Mexico and see its people about me, many of whom came to this country just a few years ago from other parts. Everything seems so youthful; the climate, of course, has something to do with that. New Mexico is new and it is old. It seems to me that to put the new and the old together is one of the great obligations which rests upon us citizens of this great Republic today. Only too often we have forgotten the old. Sometimes people thought about the old without thinking about the new. That is a mistake, too. We must think of the content of our culture which reaches all the way back to the beginning of Christianity and the bringing of Christian teachings to our Western World. That seems to be our obligation today.

You know the old Roman used to boast about being a citizen of Rome. He was very proud of his rights and conscious of his obligations, but Rome was not a republic in the real sense of the word. I think Pope Pius the Twelfth said that the most successful form of government for our times is democracy, and democracy is government by individual citizens who assume their responsibility in promoting the common good. He said it is not just a form, not a government in which there are just masses of people. It is a form of government in which the citizens all unite together to promote the common good. That is very different from the totalitarian ideology of government, from the dictator's idea of government in which some sort of supermind exists and the population is just a mass—a mass having nothing to do in determining its own course of action, nothing to do but to obey in promoting what the dictator decides is the common good.

Mussolini, in one of his aberrations, said, "Liberty in the modern state is freedom to obey the government." A democracy is a government in which all assume the responsibility of promoting the true common good.

Now it seems to me that in these days we ought to think on the fundamentals of the period which we have reached in history. This is a grave period. We are at a crisis which is perhaps the gravest crisis we have ever faced in the history of our country. If we are going to face up to our responsibilities, we ought to think clearly on the fundamental things on which our responsibility rests.

What do we mean when we talk about American democracy? We will say it is a government in which we have freedoms and in which we also have obligations. But that isn't fundamental enough. The old Greek philosophers wrote something about democracy, but their writings are very disappointing. Aristotle's best idea of a state was one of slave labor, and Plato never got above this same idea. In the Roman Republic two-thirds of the population were slaves. Rome was not a real democracy. Why? Because there was no clear cut idea of the dignity and the inherent rights of the human person. The dignity and inherent rights of the human person were not a potent social concept until after the death of Christ, when men stood before the cross of Christ who died for each and every man, died for each and every human person. That brought about two wonderful things, which only then people began to understand—the sacredness of the human person, the inherent rights in the very nature of man. They began to understand freemen, the dignity with which God has clothed the human person, began to talk human rights, inherent human rights.

How can there be any inherent human rights unless there is an immutable moral law, unless in this moral law written by God every right has its roots. Right isn't mere conviction. It must be written in immutable, eternal law that individual man is endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights.

Getting away from God as authority, God as judge, getting away from immutable rights—that type of reasoning leads to totalitarianism, to atrocities, and to abberations. When we began to understand the Christian gospel from Christ Jesus and His Father God, we learned of the dignity of man. To put this into practice in living, into social contacts, and into social life is a hard job. If you have studied the story of the codes of law from the beginning of Christianity, you will see how slow was the change toward recognizing this idea. The great Justinian Code of Roman Law was a relic of the old feudal system. There had to be a beginning of new spirit different from what had existed under the old Roman law. The masses were serfs. The serfs had certain rights and obligations. Slowly the idea of serf disappeared, and the idea of citizen developed. We believe one of the finest developments in all western civilization came about when we tried our first experiments of democracy here. Our Government was established on a Constitution for free men on the premise that religion, morality, education must forever be encouraged. When there comes a breakdown in the religion of the population—religion is a permanent thing—democracy will not endure. We have held to our ideal because we have held to our religion.

Times change, we pass from one economic condition to another. We started out largely as an agricultural country. We become an industrial country. These changes brought problems. We wrote an ideal Constitution—our fundamental doctrines. We have had a hard time trying to realize that ideal. We have realized in practice that there have been times when selfish individuals and personal greed dominated. Many petty tyrannies have led to injuring the common good. There have been times when group interests have prevented the richest enjoyment of native rights to all our citizens. We have made a lot of mistakes, but on the whole we have held to our ideal because we have held to religion.

Today we stand face to face with the great social monster, atheistic communism. It was interesting last year when I was in Europe to hear a university professor in reply to my question about communism in his country say, "You Americans are still talking about the ideology of communism. We see the fact of communism. We have stood face to face with it. We know it to be the enemy of man. We know that it is the negation of everything countless generations here in our Western World have striven to build up and to give us. We know that it degrades, ruins—we know that ultimately it will ruin every human thing." But they are in our own midst, these toyers with novelties, these people who seem to think you have the right to forget God. They use the word God as rhetoric, pay public rhetorical tribute, but they work on problems without any thought of God. They try to impose a godless philosophy on the world while they talk about rights and freedoms. How can such a philosophy be any support for our idea of American democracy. These people have broken down the ideals of people. These people are trying to destroy our inheritance. These people boast of patriotism. Many boast of being progressive and original thinkers. Actually they are destroyers in our midst and do much less for us than those under the hammer and sickle who are openly trying to destroy our western civilization.

This is the time to recognize our responsibilities. We must first recognize our responsibility to God and to our country. We shall be true to our flag if we are true to our cross. It seems to me, and I am sure it seems to you, that in this crisis we must all think. We must all contribute our thoughts. We must allow ourselves to be heard. We must not allow a form of totalitarianism to come into our country. Our country has grown great because in humility we knelt before our God and recognized our responsibility to God; and in recognizing our responsibility to God, we have seen in the Gospel of Christ the ideal of real brotherly love, the idea which the pioneers of our country had in their recognition of the sacredness of the human person.

I know there are some who will tell us the day of the pioneer is gone. There are no more trails to be blazed, no more lands to be settled. The people who say that have forgotten what has gone into our inheritance. The day of the pioneer will never be gone for us. Maybe there are no more virgin forests. Maybe there are no more new lands to be settled. But there are other ways of pioneering, other ways in which we can be pioneers. We have pioneered in building mass production by use of machinery in our economy. We have pioneered in bringing the blessings of the science of medicine to many in our country. We have pioneered in making dry land fertile. There are a million ways in which we can pioneer if we only keep the spirit of our fathers. Remember as in the past we can face the future with security if we face the future with ideals which have been implanted in us and implanted in our civilization and keep them bright and operative. I say this because we are passing through what historians will describe as the end of an epoch and the beginning of a new epoch in history. In this time we can make a great many mistakes, but we can do a great many good things. The best thing we can do is to make our democracy work. We will make our democracy work if all of us get together, each one conscious of his responsibility for the common good—no group interests advanced to the detriment of the common good—no individual advancement opposed to the common good. There are times when groups must sacrifice themselves; times when individuals must sacrifice themselves. Our first responsibility to God and to our country is that we fully contribute to the common good of all.

The blood of our boys is flowing in Korea. We sent them there because we believe in human freedom, and we recognize our world responsibility. But we know the pain that is in the heart of all of us because of the blood of our boys. We are there in spirit on the battlefield with them. We are willing to sacrifice. We are willing, for a time, to stand heavy taxation. We are willing to vote controls upon ourselves, if necessary for a time. While we are willing to do all this for our bleeding boys, we are willing to do this to keep our inheritance, to enrich our inheritance, but we are not willing to experiment with some new kind of America that some shallow minds are trying to project. This is a time when all of us must stand conscious of our responsibility to God. You cannot make a distinction in that responsibility between your acts in private life and your acts in social and political life. Your actions in social and political life as well as those of your private life must be guided by God's moral law and must be entirely in conformity with the sacred thoughts of the Gospel of Christ.

Let me say on the occasion of this delightful visit to Albuquerque that we should do one thing. We ought to reintensify our sense of responsibility as citizens of this democracy. We must be proud of our citizenship. We must defend our rights and live up to our obligations. But, first of all we must forever understand that the Stars and Stripes will wave in honor and be a beacon light to people all over the world only as long as there falls on the Stars and Stripes the shadow of the cross of Calvary. Thank you.

The South Will Come Altogether Into Its Own When Our Fields Are Green in Winter. May Your Business Continue To Grow to This End. I Hope Your Increased Business Will Be in Clover Seed, Caley Pea Seed, Vetch, Dallis Grass Seed—Seed That Will Keep Our Pastures Green the Year Around

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, Alabama has no man more beloved, nor does America have any citizen more distinguished and respected than is the good friend of the vast majority of the older men in this House—the Honorable Donald Comer, president of the Avondale Cotton Mills.

Donald Comer, the son of a great father, was born a leader.

His father was a leader and his father's fathers before him were distinguished leaders of their fellow men even in the earliest days of Alabama's history.

His father, B. B. Comer, was overwhelmingly elected Governor of our great State, in addition to having served as a United States Senator from Alabama.

Donald Comer has long been recognized as one of Alabama's greatest industrialists, owning and operating as he does a great many cotton mills throughout the State and which spin more than a quarter of a million bales of cotton a year.

Avondale Mills consumed nearly 33⅓ percent of all the cotton raised in Alabama, or to state it in another way, Avondale consumes not alone the 276,000 bales raised in the State of New Mexico, but additionally thereto, all of the cotton grown in the States of Virginia, Florida, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, and Nevada.

One of Alabama's most beloved citizens, he is recognized throughout his State as a leader, the driving power in everything that is right and good, and measures up to my concept of what in reality constitutes one of God's own noblemen.

I have known and I have worked with Donald Comer for more than 40 years. I know him as one who has more energy, more real ability, and more know-how of how to do things right than any man that I have ever known. Like all true southerners and great industrialist that he is, Donald Comer knows that the only wealth that annually comes into this world comes either out of the sea or out of the soil.

He knows that the farmers, planters, miners, and fishermen are the creators of all new wealth. Now, I am not saying that others do not add values by diverse processes and services—but unlike farmers, they do not produce.

Donald Comer loves the land almost as much as he loves his fellow man and life itself.

Noted for his philanthropies, he is a banker, educator, soldier, statesman, farmer, and humanitarian. When Donald Comer speaks, he gives emphasis to the power of fact. He states these things simply, lucidly, and fairly.

Colonel Hanson has just handed me a talk made by Donald Comer, on the future of cotton in the South, delivered before the Alabama Seedmen's Association at their annual meeting at Montgomery.

The long and well beloved friend of every cotton, peanut planter, vegetable grower, and orchardist in all the cotton South is Col. C. C. Hanson, secretary to the Association of Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, whose work in behalf of the cotton South is known to my every colleague in both Houses of Congress.

The subject of Mr. Comer's talk is without doubt the most important economic problem facing our Southland and certainly what he has to say on this subject is born of a ripened wisdom and a sagacity and knowledge which spring from a lifetime of effort spent in behalf of cotton farmers as well as improving the staple itself.

The thing that struck me as most remarkable about this talk was that it encompasses all problems of our cotton farmers. Moreover, he has set down in black and white the various observations, findings, and suggested solutions of those whose interests and particularly such of those whose findings had been enriched by experiences like unto his own.

He quotes eminent authorities, names names, tells of their accomplishments, their ambitions, their hopes, their contradictions, and their disappointments.

Let me quote but one of Donald Comer's observations. It is from an address by the Honorable FRANCES BOLTON, Republican Member of Congress from the great State of Ohio. This leading member of the Republican delegation is herself as equally distinguished in her understanding of economic trends and all of the humanities as Donald Comer himself.

Mr. Comer points out that FRANCES P. BOLTON at the annual meeting of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation, in discussing her subject, Parity Price Is an Economic, Not a Political Principle, spoke in part as follows:

> Read history and you will find that every human crisis, upheaval, panic, depression, recession, or what not that has ever even temporarily stopped or caused market distress to the financial structure and the progress of our country, has been directly traced to unjust pricing of agricultural products in these United States. This unjust system of pricing decreed that the annual crop was worth no more per unit than the value placed upon a needless surplus.
> TAKE FARM ECONOMICS OUT OF POLITICS—BOLTON
> It is not, perhaps, as simple as I am making it sound—for the moment is upon us when we must reevaluate existing methods and conditions. We must find ways to put these basically important matters clearly into the field of sound economic principle, where they belong. We must take them definitely out of politics.
> If we, as farmers, seek our own particular solutions with no thought of America as a whole, if industry or labor or white-collar worker looks after himself only, we shall find ourselves in a dead-end street instead of on that great road to freedom upon which destiny placed this Nation of ours.
> True as it is that America prospers in proportion to prosperity on the farms, it is no less true that unless America as a whole swings along with everything in balance, with all the instruments of her great symphony of freedom synchronized and in harmony, not only the people of America, but the people across the world will find themselves lost in an intolerable darkness.

Mr. Speaker, it behooves every American interested in the economic security of this great country, and it is almost incumbent upon every southern Member of this House, to read the remarkable paper prepared by Donald Comer, chairman of the board of Avondale Mills for presentation before the Alabama Seedmen's Association. I am certain they will find it one of the most thought-provoking documents that has ever been brought to their attention.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of these reasons that I am asking to extend my remarks and include therein the address of Donald Comer on the future of cotton in the South.

Mr. Comer's talk was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Alabama Seedmen's Association, friends and honored guests, I am happy to be here with you today and particularly happy to participate in your proceedings at this annual meeting, which as are all of your annual meetings of such vital import to our cotton planters.

I am, moreover, gratified to be here with you today in order to discuss the question of The Future of Cotton in the South which, as I have frequently emphasized, is not a southern but a truly national problem of first magnitude.

The growth of cotton is indigenous to our great Southland. While its cultivation and growth is foreign to all of the rich and luscious soils that abound in these United States above the Mason-Dixon line, the fact is that the vast acres in our Southern States which were cultivated to cotton last year, next year can go into wheat, into corn, peanuts, pasture, hay, and other fodder crops this year.

I need not point out to you, however, that were we to make the change from the cultivation of cotton to the cultivation of other row and field crops historically produced in the Northern States, that it would not alone mean more beef, pork, milk, butter and cheese, and more bread raised at home, but that less would be purchased from our neighboring States.

My friends, while it is true that down here in our south country the historic cultivation of cotton is natural to us all—it is equally true that our cotton planters today are progressing rapidly in the development of new methods of one kind or another for even more intensive cultivation and economic growth and harvest.

More than a million and a half families are now altogether dependent on farms that grow cotton. Mississippi grows cotton in 80 counties out of the 82 counties in the State, and moreover, half of all the cash from farm receipts in Mississippi are derived from the cultivation and growth of cotton.

With all of this in mind, it is indeed a startling fact that the statistics of the cash income from agricultural crops disclose that despite the fact that cotton in Mississippi is its most valuable farm crop, and that the year 1947 afforded the most valuable crop ever produced on record, that it afforded a gross receipt of but a mere $435 to each person living on a Mississippi farm.

HELP OURSELVES BY HELPING OTHERS

My friends, the duties of every one of us, whatever our respective vocations, businesses, or gainful employment might be, is first to achieve success in making his own endeavors fruitful and profitable to himself as well as to his fellow man.

As a cotton spinner I spend most of my time on problems directly concerned with the immediate success of Avondale or Cowikee Mills. But I try to remember there is another way, and a very important one, to improve my business, which is to be interested in and to help improve the business of the other fellow. If we could double the income of one and a half million cotton farm families, if we could double the income of all farm families, how greatly we could increase the use of cotton from the present 25 to 50 pounds per person annually.

When I speak of doubling the farm income, that does not mean doubling the price of cotton or whatever else the farmer raises.

The constant effort of the spinner is to give to the customer better values for less money and at the same time with better income for the spinners.

A PROSPEROUS AGRICULTURE INSURES STABLE ECONOMY

When agriculture is prosperous, the market is prosperous; when agriculture slows down, unemployment is present in every mine, every mill and every factory in the land. Statistics show that our national business always is approximately 7 times our national farm income. Statistics also show that our factory payrolls equal approximately our farm income. Therefore the imperative necessity of establishment and wise administration of a sound and enduring national farm program.

CONSTANT IMPROVEMENT THROUGH RESEARCH

Avondale Mills has given over $100,000 in the last few years of research institutes and laboratories in order that we might develop better and more attractive uses for cotton. In addition to this, our mills contribute 5 cents per bale for a general advertising program for new and increased uses of cotton. Most of this money, together with that which comes from farmers, ginners, and so forth, is handled by the National Cotton Council of Memphis.

The cotton spinner, together with the cottonseed crushers of Alabama and North Florida, offer yearly prizes for those communities who do the best job in improved quality of one variety of cotton, the Extension Service of Alabama to be the judge. It has been my pleasure to be present at the last 2 awards of these prizes. The prize money was spent for improved recreational facilities for the whole community, and this was as it should have been. Every one—men, women and children—had had a part in the effort.

We have heard it said that 60 percent of the 1949 Du Pont income was from products not produced 20 years ago. Edison turned the goldenrod into rubber, and no doubt we would be growing goldenrod today had not a cheaper way of making rubber from oil been found recently in Key West, Fla., at the Edison Memorial. I saw Edison's old car there with tires made from goldenrod rubber.

FARM CHEMURGY IMPORTANT

While we spent $200,000,000 to take care of the potato surplus, the Government only spent $69,000 in search of new uses for potatoes. Mr. Wheeler McMillan, president, National Farm Chemurgic Council, says, "No one has yet quite voiced such a slogan as 'billions for subsidies, chickenfeed for research.' I shall, however, venture to propose its reverse 'billions for research and eventually not one cent for subsidy.'"

Partly as a result of Congress being disappointed in the results of research work that has been accomplished under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946, the House Agriculture Committee appointed a study group. It is interesting that Mr. McMillan was a member of this committee and had as one of his assistants Mr. John L. Liles, agricultural economist of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta. They have just filed a very comprehensive report.

COTTON AND COMPETITION SYNONYMOUS

Cotton has many competitors and certainly every cotton farmer knows that he can't sit down forever and a day secure in a Government-pegged price. Here is a recent headline in a trade paper: "Burlap's Competitive Position in Bag Trade Strengthened by Advance Cost of Cotton." Bag manufacturers are the third largest consumers of cotton; automobiles and shirts are first and second.

We have got to get entirely away from 50-cent hoes in farming and move up to $1,000 tractors. If there is land that doesn't permit tractor use, perhaps it should be in pastures and pine trees.

The San Antonio (Tex.) Express said: "The late Dr. Charles Herty, chemurgist who originated the process, foresaw the day when the pine tree might succeed cotton as the South's No. 1 money crop. The time has arrived to make that prophecy come true."

A recent news item states that Alabama farmers are planting just exactly 495,000 acres less in cotton this year than they did in 1869.

In the 1949 international edition of the Cotton Trade Journal, under the heading, "A Task for Research," I discussed the need for more uniform length of fibers on each seed. A recent count showed there were 1,130 fibers on one cottonseed of the following varying lengths: 9 fibers, ¼ inch; 9 of ¼ inch; 9 of ⅛ inch; 37 of ½ inch; 119 of ⅝ inch; 350 of ¾ inch; 429 of ⅞ inch; and 168 measuring 1 inch.

COTTON AND RAYON

Every Avondale and Cowikee mill spindle can spin cut rayon just as easily as they can cotton. Rayon comes cut to the desired length and today we have customers asking us to change our product from cotton to rayon because rayon is cheaper.

The Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co., the United States Steel subsidiary of this section, have set a very fine example in this matter. Years ago when Mr. Gordon Crawford was president of this company, he established a department under Dr. M. F. Jackson for visiting rural sections of Alabama to help them standardize production and also help them to find markets. I think their first interest was in Johnson grass hay and cane sirup.

Mr. Crawford is long since dead but this program has continued and grown under his successors, Herbert Ryding, Lester Perry, and now under Robert Gregg. Dr. Jackson too is dead but his work, now in charge of Leroy Holt and Luther Fuller, with a staff of 11 men, has spread to include all Southeastern States from the Carolinas to Texas. This work is carried on in connection with State agricultural departments and our agricultural colleges.

You are in the seed business. I doubt whether cottonseed has ever been an appreciable part of your business because, as a rule, farmers save their own seed year after year, refreshing occasionally with new strains from seed breeders.

In wishing for your industry a continued growth, I hope that this increasing business year after year will be in clover seed, Caley pea seed, vetch, Dallis grass seed—seed that will keep our pastures green the year around. May I also add bicolor lespedeza to the list for our bobwhites.

Hugh McRae said "The South will come into its own when our fields are green in winter." May your business continue to grow and grow toward this end.

I would like to quote below some short extracts from recent statements by farm leaders.

COMMISSIONER M'DONALD FOR DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT

Commissioner of Agriculture J. E. McDonald, of Texas, continues to think a domestic-allotment arrangement will solve the cotton problem. He also says: "During the past 15 years the Congress of the United States has enacted national farm legislation and appropriated billions of dollars to stabilize agriculture. Nevertheless, today the Government has billions of the taxpayer's dollars tied up in surplus farm commodities and American farmers are confronted with production restrictions or Government regimentation which encourage foreign production and the surrender of foreign markets for our crops grown in excess of American needs."

Hon. Chester C. Davis, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, and first president of the AAA, speaking before the Twelfth Annual National Farm Institute, Des Moines, Iowa, February 17, 1950, said: "For I'm not sure that we've learned anything from 15 years of farm progress."

CHESTER DAVIS HITS PRICE FIXING BY LAW

"From the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 to now, emphasis has steadily shifted to price fixing by law. I think that is leading us down the wrong track.

"Government price supports and high level Government loans can help cushion the shock but they cannot and should not be expected to avert the adjustments that need to be made. We are living in a fool's paradise if we think otherwise. A system of rigid, legislated price supports extended indefinitely into the future and at levels higher than the over-all supply-demand situation will support, will have extremely undesirable consequences, including a great deal of harm to farmers themselves."

1950 ECONOMIC PEACE FOLLOWED BY 1952 HEADACHES SILLY—DAVIS

"It does no good to lull us to sleep in 1950 if in so doing you insure we will have something worse than a headache when we wake up in 1952, or 1953, or 1954.

"Next, I have the feeling that current programs of higher prices and income supports tend to freeze production patterns, to deemphasize adjustment as a goal of agricultural policy.

"By midsummer this year we will have doubled the Nation's population in 50 years—from 76,000,000 in 1900 to 152,000,000. We may be coming in sight of the time when rising living standards combined with population growth will put pressure on our ability to expand and maintain the needed production of milk and meat. I believe present farm programs fall short in encouragement to shifts that need to be made in land use to fit the demand pattern of tomorrow.

"Adjustments are still ahead of us and they will be particularly severe in the wheat and cotton areas. They will face us as soon as we quit sending out the dollars for which to pay for our exports. Our postwar farm programs do not recognize this fact right down to and including the Agricultural Act of 1949."

GUARANTEED PRICE SUPPORTS WRONG—DAVIS

"I do not agree with the idea that Government can or should guarantee price supports fixed at a level that will yield farmers in the aggregate a cash income from marketings equal in purchasing power to the average cash income from marketings in the decade 1938-48, and year by year thereafter maintain a level equal to the average of the first 10 of the 12 preceding years. It just can't be done, and that promise, along with the implied promise of low-priced food for consumers, is the fundamental weakness in the Brannan plan."

FOOD SUBSIDIES SHOULD BE SCRAPPED—DAVIS

"I didn't like the idea of general food subsidies during the war, and I like them less now. There's no good reason why nonagricultural workers can't and shouldn't produce enough goods and services to pay for agriculture's production without help from the Treasury.

"If labor leaders will make their followers realize that in the long run higher wages depend on increased production. Without it the wage increases are not real—and if management will deliver lower prices as volume grows, and will share fairly with labor and consumer the benefits of increased productivity, etc."

TEAMWORK IN ATTAINING HIGH LEVELS OF PRODUCTION NEEDED—DAVIS

"These are stubborn 'ifs,' but they are very important. Perhaps you say there isn't much agriculture can do about these things. Perhaps you think that kind of talk doesn't fit a farm institute. But I tell you these issues are fundamental to farm welfare. Many farm, business, and labor leaders have seen clearly the policy we must follow if our economy is to function. Teamwork in attaining and holding a high level of production is necessary if we are to develop the full economic life required of this Nation."

CONGRESSWOMAN BOLTON'S FARM SPEECH CITED

In an address by Hon. FRANCES P. BOLTON, M. C., before the annual meeting of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation, Columbus, Ohio, November 29, 1949, on the subject Parity Price Is an Economic, Not a Political Principle, she says:

"Read history and you will find that every human crisis, upheaval, panic, depression, recession, or what not that has ever even temporarily stopped or caused market distress to the financial structure and the progress of our country, has been directly traced to unjust pricing of agricultural products in these United States. This unjust system of pricing decreed that the annual crop was worth no more per unit than the value placed upon a needless surplus.

TAKE FARM ECONOMICS OUT OF POLITICS—BOLTON

"It is not, perhaps, as simple as I am making it sound—for the moment is upon us when we must reevaluate existing methods and conditions. We must find ways to put these basically important matters clearly into the field of sound, economic principle, where they belong. We must take them definitely out of politics.

"If we, as farmers, seek our own particular solutions with no thought of America as a whole, if industry or labor or white-collar worker looks after himself only, we shall find ourselves in a dead-end street instead of on that great road to freedom upon which destiny placed this Nation of ours.

"True as it is that America prospers in proportion to prosperity on the farms, it is no less true that unless America as a whole swings along with everything in balance, with all the instruments of her great symphony of freedom synchronized and in harmony, not only the people of America, but the people across the world, will find themselves lost in an intolerable darkness."

THE SOUTH LOOKS AHEAD

Dr. Paul W. Chapman, associate dean, college of agriculture, University of Georgia, before the 1950 annual conference advertising staff of the Progressive Farmer at Point Clear, Ala., on the subject the South Looks Ahead, 1950-60, said: "2,240,000 electrified farms in the South—a 10-year increase of 1,820,000. Of the 4,863,266 farm consumers listed in the report, 48 percent were located in 14 Southern States.

"Cash farm income: During the favorable years for farming that have existed since 1942, the South has made great gains in cash farm income. In 1943 it reached $5,000,000,000 and by 1948 had risen to the all-time high of $8,250,000,000. Since 1940 the gain in cash farm income for the Nation has been 233 percent; for the South it has been 272 percent.

"Gains in farm management and operation: Gains in farm owner-operators have been going forward faster in the South than in other sections of the Nation. There is a marked decline in tenants and sharecroppers. From 1930 45, 286,000 more owner-operators; 951,000 less tenants and sharecroppers.

"Crop production is being balanced with animal production; breeding stock is being increased on southern farms faster than in other sections of the Nation.

"Most important of all in relation to soil conservation and livestock profits, feed production is keeping pace with gains in animal population. Many Southern States are organizing 100-bushel corn clubs; Georgia has inducted 200 members in 2 years. Major emphasis is being placed on the development of improved pasture."

ALABAMA NEEDS MORE TRACTOR POWER—P. O. DAVIS

Mr. P. O. Davis, director of extension for Alabama, recently wrote me:

"In talking to the bankers at the university last week I emphasized additional financial needs for our changing agriculture in Alabama. I reminded them, for example, that:

"Stated differently, mule power and equipment per crop acre was valued at $18.74; tractor power and equipment, $43.72.

"By multiplying this $48.72 per acre by the number (8,500,000) of cropland acres we have in Alabama, we get an idea of how much real money is needed to fully mechanize Alabama farms. Of course, a considerable amount has been done, but not near enough for efficient and proper operation.

"Mechanization and pasture fertilizer are only two major examples of big financial needs for Alabama's changing agriculture. For example, to prepare land, buy seed and fertilizer, and plant an acre of alfalfa calls for $30 to $50, and we should, but won't, plant a million acres this year.

"To buy livestock on a big scale big money is needed. Dairy cows are costing $150 to more than $200 each. And homes and fences are expensive. So the story goes."

WHEELER M'MILLEN COMPARES POTATOES TO BUGGIES

Mr. Wheeler McMillen, president of the National Farm Chemurgic Council, opening the Fifteenth National Farm Chemurgic Conference March 29, 1950, Hotel Statler, Washington, on the subject Green Frontiers said:

"The photograph which I hold up for your view is a picture of a buggy. For those of you who do not know this object from experience I might explain that a buggy is a horse-drawn vehicle which was used for the transportation of human beings in those days of antiquity which preceded the motor age.

"The market for buggies began to decline when low-priced automobiles became available to the general public. The manufacturers in the industry discovered they had a buggy problem. They could make more buggies than the public demanded. In those medieval times there was no such thing as parity for buggies. There was no Government system of buggy price supports, flexible or nonflexible.

"Some of the buggy manufacturers went into the automobile business where they made a great deal of money and created large numbers of new jobs. The automobile was better than the buggy. Vast new stores of purchasing power were created by the enterprise which supplied the demand. Consequently today a higher proportion of American families enjoy automobiles than ever owned buggies.

"The object I now hold in my hand is a potato. The potato is agriculture's 1950 model buggy. The potato manufacturers are producing more of this model than the public demands."

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF CROP PLANTING ALWAYS DISASTROUS—M'MILLEN

"This situation has arisen at a juncture in time when people have been led to expect impossible things from Government. The administration of Government has been bitterly and raucously criticized for what it has done about potatoes. Much of this criticism has been entirely unjustified and nearly all of it has completely missed its proper mark. Government should not be criticized only for having engaged in an effort which has proved less than successful. Government can fairly be criticized for having attempted to do something entirely beyond the capacity of Government to accomplish.

"You could give a giraffe a license to drive an automobile. You could give a giraffe permission to take your car onto the highways. Neither a license nor the permission would enable him to drive the car. Such a performance would be entirely beyond his capacity. No giraffe was ever cut out by nature to become a chauffeur.

"Neither is it within the capabilities of government to direct the planting of crops or to determine the price at which they shall be sold. Every such attempt in history has come to an unsuccessful end, usually to the accompaniment of disaster.

"Industry and government alike rest forever uneasy in apprehension of depression. Agriculture today shudders in the fear of accumulated surpluses."

NEW CROPS AND NEW USES REMEDY FOR SURPLUSES—M'MILLEN

"Give industry an ever-expanding economy and it will not fear depression. Give Government a sufficiently expanding economy and it can pay its debts out of production. Give agriculture enough new crops and enough uses for its products, and surpluses will not reappear. Remove the specter of surpluses from agriculture and an ever-expanding economy will give us ever-expanding industry and a first-class chance to save American freedom for future generations."

NATIONAL GRANGE FARM PROGRAM DISCUSSED

In the National Grange, May number, there is printed the Grange farm program from which I quote:

"Fifth, some production controls either through marketing quotas or acreage allotments. While we do not like either, we recognize that they may be necessary, if fixed supports are to be used, and possibly in some cases with flexible supports. We prefer the marketing quota to the acreage allotment because the marketing quota is reasonably manageable while the acreage allotment is too easily evaded, resulting in little or no production control whatever. As an example, some years ago the acreage of cotton was cut to half, but farmers laid aside their poorest acres, poured fertilizer on the remainder, and many raised more cotton than they did before the cut. In most crops, we consider both devices as emergency in character, to be used only in extreme cases where it is necessary to make rapid substantial readjustments in production. Marketing quotas and acreage allotments are, therefore, accepted as a fifth general class of measures which we would make available but we would put them near the bottom of the list in order of preference."

KEEP AGRICULTURE INDEPENDENT OF TREASURY PAYMENTS—GRANGE

Sixth, and at the bottom of the list, we would make production payments available only as an emergency measure. We do not want to see agriculture dependent upon Treasury payments for its existence, not only because of its effect on agriculture, but we believe that it would be economically unsound. We do not want to see farmers reduced to the uncertainty of income based upon the annual action of Congress. We do not want to see farmers reduced to the political necessity of voting for the candidate who would promise the biggest and best raids on the Federal Treasury. We do not want to see the Government paying a portion of the food bill of American consumers, rich and poor alike, with an unknown drain on the taxpayers which would inevitably result in inflation similar to that which has brought so much economic distress to so many European nations, making the rich richer and the poor poorer. We do not want to see the widespread regimentation of farmers that would follow, with the hordes of public employees necessary to administer such a program. Nevertheless, we feel that in periods of emergency or adjustment it may be necessary to use such payments to meet a condition which could not be met in any other way, provided such payments are safeguarded by a definite order of preference to be used in connection with the recommendations of the Federal Farm Commission. We believe that such a provision should be available for use, but should not be used until it was clear that other means would not suffice. We feel that it would be a serious mistake, and would go a long way toward destroying the incentive for farmers to develop self-help, self-supporting programs, if production payments were made the main reliance for meeting the farm problems.

COMPARATIVE STATISTICAL REFERENCES

Following are a few statistics:

In 1930 viscose staple rayon was 60 cents and cotton was 13 cents per pound. In August 1949, rayon was 35 cents and cotton was 31 cents.

Our annual exports of cotton: 1925–30, 8,251,000 bales; 1930–35, 7,244,000 bales; 1935–40, 5,300,000 bales.

During those same periods foreign-mill consumption increased from: 1925-30, 18,400,000 bales; 1930–35, 18,740,000 bales; 1935–40, 21,600,000.

During those same periods cotton production in foreign lands was: 1925–30, 10,660,000; 1930–35, 11,680,000 bales; 1935-40, 16,780,000 bales.

The average foreign production of rayon: 1926 30, 256,000,000 pounds; 1936–40, 1,610,000,000 pounds.

In 1941 foreign rayon production reached the equivalent of 5,280,000 bales of cotton.

From the prewar period there were two trends—first, the decline in the foreign market for United States cotton. Second, this decline was offset by increase of the foreign market for foreign-produced cotton and rayon. Today there is a demand for synthetic fiber beyond home production and we are importing rayon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I commend the reading of two articles I am today inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to all those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In my opinion Senator JOHNSON is performing a most worthwhile service for our Nation as the chairman of his subcommittee referred to in these articles.

[From the Fort Worth Press of September 8, 1950]

THE TEXAS LISTENING POST—SENATOR JOHNSON SCORES DEFENSE SIESTA

(By Norton McGiffin)

The special Senate subcommittee headed by LYNDON B. JOHNSON, of Texas, is getting down to work and putting some of the military and the defense planners on a hot griddle. The group, which includes four Democrats and three Republicans, criticizes sharply the "siesta psychology" of those in charge of national preparedness.

Senator JOHNSON is an excellent choice for leadership of the committee. He was a member of the House Armed Services Committee and is on the companion body in the Senate. Furthermore, the Senator is not afraid to speak out. It looks as though he will let the chips fall where they may.

One of the proposals of the committee is to reactivate the synthetic rubber-producing facilities of the country. In view of the fact that we are already at war, or at least in what passes for one, it seems strange that such steps should not have been taken long ago. But the executive branch needs prodding from the legislative branch.

To show how much asleep some governmental agencies are, the subcommittee, under Senator JOHNSON'S leadership, has prevailed on the administration to stop the sale of a synthetic rubber plant at Akron, Ohio, and order an increase of 80,000 tons in synthetic rubber capacity.

The incredible thing, to me, is that the administration has to be needled into such common-sense arrangements by the Senate subcommittee. The Johnson group is upset because the military is blithely continuing to sell surplus military goods. There's a war on, or is there?

The "complacency on the Potomac" to quote the report of the subcommittee is staggering. Apparently the motto of the Munitions Board and others is "business as usual." The subcommittee accused the Air Force of selling airplane engines and equipment at Robins Air Base in Georgia. The Air Force denied the charge, and the subcommittee produced newspaper ads to prove its point.

A lot of us have long maintained that the military should not buy or sell its equipment because there isn't a CPA in the lot. No general is adequate to act as a purchasing or dispensing agent, because no general is at heart an economizer. That's why we need a committee like the Johnson group to check and double-check.

[From the Houston Post of September 8, 1950]

SIESTA PSYCHOLOGY

In its first report, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON'S subcommittee investigating national preparedness delivers some haymakers at the Defense Department and the Munitions Board for failing to revise policies with respect to the disposition of surplus material and defense plants in the light of conditions created by the Korean war. Officials were charged with a siesta psychology, and with neglecting precautions which the subcommittee feels to be of urgent necessity in view of the possible spread of the conflict to other areas.

That Federal agencies have been slow to adjust themselves to the new turn of affairs is no secret. The trouble may be due to the highly complicated governmental structure in which one part may not know what the other part is doing. For instance, the committee report tells of the Armed Forces holding bargain sales of needed materials while simultaneously buying the same things on the open market at nonbargain prices. It charges that five defense plants have been sold or put on sale since the Korean crisis, some of them without provision for prompt return to the Government in case of need.

Much of the report deals with rubber. The subcommittee was unable to find out what, if anything, was being done to encourage the cultivation of natural rubber in the Western Hemisphere, and called for a sharp increase in the stockpiling of the natural product together with a full reactivation of the Nation's synthetic rubber industry. It claims credit for having halted the sale of an Ohio plant, and said its efforts had resulted in stepping up synthetic rubber production from 462,500 tons to 755,000 tons.

Government rubber policy, the subcommittee properly holds, should be directed to insure a continuous supply of rubber on a long-term basis as well as to provide for possibly military needs. The points made in the report have a strong common-sense appeal. Sales of surplus property should be stopped abruptly, stocks should be promptly inventoried to ascertain what is on hand and what may be needed, and there should be a more imaginative and foresighted effort in the stockpiling of critical defense items.

International Whirligig

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article that was released by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate on August 26 and 27, and written by Mr. John Fisher. The article follows:

INTERNATIONAL WHIRLIGIG—RESIGNATION OF DIPLOMATS BARES EXTENT OF TERRORIZATION OF POLAND; RUSSIANS CONTROL ARMY, POLICE TO KEEP PATRIOTS IN SUBJECTION

(By John Fisher)

Resignations of Polish Embassy attachés in Washington, who sacrificed their careers rather than obey orders to return home, are unimpeachable evidence of Communist terror in their fatherland.

All of Malik's booster talk about happiness and freedom under the Red flag is exposed as bunk by these fear-haunted diplomats, who are in the best position to know the whole truth about conditions behind the iron curtain.

Their self-preservation act follows previous withdrawals by Dr. Aleksander Rudzinski, United Nations Polish legal counselor, and 25 other Polish officials, who cut themselves adrift rather than be a party to delivering their countrymen into complete Soviet bondage.

The spirit of independence in Poland is being ruthlessly snuffed out. Certain Marxist leaders like Gomulka had hoped that by eagerly championing orthodox Leninism, Poland would be allowed a token share of political and economic independence. But they were accused of Titoism and silenced.

CRINGING COPY OF RUSSIA

Today the proudest and strongest Russian satellite is being whipped into the role of a cringing Soviet lackey, its entire system of living a mere copy of the oppressive Russian system. It even suffers the ignominy of being the only Moscow puppet in which a Russian, Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky, has been forced into its national politburo.

Poland right now is a key factor in the tense European military situation. Her flat plains are a pathway into Russia; her airfields, steppingstones. If the country were in rebellion, an assault of the Soviet frontier would have a better chance of success.

But in the event of a Russian attack on Berlin and west Germany, the Poles, though the most anti-Russian of all satellites, are still anti-German—even the non-Communists—and they might side with Russia as in the last two wars.

At present Stalin is trying both the carrot and stick—mostly the stick—to woo Poland into doing his will. He ordered a speed-up in collectivization of farms on the exact pattern of Soviet agriculture.

Out of a peasant population of 15,000,000, only 200,000 are Communist Party members. Angry farmers hid their seed grain and smashed government tractors. Warsaw used violence to beat down the resistance of prosperous farmers. Posters were displayed in rural areas quoting Lenin: "Rely on the poor peasant. Fight the kulak."

PUNISHMENT FOR NOT WORKING

A new 5-year plan was inaugurated on July 22, Regeneration Day, the sixth anniversary of the birth of the notorious Russian-Polish Government. Its objective is to expand agriculture, trade, building, and industry.

To approach the preposterous production targets, workers toil long hours and finally stay away from work from sheer exhaustion. In an effort to combat absenteeism, Warsaw recently enacted Socialist labor "discipline" laws, copied from the Soviet labor code, with heavy fines and imprisonment for tardiness or truancy.

A revived anti-American campaign is based on obtaining signatures to the Stockholm peace petition outlawing the atomic bomb. Warsaw maintains that 18,000,000 names already have been collected.

Local police went from door to door offering bewildered residents the choice of signing or facing arrest as the secret agents of American imperialists. President Bierut told signature collectors to call attention to the criminal United States attack on peaceful Korea as a persuasive argument.

WORK UP HATRED OF AMERICANS

Hilary Minc, Vice Premier and Politburo member, ranted, "These [American] successors of Hitler are carrying on armed intervention in Korea and are arguing when and where to drop the A-bomb." A Warsaw paper reported, "American soldiers are committing unbelievable atrocities on Korean prisoners." No lie is passed up if it can be used to make Poles hate Americans.

The organized underground no longer engages in large-scale revolt because retaliation against innocent families follows. But small desperate groups pay off old scores with the police. Arrests are frequent. One of the methods employed by the UB (secret police) is to quiz a suspect about his own subversive activities or those of his neighbor. His fingers are placed in a door jamb. If he fails to give the desired answers, the door is pressed.

Military tribunals are still sentencing victims to 30-year prison terms or to death for outbreaks against the Communist authorities. Many other trials are held in camera. Relatives of the condemned rarely know the fate of their loved ones until months afterward—sometimes never.

So far as fearing war with the United States, the Polish peasants would welcome war as their only means of escape from the Red terror.

HOLDS FIRM CONTROL

Marshal Rokossovsky is the real boss of Poland. He not only holds the power in the Politburo, he also commands an army of 350,000 troops and a security police force of 120,000. The army organization now exactly duplicates the Soviet set-up so that the Polish Army can be swiftly geared in with the Russian armed forces in case of war.

High-ranking career officers have been removed. Young officers, trained in Soviet tactics and ideologies in Russian military academies, now run the Polish Military Establishment.

Moscow recently made a bid to bind the troops to Stalin by compelling the east German Red government to recognize the Oder-Neisse frontier, which leaves 44,000 square miles of former German territory in Polish hands. Nearly all Poles, whether Communist or not, want to keep these provinces, rich in farms, factories, and mines.

If later the double-crossing Kremlin seeks to gain German favor, it can repudiate the present sell-out agreement and promise Germany that those lost lands will be restored. Of course, almost everyone in Poland would be enraged by the bargain. But by that time Marshal Rokossovsky will have such a stranglehold on both the army and the police that revolt or even protests would be futile.

Poland is not entirely subdued. But it is so much of a giant slave colony that Polish diplomats, who have tasted American freedom, prefer exile to returning home.

Justice for Crawford

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in view of certain statements which have been made over the radio and in the press in the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan, as well as in the city of San Juan, P. R., I wish to submit for the RECORD, an editorial which was published in El Imparcial, a Puerto Rican daily newspaper, under date of September 7, 1950:

JUSTICE FOR CRAWFORD

Congressman FRED CRAWFORD is facing political difficulties in his district in Saginaw, Mich., because of the controversy between the beet harvesters and the Puerto Rican farm hands, 5,000 of whom are moving to that State to help with its beet harvest. This controversy, with which we have not extensively occupied ourselves, is on the way toward a solution, raising the pay and the living conditions of the workers in accordance with the terms arrived at.

CRAWFORD collaborated in the plan—at least he supported it—to gather the beet harvest with the aid of Puerto Rican workers. To be sure, the beet harvesters should be grateful to the veteran legislator of Michigan. It is unfair that because the harvesters did not from the beginning meet all the terms of the work contract with the farm hands, CRAWFORD should become a political victim of incomprehensibility in his own State. It seems to us that Congressman CRAWFORD has not received the fair deal which should be given an active and indefatigable politician, with a long list of services rendered his State.

We say this because CRAWFORD is, in the truest sense of the word, not an object of devotion so far as we are concerned, but, as we have felt toward all politicians, we are incapable of lending our support to the injustice against him. His position with regard to Puerto Rico has not always been a correct one, and there have been frequent discrepancies between his point of view and ours. However, we would not be able to deny that his intervention, for one reason or another, has always been wholesome.

Neither should they criticize in Michigan CRAWFORD'S interest and participation in the problem of the Territories and possessions. The voters of Michigan, which is a civilized and democratic region, should feel proud of CRAWFORD'S record in the Congress, which outlined and strengthened the policy of friendship and fraternization regarding the territories by which he has rendered a valuable service to the North American Nation. His State should understand that it is an honor to have a man who occupies an important position, and who is respected for it, in the Congress of the United States. It would be foolish to exchange him for any kind of beginner without proper justification for such action. It would mean the loss of his great experience, his wide connections, and the commitment of an injustice against a Member of Congress who has known to lend sparkle to his office.

The Primaries in Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in view of what has heretofore been said in the press and over the radio in the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan, as well as in Puerto Rico, I wish to submit for the RECORD, an editorial which appeared in El Mundo, a Puerto Rican publication, under date of September 15, 1950:

THE PRIMARIES IN MICHIGAN

The Representative, FRED CRAWFORD, won the Republican nomination in the district that he represents in the State of Michigan.

CRAWFORD has been for many years in the House of Representatives of the United States, elected by his fellow-citizens at Saginaw. It had been said that in these times he was confronted with the most difficult situation in his political career, since his opponent, attorney Robert J. Curry, had made an intense campaign.

Part of this intense campaign against CRAWFORD had been in pointing out that said Congressman spent more time in the defense of Puerto Rican matters in the Congress than he spent in taking care of the matters of his constituents of Michigan.

Such accusation was an exaggeration, since, although it is true that this Congressman has been among those most occupied with Puerto Rican matters in Washington, it cannot be maintained that the larger part of his time was spent in these matters.

We are happy that his ties with Puerto Rico were not the cause of a defeat. The judgment of the Saginaw electors in giving him a new indorsement indicates that such allegations had no adverse weight in the mind of the voters.

On the contrary, if the result of the elections can be interpreted in any form, it is to affirm that the electors of that congressional district recognize as a legitimate and proper activity of their Representative that he interest himself in Puerto Rican matters.

Truly, that is a responsibility that all persons elected to Congress assume, since the welfare of this island depends in a great part, by the force of political reality, on the actions of the Congress. Puerto Rico is part of the group of the congressional responsibilities, as are the Armed Forces, the atomic bomb, the tax policy, the civil rights, and so many other important matters that are apparently far away from the interests or local preoccupations of the districts that elect the Representatives.

Mr. CRAWFORD, on knowing the results of the primaries, hastened to affirm that, if he were elected in the November elections, as is expected, he will continue his actions in favor of the island. "I will continue in my attempts to aid the Puerto Ricans," he stated, "in all that I can."

Puerto Rico and its people need good friends in the Congress. Mr. CRAWFORD, on past occasions, has interested himself in matters of the country, and, in general terms, it can be stated that the island owes much to him for his intervention and actions.

We are happy that, after the primaries, he remains in the same frame of mind and is disposed to continue cooperating in the insular benefit.

We hope this is so.

It is just that the country be grateful for the attitude assumed by Representative CRAWFORD.

Miracle on the Vistula

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a letter received by my distinguished colleague from Illinois, THOMAS GORDON, from the Honorable Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State, as well as Congressman GORDON'S letter to me. The letters follow:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE.
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1950.
Hon. THOMAS S. GORDON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GORDON: I want to thank you for taking part in the Voice of America's special broadcast to Poland on August 15, commemorating the Miracle on the Vistula.

I want to tell you, too, how encouraged I am to hear that within a few days after your broadcast you had mail from Poland telling how well it was received and expressing gratitude that the Polish people have friends in the United States, such as yourself, who have their interests at heart.

I am sure that there is going to be a similar response, in the form of letters addressed to the Voice itself, to the message you delivered to the Polish people.

Your experience, I might add, typifies the reaction of people behind the iron curtain to the Voice of America broadcasts. They look to us for the truth and, despite the risks usually involved, often try to express their thanks for our broadcasts. Fugitives from the captive areas tell us that Voice of America broadcasts were a major factor in persuading them to flee.

Our letters—we are now getting as many as 29,000 a month from all over the world—indicate that we have a large and growing audience and that our broadcasts are helping to convince people everywhere that the United States is interested in their welfare.

Thank you once again for your interest and your assistance in the program.

Sincerely yours,
EDWARD W. BARRETT,
Assistant Secretary.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1950.
Hon. DANIEL J. FLOOD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DAN: Enclosed find a letter I have received from Assistant Secretary of State, the Honorable Edward W. Barrett, who is in charge of the Voice of America program.

As I told you, I made the broadcast referred to, on August 15, commemorating the Miracle on the Vistula.

The other day, I received a letter from a relative of mine, whom I have never seen, advising me that some of his friends in the same city where he resides, Braumburg, Poland, which is about 90 miles from Warsaw, the capital city, heard my broadcast and were delighted to hear my words commemorating this great event in Poland, which in former years was a national holiday, but now is suppressed by the new regime.

I made other broadcasts last year and received quite a number of letters praising the remarks I made, which gave them a little hope that America had not forgotten them in their days of trial. These courageous people took a lot of chances by writing me.

With kind personal regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,
TOM.

Peat Is a Valuable Resource of Minnesota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I think all of the Members of this House can agree that the development and productive use of our natural resources is of utmost importance at this stage of our national growth. Both great political parties of the United States have always supported efforts to bring the benefits of modern science to undeveloped areas rich in untapped resources.

Throughout the country we have made notable progress in turning our resources into materials, business, and jobs needed for our economic well-being and national security. But there are still new possibilities for the development of resources that have been neglected, among them the immense deposits of good quality peat throughout the United States.

In my own State, Minnesota, there are 5,000,000 acres of peat land with excellent quality peat deposits of 7,000,000,000 tons. This is over one-half of the national peat supply, though deposits are found extensively in Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Washington, Alabama, New Jersey, Ohio, Florida, Georgia, and many other States.

Because of the remarkable beginning made in peat research, I supported the gentleman from Minnesota, Hon. FRED MARSHALL, when he recently asked the House to seriously study the legislation he has introduced to encourage further research and development of peat production for both industrial and agricultural uses.

The supplementary bills, H. R. 7330 and H. R. 7574, would authorize vitally needed research into the use of peat as a fuel in the generation of electrical power and its usefulness as a source of valuable industrial byproducts and would authorize loans to private business by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the utilization of peat and its byproducts.

The best possible use of this great resource is important to the economic growth and security of our country. It is not a matter of political partisanship any more than any of our other resources. We are all interested in making the best possible use of our resources for the best interest of all of our people.

I therefore feel that we should meet this problem with a common spirit of cooperation to find the most effective method of developing our peat deposits and the related byproducts. In a recent report to the Bureau of Mines, 19 States reported peat production largely for agricultural uses, but this is negligible compared to the industrial uses already indicated in our own research and in the experience of other countries which have been more advanced in the development of peat.

In Minnesota it is imperative that we have an adequate supply of low-cost fuel to be used in the generation of electrical power, particularly since we can be very nearly isolated from fuel or power sources because of our geographical location. This is an element of both strategic and economic danger. The vulnerability of long overland and overwater hauls of fuel for power and heat are obvious. Other States in the Midwest and central United States are facing a similar threat.

At the same time, lack of low-cost fuel and low-cost power has hampered the development of many areas that are the sources of materials necessary to industry and commerce. Peat lands in the United States have been considered wastelands and have retarded the economic growth of those areas where they exist in large quantities.

By taking advantage of the scientific progress in the use of peat and peat byproducts, we can help the poor counties and the poor areas of our States to help themselves and we can do this without interfering in any way with the industrial developments already made.

As some of my friends from Minnesota in this House have already pointed out, American and European research has already found peat a source of numberless valuable byproducts which can be produced cheaply simply because they are byproducts of the peat being processed for fuel for power-generating purposes. It is a source of industrial chemicals like ammonia, methyl alcohol, acetic acids, cresols, and furfural. It has been used in the manufacturing of paper, textiles, brick, surgical dressings, benzine, and various exploded or artificial woods.

What other byproducts can be found will be determined by the development of a strong peat industry and new technological schemes and methods. In some States private producers are already using it extensively for fertilizers, insulation, and packing materials. As a low-cost fuel in power generation and as a source of valuable byproducts, it can be readily seen that a good, sound peat industry in the underdeveloped areas in Minnesota and the United States will be a major contribution to economic growth and to national defense.

It is because of these facts that I again urge members of both parties to work together in achieving a common method of developing this resource which might well be a hidden treasure in what we called wasteland.

The Why of Minnesota's Northwest Angle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, at times during these hectic days I have found myself thinking of one of the truly great wilderness areas of our Nation.

I refer to the Northwest Angle country of Minnesota—an area of 80,000 acres. This great region of real solitude is accessible in summer only by foot, by water or by air, or over ice in winter. Furthermore, there are no telephones.

I need not remind you who live in the West or have spent your vacations in the great mountain and lake regions, of their beauty and grandeur; of the true relaxation and rest which one can enjoy; and of the fine fishing and hunting.

Time will not permit me to continue, but, I hope that each of you will read the historical article by William Heritage in the further extension of my remarks, and that all who can do so will come to Minnesota when this session of Congress adjourns and come to the Angle country for a real vacation. If you prefer, you can enjoy the pleasures of the modern hotels and resorts in many of the other magnificent areas of one of the Nation's great vacation States, marvelous Minnesota.

The following article about the Northwest Angle country will be of interest I am sure. It is entitled "The Why of Minnesota's Northwest Angle" by William Heritage and it appeared in the Blackduck (Minn.) American on April 21, 1949:

THE WHY OF MINNESOTA'S FAMOUS NORTHWEST ANGLE

(By William Heritage)

Many people when looking at a map of Minnesota wonder why a block of some 80,000 acres of this State is separated from the main body by some 12 miles, and almost wholly surrounded by Canada.

This area, known as the Northwest Angle has a population of some 100 persons; has no roads or telephones; is accessible to the main portion of the State in summer only by foot through Manitoba, by water or by air or over ice in winter. Three post offices are located on the Northwest Angle. The first real fur trading post in Minnesota was located here, being built in 1732 and operated for some 7 years.

In 1875, upon completion by the Canadian Government of the Dawson Trail, a stage line was maintained from Winnipeg to Northwest Angle which was located on United States soil, and had a population of more than 500. A steamer ran from there to Fort Francis and it is reported that 2,700 people used this route that year, 800 of whom were immigrants.

Ben Franklin was a man of great foresight and when he represented this country in negotiations of the Treaty of 1783 with Great Britain, he insisted that boundary should be located through Lake of the Woods, "to the most northwestern point thereof, and thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi."

The map of 1755 which Franklin used, showed a stream running into the north end which is really the outlet and Rainy River is shown running into Lake Superior.

During the next 35 years many negotions between the two countries were had in an effort to reach an agreement as to the boundary west of Lake of the Woods. The convention of October 13, 1818, provided that the forty-ninth standard parallel should be the boundary and the most northwestern point of Lake of the Woods should connect with this parallel by due north or south line as the case may be.

The following treaties and conventions between the two countries have been entered into in determining this part of the international boundary:

Treaty of 1783, Treaty of 1815, Convention of 1818, Treaty of October 13, 1842, Treaty of April 11, 1908, and the Treaty of July 17, 1925.

Major Long of the United States Army visited the Lake of the Woods in 1819 after he marked the forty-ninth parallel at Pembina (he made a mistake of about a mile and a half and located the point too far south), but he was unable to locate any point that appeared to properly mark the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods.

The first United States Boundary Commission visited this lake in July 1823 but reported they were unable to find any well-marked topographic feature entitled to be called the most northwestern point.

David Thompson was appointed the chief astronomer for the British Boundary Survey and was commissioned to locate parts of the international boundary in 1823. He arrived at Lake of the Woods in 1824 and built a series of log cribs filled with rock in Angle Inlet leading to what he considered wa the most northwestern point, after he and his party had built up this map.

The next summer he returned to Lake of the Woods with the chief astronomer of Great Britain, Dr. Tiark. After Dr. Tiark looked the lake over he adopted a point about 1 mile north of the location determined by David Thompson the year before by using the following formula: If a line whose bearing is exactly northeast and southwest be passed westwardly over the surface of the lake, on paper, that point of the main shore which is last cut will be the point required.

In 1872, Captain Twining, chief astronomer for the United States Boundary Survey was instructed to locate the boundary from the most northwestern point to the forty-ninth parallel. He spent 3 weeks trying to find the monument set in 1824. As the lake had been raised 8 feet by the construction of a dam at Rat Portage (now Kenora) which completely changed the surface of lake at this point, he was unable to locate it. Finally, an Indian showed him the remains of the monument.

He then surveyed the west boundary of the angle a distance of 17 miles, marking the line for 9 miles by setting cast-iron posts about 5 feet high marked United States on the east side, and Canada on the west side.

In 1902, the angle was subdivided by G. L. O. Surveyor E. J. Mulligan.

In 1912, 1917, and 1925 the international boundary was resurveyed and well marked by the International Boundary Commission, made up of engineers of both countries.

Because of errors in Mitchell's map of 1755, used by Franklin while negotiating the treaty of 1783, Minnesota has this area projecting into Canada and completely separated from the main body of the State by a distance of over 12 miles.

The Gentleman From Georgia, Mr. Davis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN PACE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I have been pleased and deeply impressed by the type of service and devotion to duty exhibited by the Honorable JAMES C. DAVIS, Representative in Congress from the Fifth District of Georgia.

He has served here only a short time, now concluding his second term, but I venture the assertion that no Member has ever moved forward more rapidly in gaining and meriting the respect and esteem of the leadership and Members of the House or in proving his worth in service to his country, our State, and the people of his district. He is a constant source of pride to the Georgia delegation in Congress.

It is also pleasing to me to know that his home people share our pride and confidence. A slight evidence of this is shown by the following comment by Walter Reiman in his column, Talking It Over, published in the September 14 issue of the De Kalb New Era:

The present Congress is to be congratulated for taking its privileges and duty seriously. Let's never see in America again the woeful rubber-stamp salary-drawers of the past.

Very fortunately for you, your own Representative JAMES C. DAVIS has taken a leading stand for Congress to remain on the job constantly. Once again he has stood up forthrightly, we believe, for the best interests of the Nation, as so many of his addresses before Congress have pointed up, and so many of his votes on legislation show with Fabian socialistic tactics undermining his party.

On July 27, as he addressed the Congress, pleading with them not to adjourn, he proved again his interest in behalf of the Nation—a Nation now facing a war emergency and a future hope of remaining free.

"Go home to what?" Representative DAVIS asked his colleagues. "To see the question written upon the faces of everyone we meet upon the streets, even though they may not ask it with their lips, 'What are you doing to win this war? What are you doing to prevent the Korean War from breaking out into world war III; what are you doing to protect us from Communists and fellow-travelers who are foot-loose and unhampered here in the United States?'"

KEEP POWERS BALANCED

Representative DAVIS underscored the point that any such plan of adjournment would carry with it the implication that Congress would transfer the obligation and responsibilities which properly belong to Congress onto the shoulders of the President "by voting to him supreme authority over the civilian as well as the military—to unload all responsibility upon him, and escape our own, when we vote to adjourn and go home."

And: "Have we come to the point where it is fitting for Members of Congress in effect to say: 'I am of no value at the seat of Government in time of emergency. The proper course for me to take is to vote my powers into the Executive and go home.'"

A major question, we believe: Should we as a people, accepting the methods of dictatorships, allow the degradation of dictated people to sap our strength—our greatest strength?

Representative DAVIS reminded his fellow Congressmen that "there is plenty of legislative work * * * to do."

Among other things, he said, Congress should stay in session to perfect and enact legislation to provide universal military training "that is sorely needed." And "to confine Communists where they will be unable to sabotage our industries, to wreck our public utilities, and to aid Russia * * * (and laws) to enable us to properly supervise, control, or confine the fellow-travelers, each of which for all practical purposes is nearly as great a menace as a member of the Communist Party."

And listen to these excerpts from your Congressman's address:

"Congress is the voice of the people. (Here) their causes can be pleaded, their desires made known, and their rights upheld. * * *

"Our duty is to keep faith with the members of our Armed Services and with the people of America * * * to stay on the job * * * set the example of patriotism and self-denial our actions in passing legislation will require of our servicemen and our citizens possibly for years to come."

Hon. John Crain Kunkel, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, at the close of the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, three members of the Pennsylvania Republican delegation voluntarily retire.

Among these is Hon. JOHN CRAIN KUNKEL, who after serving with distinction in this body has chosen to return to private life and devote himself to his personal affairs, principally banking and farming.

Mr. KUNKEL first entered Congress as the Representative from the Eighteenth Pennsylvania District in the Seventy-sixth Congress. He is the grandson of Hon. John C. Kunkel, a member of the Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Congresses; and a great-grandson of John Sargeant, a Member of Congress for eight terms and chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Twenty-sixth Congresses.

Mr. KUNKEL attended Harrisburg Academy, Phillips Academy, Yale University, and Harvard Law School.

Few men have ever come to Congress better equipped than JOHN KUNKEL. He inherited a splendid background of congressional service from his grandfather and great-grandfather and he has lived up to the highest traditions of his ancestral forebears.

Serving as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency he has risen to a place of power and influence on that committee.

By nature, reserved and somewhat diffident, yet, nevertheless through his long service here he has demonstrated that he has courage of highest order and has battled hard and consistently in support of those principles and policies he considered right and proper.

Both in and without the Pennsylvania Republican delegation he has been highly regarded and his departure will be sorely missed by the hundreds of friends he has made while serving here.

Mr. KUNKEL has been a sound thinker, a deep student of governmental affairs and his ability has particularly shone forth in two fields of action—banking and housing, in both of which he has made valuable and lasting contributions.

So we say farewell to a true friend, a genuine American, a devoted public servant and a real man.

Good-by, good friend, and may your remaining years outside of Congress be as happy and pleasant as those which you have spent in these historic halls.

Hon. Franklin Herbert Lichtenwalter, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL B. DAGUE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have been privileged to membership in this House I have been reluctant to usurp the time which could be better left to others whom I feel are more qualified than I to explore most of the issues which come before us. Today, however, I am grateful for this opportunity to speak on behalf of the Pennsylvania Republican delegation in renewing our regret over the decision of our esteemed colleague FRANKLIN H. LICHTENWALTER not to seek reelection, which means that his services in this body will terminate with the end of the Eighty-first Congress.

I am sure that you will recall Mr. LICHTENWALTER'S election at the special election held in September 1947, when he decisively defeated an opponent who was backed by organized labor. That contest was hailed throughout the country as the first real test of the popularity of the Taft-Hartley law and FRANK'S victory gave heart to those who were doubtful as to public reception of the new labor law. Incidentally, that campaign was a model of organized teamwork although the reaction of the public to the importation of outside political workers and organizers unquestionably reacted in Mr. LICHTENWALTER'S favor, which is not to minimize, however, the fact that his ability to meet at their own level and at the same time to literally talk their language had much to do with winning the solid Pennsylvania Dutch citizenry of Lehigh County to his banner.

I doubt if there has ever been anyone who has come to Congress with a wider legislative experience than has this colleague of ours from Pennsylvania's Eighth District. With 8 years' service in the lower house at Harrisburg, including brilliant discharge of the duties of majority leader and speaker, he brought to this body a wealth of legislative know-how which was readily appreciated by anyone who sought his opinions on pending bills. It is left, however, to those who were privileged to have his advice in delegation meetings and the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Select Committee on the Problems of Small Business to attest to his outstanding contributions in the legislative field.

Our sense of deep personal loss in the termination of his services in this House, however, stems more particularly from the knowledge that we will be denied his genial companionship and the leavening influence of his unfailing good humor. In these troubled times when tempers are short and repartee is sharp it has been heartening to have amongst us one whose philosophy is predicated on the thesis that "a soft answer turneth away wrath." This admirable quality he will take with him into new fields of endeavors and as we wish him well and confidently anticipate his success in whatever he undertakes it is our prayerful hope that God's richest blessing will go with him and that he will return often to these scenes where he has left his indelible mark and made for himself a host of stalwart friends.

A Great American, a Great New Yorker, a Wonderful Man—Abraham Cahan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following well-deserved tribute to one of the most beloved figures of our time. There is no point in my repeating the tribute paid by the editorial from the September 9, 1950, issue of the New York Herald Tribune; I can only say that I adopt and endorse everything said here. The editorial follows:

A GREAT NEW YORKER

One of the really great figures in the rich and varied tradition of New York is being honored today, for his attainment of 90 years of service, of leadership, of abounding life. Abraham Cahan helped found the Jewish Daily Forward—as a small, doctrinaire Socialist organ—in the first year of McKinley's Presidency. He returned to it in 1902, at the dawn of the Theodore Roosevelt era; and through nearly half a century since then has remained as its editor in chief and as one of the vital intellectual and cultural forces in the New York community.

For half a century the Forward has daily brought into many thousands of our Yiddish-speaking homes a quickening sense of life and letters; it has interpreted the strange American scene to countless newly arrived Jewish immigrants and, in itself or through the prodigious energies of its editor, it has interpreted the Jewish community to their fellow-citizens of older origins in the country. There was no aspect of that community's life in which Abraham Cahan was not a wise and vigorous counselor—in the formation of its great labor unions, in its charities, in its social, political, artistic, and intellectual life. His newspaper and the influence of the personality it reflected have been in themselves an education for countless fine Americans of today. The Forward was and is an expression of nineteenth century socialism; but Abraham Cahan, born in the Russia of the Czars and a fugitive from their tyranny, has stood rocklike against the infiltration into America of the new tyranny of the new Communist czars of today.

The Forward has been both a fructifying and an integrating force in our community life. Inevitably, as the new generations which it helped to teach grow up, its function is bound to change. But change will still be based upon the sure foundations laid by the man and leader whom the city is today glad to honor.

To Prevent Other Troop Train Wrecks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial taken from the Philadelphia Inquirer of September 15, 1950, entitled "To Prevent Other Troop Train Wrecks." The Inquirer editorial follows:

TO PREVENT OTHER TROOP TRAIN WRECKS

Wilkes-Barre and nearby Wyoming Valley communities received yesterday in numbing grief their 33 soldier-dead, home from the troop train wreck in Ohio.

To the afflicted families of these men, members of the camp-bound Twenty-eighth Division, we offer our deepest sympathy. At the same time, we are confronted with the necessity of finding why this appalling tragedy occurred and of taking measures to prevent others like it.

Certain facts were made clear at the hearing into the collision conducted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Ohio Public Utility Commission, the Army, and the Pennsylvania Railroad. One was that there was no breakdown in the railroad-signal equipment. Another was that the engineer of the express train which rammed the rear of the troop carrier had not made effective use of those signals to slow down in time.

The engineer, 68-year-old William E. Eller, made some startling admissions at the hearing. He had been operating the "Spirit of St. Louis" at the rate of 50 miles an hour when he received a signal, 2 miles from the stalled troop train, to slow down to 30 miles.

Instead of that, the automatic tape recording of the train's speed, found intact in the diesel engine, showed that he actually stepped up the pace to 70 miles an hour, then waited for another block signal before he slammed on the brakes, only 850 feet from the cars ahead.

Meanwhile, trainmen on the troop carrier, which was forced to stop a second time for repairs on a steam line, had placed red flares on the track behind them, and when they saw the express approaching attempted frantically to halt it—one man even throwing a flare against the locomotive windshield. But the express rammed into the other train at a speed of 50 miles an hour.

The engineer testified that he had been told there was a troop train ahead. He testified also, though he did not explain, that he had shut off the whistle in his cab which gives warning when the track ahead is not clear.

The ICC will determine if negligence on the engineer's part calls for punitive action. But there should be decided also whether it is safe to entrust an express train into the hands of a man 68 years old, regardless of his experience and apparent state of health. Handling a locomotive running at great speed requires unusual alertness, sureness, and instantaneous response to sudden demands. Persons on the threshold of 70 do not always possess those qualification.

The engineer stated that his train was running 30 minutes late when it went through the block signals. Was he taking a chance to make up the lost time?

It has been brought out that the signal apparatus which should have slowed down the "Spirit of St. Louis" in time to avoid the collision was functioning properly. But it was not sufficient to prevent the wreck. Does not that mean that existing signal systems are inadequate?

Block signals, red flares, lanterns, and the rest appear rather primitive in the light of present-day advances in quick communication. Other forms of transport, such as airplanes and ships at sea, rely upon the radio for instantaneous contact. Why should not the railroads employ this device more widely?

If the stalled troop train could have notified the oncoming express by radio, either directly or through intermediate tower control, of the imperative need to stop at such and such a location, there might have been no collision.

Another accident preventive would be the combining of automatic train stops with the block-signal system, to bring trains to a halt when emergency demands.

Desirable also are measures assuring safe riding equipment for troopers transported by railroads, and priorities for their trains.

Familiar in other wars has been the cramming of soldiers into antiquated and broken-down railway cars and their frequent shunting into sidings to make way for passenger expresses and freights. Men in the Armed Services should be given the best in transport and the right of way in getting to their destination.

The Ohio train wreck points to the need for precautionary measures, to protect human life, that are now lacking.

Despite Korea the Air Force Is Still Top Dog in the Pentagon's Plans for Defending America if There Is Any World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, those words that I have just spoken are not my words. They are the studied findings of Andrew Tully, world known correspondent of the Scripps-Howard news syndicate and one of their ace editorial writers. In the signed editorial written by Mr. Tully as carried in the Washington News of Monday last, he discusses frankly and convincingly the reliance of our country on the value of the strategic bombing mission of the United States Air Force and the incalculable value to the Nation's defenses of the Air Force B–36 long-range bombers.

The service rendered to this Congress and our Nation by the President's Air Policy Commission headed by the Honorable Thomas K. Finletter, now Secretary of the United States Air Force, was a service second to none ever performed by any citizen group in these United States.

I remember the fine things that were spoken of Mr. Finletter some years ago by top-ranking members of the Armed Services Committee of this House when the Finletter committee first publicized their findings under the heading of "Survival in the air age." Little did we then dream that this soldier, statesmen, patriot, author, educator, skilled and learned in all phases of law, would some day himself be called out of private life to serve his country as Secretary of our great Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, military experiences in Korea justify the findings of the Finletter committee. Nobody in America today is afraid of a practically nonexistent Russian surface Navy competing with the United States Navy now by far larger in size than all the navies of the world.

Nobody is afraid of Russian tanks making amphibious landings on our coastal shores and lumbering up over the Allegheny Mountains to attack our people in the Middle West.

The Russians do not even have a substantial maritime force to transport troops.

What the American people are afraid of is the death and destruction that can be rained upon our country—dropped out of the bowels of Russian airplanes circling over the great cities of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Chicago, and all other great industrial centers of our country from Maine to California or from Mexico to Canada.

They know that if the vital strength of our war plants are destroyed or crippled, the war is lost and our country and its people actually made slaves to the Russians.

Above all else, they know that the greatest defense that this country can devise is a good offense and that the United States Air Force is in fact what Mr. Tully states it to be—

The only branch of the Armed Forces which can attack on short notice.

Not in 1 hour or from "4 o'clock to 5 o'clock which Louis Johnson said it would," but within the matter of but a few minutes that it would take to send our B–36's coursing on their way to the very heart and center of every strategic point in the Russian empire.

It is because of their current value to the membership of this House and to Americans everywhere that I am asking the unanimous consent of my colleagues to insert into the RECORD two articles: First, the editorial by Andrew Tully, headed, "AF still best weapon," and second, a United Press Tokyo dispatch headed, "B–29's running out of targets—Air Force dams enemy traffic." These are as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 18, 1950]

AF STILL BEST WEAPON

(By Andrew Tully)

Despite Korea, the Air Force is still top dog in the Penatgon's plans for defending America if there is another world war.

Korea is supposed to have made the fly boys look bad. But that isn't the way the top brass sees it. To them Korea—for all its admitted bitterness—is still a side issue to the main danger, which is Russia. And they still feel our best weapon against the main danger is the Air Force.

"Put it this way," said a Defense Department spokesman. "The best defense is still the best offense—and the Air Force remains the only branch of the Armed Forces which can attack on short notice."

If this sounds like Defense Secretary Louis Johnson's famous speech about hitting the enemy at 5 o'clock if he strikes at 4, that's all right with the Defense Department. Mr. Johnson's been kidded a lot about that crack, but he wasn't talking about a war in Korea when he made it—he was referring to a major war, plus the atom bomb and the B-36 long-range bomber.

So Korea hasn't changed things a bit as far as the over-all concept of fighting a major war is concerned. The plan is still to hit Russia fast and hard with the B–36 and the A-bomb if she attacks us, in order to destroy her striking force before it can hit us over here. There'll be radar and interceptor planes for defense, but the emphasis will be placed on attack, destroying the ability of the enemy to strike at America through the skies.

As the Joint Chiefs see it, our vital strength in time of war lies in our war plants. If they're destroyed or crippled, the war is as good as lost. It will be the Air Force's primary mission—through such long-range attacks on the heart of the enemy—to prevent such an eventuality.

All you have to do to be convinced of how high the Air Force is riding is to look at the Defense Department's budget figures for the fiscal year 1951. A good bit more than the lion's share is going to the fly boys.

The budget for all three services and the Defense Department totals $24,993,000,000. Of this amount $9,309,000,000 is earmarked for the Air Force. Increases are in the works all along the line, of course, but the most significant one is for new airplanes. The Air Force, during fiscal 1951, will spend more than $4,000,000,000 on new planes, just about three times the amount it spent in fiscal 1950.

Another item of significance is that it was after the Korean war started—not before—that the Joint Chiefs agreed on an Air Force of 69 groups, and they have not seen fit since then to change their minds publicly.

As Chairman CARL VINSON, Democrat, of Georgia, of the House Military Affairs Committee, sees it, the Air Force will be boosted from 48 groups to 58 by July 1, 1951, and to 69 by July 1952. And he did not demur when Air Force men insisted it probably would be necessary to expand even further.

[From the Washington Daily News of September 14, 1950]

B-29'S RUNNING OUT OF TARGETS—AIR FORCE DAMS ENEMY TRAFFIC

TOKYO, September 14.—Lt. Gen. George E. Stratemeyer, commander of the United States Far East Air Forces, said today that sweeping Allied aerial attack had halted all large-scale traffic in Communist-held Korea.

At the same time, Gen. Emmett O'Donnell, Far East Air Forces bomber commander, reported that "practically all major military industrial targets" in Communist North Korea had been knocked out by American B–29's.

"Aerial reconnaissance shows that large-scale traffic in enemy-held Korea is to all intents and purposes at a halt as of today," General Stratemeyer said. "More than 170 attacks on bridges, 60 on secondary marshaling yards, 21 on tunnels, and more than 50 cuts in rail lines have been made by B–29's, F–26's, F–51's, F-28's, and F–80's since September 4."

INDUSTRY CRIPPLED

General O'Donnell said in a report to General Stratemeyer that the B–29's now had trouble finding worth-while targets north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

"Results on both strategic targets and in the interdiction program have been most gratifying," General Stratemeyer replied. "Heavy North Korean industry has been severely crippled by an estimated 75 percent destruction of assigned targets.

"The movement of supplies and troops from North Korea to the south has been seriously disrupted by the carefully planned severing of rail lines, the bombing of bridges, and the saturation of marshaling yards, leaving wide gaps in North Korea's highly important rail and highway network," General Stratemeyer said. "Some of the bridges and rail lines have been repaired but the interdiction program took this into account and scheduled return attacks on the principal communications tributaries."

The B-29's, which have been winging over North Korea from both Japan and Okinawa for 2 months, often went out 50 at a time in the early days of the Korean War. Ninety-eight of them were used for a saturation bombing raid of North Korean troops along the Naktong River. But now they are taking off in small groups and individually, hitting bridges, rail lines, and marshaling yards in the interdiction program, because of a lack of major industrial targets.

Report From Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY J. LATHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a news article from the Long Island Daily Press of Sunday, September 17, 1950:

CONGRESSMAN LATHAM REPORTS ON HIS 30 DAYS AT THE FRONT

(By Andrew J. Viglietta)

WASHINGTON.—Congressman HENRY J. LATHAM, of Queens Village, his "crew" cut hair evidence of his active participation in the Korean War, sat back at his desk in the Capitol yesterday and unfolded his reactions of 30 days at the fighting front.

Latham, a lieutenant-commander in the Naval Reserve, recently returned from temporary active reserve duty which took him to Korea at his own request.

He and Congressman HUGH SCOTT of Pennsylvania were the first legislators to take their active reserve duty at the front. Both are Pacific veterans of World War II and wanted to get a first hand picture of the fighting in the Far East.

LATHAM, a navigator during the last war and skipper on several ships, was elected to Congress in 1944 while he was on duty in the Pacific.

When South Korea was invaded by the Red-dominated North Koreans, LATHAM was itching to get into uniform. When it came time for him to go on reserve duty, he quickly asked for an "active" assignment.

LATHAM was not a congressional observer, but a member of the fighting forces of the Navy. On several occasions he flew on missions and participated in the bombing of the Rising Sun Petroleum Co.'s huge plant in North Korea.

Queens residents will get a first-hand report of LATHAM'S reactions from the following interview:

REPORTER. How did you come to make this tour of duty in the Korean Area, Congressman?

Mr. LATHAM. I take annual training duty with the Navy each year. I sought this assignment because I felt that if I could get to Korea and see for myself what is going on out there, it would be helpful in understanding the critical problems on which we have to vote.

REPORTER. How much did you get to see?

Mr. LATHAM. I had an excellent close view of the war. I was at Pearl Harbor, Kwajalein, Guam, Tokyo, Sasebo, and other military bases. I flew on a combat mission with dive bombers off Carrier Task Force 77; was with the Marines at the Naktong Bulge; flew over most of the front; observed the Army and Air Corps operations along the front and around Taegu; talked to the wounded, the enlisted men and officers of all branches of the services, and had a 2-hour conference with General MacArthur.

REPORTER. Our operations out there have been called a "police action." Do you agree?

Mr. LATHAM. To call it a "police action" is to perpetrate a cruel hoax on the American people. For its size, it is the bloodiest, dirtiest and toughest war we have ever been in.

REPORTER. Why?

Mr. LATHAM. The terrain is very tough. To gain ground, you have to either fight uphill over rough mountains or through nasty, muddy rice paddies that can hide an enemy sniper 20 feet away. The climate is desperately hot. Dust from the roads blind and choke you. Vicious red ants bite you in the daytime and mosquitoes at night. Up till recently, our front line has been so thin it was a cinch for enemy snipers to infiltrate behind our lines.

REPORTER. How have the American boys performed under these tough conditions?

Mr. LATHAM. Having in mind that we had very limited troops and equipment, they have performed magnificently. Since the start of the war, each branch of the service has strained every sinew to hold the line. The usual Navy liberties and Army leaves have been necessarily eliminated. There has not been time to stop fighting.

REPORTER. How would you say the various branches of the service are cooperating?

Mr. LATHAM. They are getting along splendidly. They have a friendly spirit of cooperation. Urgent needs in equipment are supplied by other services. This is due not to any law Congress has passed, but because Americans always work well and stick together in a fight.

REPORTER. After World War II some people said the next war would be fought almost by remote control. Is this in any sense a "push button" war?

Mr. LATHAM. It certainly is not. It is the old-fashioned ditch-by-ditch, road-by-road, hand-to-hand fighting that many people predicted was out of date.

REPORTER. What do they need most out there?

Mr. LATHAM. From what I saw, I would say they need more foot soldiers, more aircraft carriers, and more destroyers.

REPORTER. What do the North Korean Communists most fear?

Mr. LATHAM. I was told they fear most the napalm bomb. This is made of an incendiary jelly which splatters fiercely burning fire in all directions.

REPORTER. Do you agree with those who say we were caught unprepared in Korea?

Mr LATHAM. Yes, sir. President Truman cut defenses below our apparent needs and the wishes of Congress and the people. He impounded billions of dollars appropriated for national defense, moth-balled our Navy and particularly our aircraft carriers, cut the Marine Corps to the bone, cut our Air Force from 70 groups to 48 groups, and refused to take cargo ships out of the reserve fleet.

REPORTER. You say the Korean War could have been avoided. Why?

Mr. LATHAM. I believe the fault lies squarely with the present administration and particularly with our State Department. They have steadfastly maintained an unrealistic attitude toward Communists. Their belief was that they could do business with the Communists. This policy resulted in a long series of incidents and appeasement. Specifically, in Korea they permitted the Communists to effectuate the dividing of this country at the arbitrary thirty-eighth parallel. This kept all Korean industry within the Russian orbit. They permitted the withdrawal of our occupation troops from South Korea and announced to the world that Korea was unimportant to our defenses. When Congress voted appropriations for military aid to South Korea, they neglected to send that aid. In all, it was an open invitation to Communist-led North Koreans to move in and take over.

REPORTER. Are the Russian Communists really behind this?

Mr. LATHAM. They certainly are. I personally saw the Russian-made tanks, guns, and bullets that are killing our boys.

REPORTER. Are the South Koreans giving us much help?

Mr. LATHAM Yes. They are tough, hardy people with plenty of courage. In addition, they are doing splendid work unloading ships. And they also act as litter bearers to take our wounded from the battlefield. I might add that the North Koreans are also tough, fanatical, and vicious fighters. That is why they have given us so much trouble.

REPORTER. How soon do you think we are going to win in Korea?

Mr. LATHAM. The exact timetable is hard to predict. But we're going to win. However, we must face the possibility that Russia will send the Chinese or Manchurian hordes down through North Korea. As things now stand, I am completely confident we will hold our beachhead and completely destroy the North Korean forces before they ever get back to the thirty-eighth parallel.

REPORTER. Would you say we were ever in danger of defeat in Korea?

Mr. LATHAM. We had a very close call. Each unit we had in there performed remarkably well and without any one of them we would probably have been licked. The mobile Navy Carrier Task Force struck hard and straight. The Army troops in the first critical days fought a rear guard delaying action that will go down in military history as a classic. The Marine Corps, when it arrived with its splendid balanced fighting team, recaptured critical lost ground. The Naval Surface Force with deadly shore fire knocked out the Korean Reds advancing down the east coast. The Air Force struck supply channels behind the lines. General MacArthur, the master strategist, furnished brilliant direction.

REPORTER. You saw General MacArthur. How is he?

Mr. LATHAM. He is in splendid health and absolutely confident of victory. We must not forget that he probably knows more about the Orient than any other living American.

REPORTER. What questions were you asked by the boys out there?

Mr. LATHAM. I spoke to hundreds of them. The question most frequently asked was: "Do the people back home know how tough the fighting is out here?" They were also concerned about reports of "business as usual" and "politics as usual" at home. They were stunned and incredulous at reports of hoarding while they were fighting so desperately.

REPORTER. What can we do here at home to help?

Mr. LATHAM. We can expose and fight the Communists in this country. We can see that the men on the fighting line get everything they need. We can tighten our belts and do everything possible to help the general war effort. We can bear in mind that while statesmen debate academic questions at the United Nations in Lake Success, these boys are fighting and dying—for keeps.

Develop and Conserve Our Natural Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an excellent editorial on resources development and conservation appearing in Report From Washington by Michael Hudoba in the October 1950 issue of Sports Afield. The editorial follows:

This Nation has mobilized its strength and called upon its resources to protect its existence for the third time in this half century, and the second time within the present generation.

That our natural resources have been abundant is a vital factor in our continuing position of leadership in a world of peril. But how long can we draw upon the good fortune of nature's beneficence without exhausting its capacity as well as the patience of the good earth? There is a limit to the future we can spend today.

The natural resources of soil, water, land, forest, and mineral are the basic elements of existence to men and nations. We have turned the wheels of industry to create the highest living standards in the world by our raw resources. In addition to ourselves, we have fed, clothed, and sheltered much of the civilized world on a land capacity which is only a fraction of the earth's surface.

While we pour billions into costs of past wars and defense for future wars, we virtually neglect the defense of our nonrenewable resources. While we spend more than 71 percent of our multi-billion-dollar budget for defense, only 5 percent goes toward conservation of the natural resources, which is the basis of our whole existence. And wrapped up in that 5 percent are pseudo-conservation programs that dabble in after-effects of resource ills, without attacking fundamental issues.

We cannot continue to implement our defense efforts indefinitely in the absence of expanding such programs, nor can we avoid the tragic Maginot line philosophy with stockpiles of defense material if our natural resources position is allowed to deteriorate.

Our enemies know too well the restriction of resource deficiencies and they cast covetous eyes and lick their chops over the profligacy of our policies.

It is time for this Nation to take stock of its natural resources. It is time to organize an all-out mobilization to preserve our resources and to restore those which we are depleting. We must not be trapped in the rush of budgetary readjustments to counter international crises, to deaccent vital domestic resource restoration programs. This is no less a mandatory defense need than arms and implements of war.

Before it is too late, this Nation must aggressively undertake and expand its resource restoration and conservation programs. And contrary to prevalent Washington philosophy, this is not all dam building, nor all subsidy payments. It must deal objectively in basic restoration of soil, water, land, and forest resources.

And in the future, with crises past, these are the elements on which we must depend to rehabilitate our domestic economy. These are the elements which will have to pay the bills.

Senate Subcommittee on Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post this morning praising the work of the Senate Subcommittee on Preparedness, which is headed by our colleague the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and is made up of eminent members of both parties. I am sure all of us have had a feeling of pride in the splendid work of this sumbcommittee, and it is very reassuring to find that the excellent progress which the subcommittee has made is being approved by the press and the public opinion of the country.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUNITIONS LAG

Hubert E. Howard's resignation as Chairman of the Munitions Board cannot be dissociated from the critical report of the Board's activities by the Senate Subcommittee on Preparedness of which Senator LYNDON JOHNSON is chairman. Shortly after the war broke out in Korea this new watchdog committee, which is following in the footsteps of the Truman committee of the Second World War, became alarmed over the laxity of the Munitions Board in building up the country's natural rubber stockpile. On August 15 the committee wrote to Mr. Howard that the rubber stockpile was inadequate and asked what plans be had to rectify the situation. Three weeks later it had had no reply. The committee found other strong evidence that the Munitions Board has been asleep at the switch, and this congressional finding, of course, went into the hands of the President, and no doubt precipitated the resignation of Mr. Howard.

Now the stockpiling program was undertaken for the specific purpose of avoiding in any future emergency the critical shortages that plagued our war efforts in the early forties. It is shocking in view of this experience that the job has been neglected. But no other conclusion is possible. Before Korea the Munitions Board missed an excellent opportunity to acquire large supplies of natural rubber at prices which last fall were 16 cents a pound. Under the stimulus of the Korean War the price of natural rubber jumped to 55 cents, and then the Board appears to have revised downward its inadequate stockpiling plans. This record seems to show neither business prudence nor recognition of national need. In issuing its first report recently the Preparedness Subcommittee sharply criticized this lack of foresight and commented that "we need more imaginative and far-sighted men responsible for the attainment of the stockpiling objectives."

Mr. Howard was asked to appear before the Preparedness Committee yesterday, but the hearing was canceled because of his resignation. Mr. Truman's prompt acceptance of the resignation affords further evidence that he is working with the congressional investigators to correct weaknesses in the defense effort as quickly as they are brought to light. He had previously arrested the disposal of Government rubber-producing plants and his interest in the work of the committee probably stimulated various departments to revise business-as-usual policies under prodding from the committee. Senator MORSE highly commended the President for his enlightened attitude toward the fact finders and said that the President's promptness had set a "magnificent example" for other governmental agencies.

In this there is evidence of strength. The bipartisan subcommittee is turning the spotlight on mistakes that need correction without fanfare or political bias, and the White House is responding with a largeness of spirit. We hope this singleness of devotion to building up our national security will carry over into the selection of a new Chairman for the Munitions Board, for the Board serves as a sort of joint chiefs of staff for industry. From the Munitions Board, specifically, must come the military requirements program for setting in motion the new National Production Authority.

W. Harriman: Politician

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL K. McCONNELL, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of September 20, 1950:

MR. HARRIMAN: POLITICIAN

W. Averell Harriman's attack on Senator TAFT belongs under the heading of cheap—very cheap—politics.

The labor bosses, aided and abetted by the President and his political hatchet men, have been gunning for Senator TAFT ever since the labor law which bears his name was passed. At the beginning, they relied on an utterly false attack on the law itself. They said that it was a slave labor act and that it would destroy unions. But that line of attack has worn itself out. Labor unions have become bigger and stronger than ever before, and no amount of falsification can make anyone believe that the unions have been crushed and enslaved by the Taft-Hartley Act.

So the attack has been switched to Senator TAFT's voting record on foreign policy. And Mr. Harriman, who heretofore has been somewhat above the ward-heeler level in politics, has obediently gone down to the AFL meeting in Houston and joined the "get TAFT" chorus.

The Star has differed with Senator TAFT in several of his votes on foreign-policy matters. It was not in agreement with his opposition to General Marshall as Secretary of Defense. This newspaper has not the slightest doubt, however, that in these matters Senator TAFT's stand has been taken as a matter of principle and honest conviction. To say, as Mr. Harriman told the AFL assembly, that the Ohio Senator has ignorantly been furthering the designs of the Kremlin is to resort to the shoddiest kind of political slander.

There is, and there always should be, a place in this Government for sincere opposition. There is no other way in which faulty administration policies can be tested and perfected. But the labor bosses and their political servants do not accept this view. For purely selfish reasons, they will tolerate no opposition to their political demands and they openly boast of their determination to drive from public life Senator TAFT or any other man who has the courage and the integrity to stand out against them.

Mr Harriman, with the President's approval if not at his direction, has joined this partisan hue and cry, and in so doing he has forfeited any claim to respect or support as an instrument of a bipartisan foreign policy. He says, magnanimously, that the most charitable thing one can say about TAFT is that he knows not what he does. That is more than one can say of Mr. Harriman. He knows very well what he is doing, and that makes his performance at Houston all the more regrettable.

Communism and American Labor Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. NIXON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I consider it a privilege to include in the RECORD an address by Mr. Dave Beck, Executive Vice President, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco.

During the past 4 years, I have had the opportunity, as a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities, to participate in a number of investigations of the Communist conspiracy in the United States. These investigations have revealed that the most effective work in removing Communists from positions of power is being done by the anti-Communist leaders of the American trade-union movement. Our Government, our schools, and other American institutions which the Communists have succeeded in infiltrating could well follow the lead of the trade-union movement in this respect.

Dave Beck has long been one of the most outspoken and able opponents of communism in the labor movement. It is to his credit, particularly, that he saw the danger from communism, both to the labor movement and to our American system, long before others both in and out of labor unions recognized the seriousness of the problem.

Mr. Beck's address follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, I am delighted to discuss with you today the subject of communism and American labor unions. Communism is not solely the problem of labor, however. As you know in the State of California, it is also a problem within our universities and in many other segments of our social and economic life.

All of us are deeply interested in meeting the problem posed by communism in America, and throughout the world. If we are to do this, however, we must first understand the reasons for the spread of communistic doctrine, how it is propagated, and to whom it makes its appeal. It will not help us to shift the responsibility, for personal advantage, to the shoulders of either labor or industry.

The organization with which I am identified, and which I have served for so many years, is the largest labor union in the world It has a membership of more than a million men and women. It is made up largely, if not entirely, of people who are classified as unskilled. Yet we have no problem whatever with communism.

There must be a reason for this fact. It is because for more than 30 years in the history of our international union, its basic constitution--the law of the union—provided that a Communist shall not be eligible to membership. At our last national convention, here in San Francisco in 1947, we further clarified and broadened that provision by barring from membership all who are affiliated or associated with subversive organizations or groups of any kind, or who advocate any subversive philosophy.

Since we are a voluntary organization, we do not require positive proof that a man is a member of the Communist Party; we must simply satisfy ourselves that he advocates the philosophy of communism. If he does this, then for all practical purposes, he is a Communist, and we do not waste time in throwing him out

There can be no compromise between Americanism and communism. Any attempt at compromise is an admission of defeat. Surely we have had enough of appeasement, of attempting to compose differences with those whom we know to be sworn enemies of our way of life. I believe that the greatest result that can come out of the situation in Asia is that we will bring sharply home to the attention of our people this outstanding fact: That just as we must carry life insurance for the protection of our families, and fire insurance on our homes and businesses, so must we carry national insurance in the form of adequate military preparedness for our Covernment and our free institutions and ideals.

More than 5 years previous to the last World War, in many talks which I made before business and professional groups and service clubs, I advocated as strongly as my ability would permit, that we maintain our Army and our Navy and our Air Force at the highest possible degree of strength and efficiency, regardless of the cost. There is not a man or woman in front of me today—not one—who, is confronted with the choice of losing the life of his son or contributing his entire fortune, would hesitate for an instant. Of course he would sacrifice everything of material value he possesses for his loved ones. Yet, we hesitated then as a nation to prepare to defend our rights and our way of life, with the result that untold thousands of our boys did not come back from that war, or returned maimed and broken in body.

So long as communism spreads its fangs across the world, we must be ready, we must be prepared to hurl the vicious beast back from our shores.

We must demand in these hours of national peril that men in positions of trust tell us truthfully where they stand on the question of communism. I have no time whatever for men in politics, or in labor, or in business, or on the faculty of any of our universities, who refuse to take a positive stand on this question of communism.

It is a lot of tommyrot for members of university faculties to talk about interference with their academic freedom, while young Americans are making the great sacrifice on the battlefields of Korea to defeat communism and to defend free America. We are in an era of national emergency which has endured for a long, long time. World War II has not been officially ended. Thousands of men who gave up their peacetime ambitions for a period of years, who gambled their lives on the battlefields of Europe and in the South Pacific, are again being called into military service, while some of our theorists, exponents of what they pretend to call their constitutional rights, refuse to stand and be counted as Americans. They forget that the soldier, both in peace and war, lives under military law, not civil law. They blandly suppose that their rights would survive if communism should sweep this country. How wrong they are. American rights and all the liberty our forefathers fought to give us, would be destroyed instantly and without trace if we were to prove unworthy to survive in this present conflict.

It was my privilege to travel to Europe a year ago and to speak as a representative of the American Federation of Labor before the British Trades Union Congress, and to visit some of the countries on the eastern side of the Atlantic. I had a private audience with the Pope at his summer palace near Rome. We discussed the problem of communism. I also conferred at some length on the same subject with Bishop O'Connor, who heads the North American University in Rome, one of the outstanding schools for the development of young men for the priesthood.

Both the Pope and Bishop O'Connor stated that it was where the common people were struggling against direst poverty that communism made its greatest advances.

Later we drove through the streets of Rome, on a hot afternoon, just as the day was coming to a close, and we could look into the houses and see where 15 to 20 lived in absolute squalor in a single room. Down in Naples, as well as elsewhere in Europe where communism seemed to thrive, we found the same appalling conditions, and we could then understand something of the problem of communism and how it could appeal to those people. There indeed was a fertile breeding place for ideas which appeal to desperate men, to men who have lost their hope and their faith in themselves and in the future.

But these facts do not excuse men and women in American labor for tolerating communism. There is no such fertile ground here for the propagation of the Moscow doctrine.

The problem of communism in America is one which labor and capital must solve jointly. We are making definite and steady progress in this country toward the solution of the other problems of capital and labor. There is a constantly improving standard of living here.

If we want the truth, and I am sure that we do want the truth, we must not judge men and women in any phase of our social, economic, and business life by the actions of an individual, or of a few misguided individuals. We must judge industry as well as labor by the character and the conduct of the overwhelming majority. I can say to you positively, because I know whereof I speak: the working men and women of America want no part of communism whatever.

My friends, the strongest bulwark to restrain the sweep of communism must come from within labor. You cannot find Communists in the membership of the Kiwanis Club, or the Rotary Club, or the Lion's Club, or the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco. Why? Because you people and others in similar organizations are financially successful. You enjoy a standard of living, you and your families and your associates, that does not permit the seeds of communism to take root. You and your families and your friends may not be wealthy but you are a long, long way from poverty.

We must recognize the fact, both in labor and elsewhere in America, that many of the evils, which once were destructive of our standards of living, and which made possible the fetid breeding grounds for communism, are no longer tolerated.

As we right the old wrongs and as we banish forever the ancient evils of squalor and poverty and substandard living, we will sound the death knell of communism in this country.

I do not want to be misunderstood I do not lay the responsibility for communism and its growth in the lap of industry, because I know that men in labor—men in high places in labor—also have tolerated communism and have courted it. Neither do I condemn those who change their minds, and abandon that false philosophy, or any other evil doctrine. We are all members of this human family and we can all err.

Yes; there have been men in high places in labor who put their arms around the Communists and welcomed them, back in 1934 and even in later years. There was Philip Murray, for instance, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and Walter Reuther, of the Auto Workers. There were also many others whom I could name. They tolerated the Communists in their ranks, they invited them in, and they worked with them and trusted them.

There was also John L. Lewis, with whose philosophy and actions I do not agree in many, many instances. Lewis definitely is not a Communist, but he, too, tolerated them and their leaders.

Why did these men in labor consort with Communists? Because they believed they could use Communists in labor to accomplish their objectives more easily.

But they were in error. They made a serious mistake, and they are still trying to correct it and to live it down. They discovered, as will anyone who makes the experiment, that the Communists, as quickly as they could do so, using any and all methods, no matter how reprehensible, tried to take over their union organizations. That is the objective of Communists when they infiltrate labor unions and organizations of university professors and any other group in our social and economic life. The Communists cared nothing for the American toiler or his union; they sought places of authority so that they could promote the Communist Party line. The Communists have no loyalty to America or Americans; their hearts and their loyalties are with the Kremlin. They will destroy a union or any other group if it will serve the ends of Russia. Their very thoughts are subservient to the Soviet dictators.

The chief goal of the Communist is revolution—violent and bloody revolution. He wants chaos and disorder and ruin for our country, for it is through such catastrophe that he hopes to take over and to rule America with an iron hand, destroying every trace of our democratic institutions, and blotting out our rights and liberties. Our American system of free enterprise is his especial enemy.

We of American labor believe in our free-enterprise system. We do not believe in it simply because it benefits those who have money invested in business upon which they may make profits. Not at all. We believe in free enterprise because we know that it has preserved our liberty and at the same time has given us the highest standard of living and opportunity the world has ever known.

Free enterprise, as opposed to communism and socialism, is in the interest of the vast, overwhelming majority of the people who toil for their living, both here and in other countries. I believe in free enterprise because it inspires initiative within men and women. It provides them with opportunities to rise above their environment and to attain any high place which their ability and intelligence will permit them to achieve. I contend that no system in the history of the world has ever made po sible such progress for the working men and women, as free enterprise has accomplished for the American people. I have traveled somewhat around over the world and I do not know of a single, solitary ountry where the workingman lives under as fine conditions as he does in this land of free enterprise. Certainly no honest, intelligent man can think that communism offers more.

I have never known of a Communist, or one who advocated communism—and I have watched them in action for more than 30 years—I have nev r known of one Communist who, of his own volition, has left this country to live in Russia. They fight depertation to Russia with all their might, and if they go to Russia, they fight just as hard to get back to this country.

In days long gone by, in Seattle in 1918, there was a general strike. I think that I headed the only labor organization in Seattle which voted against that general strike. I listened then in the Central Labor Council to men espousing the cause and extolling the wonders of Russia.

To hear them talk, you could put them off the boat blindfolded at Vladivostok and they could walk from one end of Russia to the other without bumping into a single obstacle. But not one of them went to Russia and stayed there. Why? Because no workingman anywhere in the world can earn for himself and his family the benefits and security that he can receive as a matter of course under our system of free enterprise.

Among the men and women in this room today, successful men and women, the overwhelming majority were not born to wealth and position. They fought and they earned their way up to the places they now hold. The tragedy is that so many have forgotten the adversities and misfortunes they endured and overcame in the early days.

I represent an organization which, I believe, has as good wages, hours, and working conditions as any labor group in the world. We accomplish this by working with industry and within the framework of this Government, and by no other method.

I disagree with employers in many parts of the country almost every day, and undoubtedly I shall continue to disagree with them, but I will disagree with them within the framework of our American law and Constitution and in an effort to take from industry what I honestly believe the men and women of labor are entitled to receive. That, in my judgment, is the only way we can stop the spread of communism.

We can go back into the history of any industry and where we find the greatest number of Communists today we also will discover that in the days gone by the most intolerable conditions existed. Yet, communism is not the solution for these people.

Yes, we are making progress. There was a time when, in the midst of depression, there was nothing for thousands upon thousands of hungry men and women to do but get into the breadlines, or go to the soup kitchens. Those who have lived in San Francisco since 1928 have had the experience of seeing hundreds and hundreds of men and women in the breadlines. Does anyone think we can send men and women into the breadlines without giving tremendous impetus to the spread of communism?

We must take steps to keep men and women out of the breadlines in times of business depression. It is futile to expect all of the working people to accumulate financial resources on their own initiative sufficient to provide insurance or some other form of protection to save them from destitution in such times of business distress. It therefore devolves upon this social and economic structure of curs to find the way to solve this problem.

I advocate that during the period of our working lifetimes, we set aside from our own earnings—not from the earnings of others but from our own—and out of the development of the resources and industry of this country, sufficient reserve savings to prevent breadlines and poverty. Perhaps you will criticize this idea. If so, what do you suggest to solve the problem? For it is our problem, and it must be solved if we are to stop communism in this country.

It is possible, perhaps, that we may go too far in the direction of social welfare, but I say to you: As surely as you are in front of me today, we must continue social security, for if we do not we will one day stagger this Nation's industry under a pension load which it cannot possibly carry. We must take steps now to provide for future needs. You may argue whether or not there should be investment of security funds as we go along, so that money will be available out of earnings to meet future emergencies, but no one can possibly disagree when I say that we must solve the problem of destitution and poverty among our people. Otherwise this great structure of business will not remain as you and I want it. It, however, we follow the policy of preparing now to meet future needs of our people, we will never have much of a problem from communism in America.

We dare not try to compromise with communism, for there can be no compromise. Phil Murray learned, Walter Reuther learned, and John L. Lewis learned by bitter experience that compromise with communism is disastrous. Neither can we compromise with a Russian Government which follows and advocates the philosophy of communism.

I detest communism as much as any man in America. We must stop it inside labor because, as I said a few minutes ago, that is the only place where it can possibly find an opportunity to grow; that is the only place where destitute, poverty-ridden people may ever be found. It is true that some of the working people have made mistakes. They are not, in many instances, well educated. Add poverty to their other handicaps and we will have ground for communism to take root.

I say to the leaders of industry and business: Associate yourself with men of character, ability and courage within the American labor movement and help to find the solution to these problems which cause unrest and which threaten to tear the very structure of our Government to pieces. Together we can find the causes, and the answers.

No man in labor today, who is worth anything to his membership, advocates the strike as the first step toward the solution of any dispute he may have with any employer. A 15-year old boy may be able to organize a strike, and if all labor respects the picket line, he may accomplish his objectives even though they may be absolutely wrong. That is not the road to industrial peace or to the proper solution of our problems, for wrong methods will not stand the test of time.

We need more men in the labor movement who have the courage to say "No!" when that is the unpopular thing to say. We can find any number of men who are willing to say "Yes" if that seems popular. We need courageous men in our universities, on our boards of regents, directing the affairs of industry. I repeat: We need them in the labor movement.

What shall we say of the man in industry who goes along for a period of time, dealing with honorable men and women in labor but who, when he sees that they are on the road to a solution of their common problems, double-crosses them and enters into an agreement, or creates a situation which strengthens and promotes communism? I have had that experience. I have worked with industry and helped to force the Communists into a corner and then I have discovered men in industry who were willing to take advantage of the opportunity to continue contractual relations with Communists and thereby give them a breathing spell in which to regain their strength.

That kind of dealing will not stand the test of time. Such leaders of industry will wake up some day to find that the leaders of labor, who proved they had the courage to stand up against almost unbearable pressure, have lost confidence in them and are unwilling to trust them again.

I have had some experience in saying "No," when it was extremely unpopular. I said it across the bay in Oakland a few years ago when a general strike was threatened. I told our people in Oakland that I did not care if we lost every member in the bay area, we would rather lose them than participate in a general strike, for all general strikes are revolutionary in character and philosophy. I say this not only to the Commonwealth Club, but I also say it to my own people. A general strike is revolution, and nothing but revolution.

My friends, when we in labor educate our people to practice honorable procedures, and when our people display the courage to stand up and be counted against communism, we do not like it when men associated with industry walk away from us when by so doing they can save themselves a few paltry dollars. Double-crossing will not stop communism in labor or anywhere else.

Yes; we in labor have had associates who forgot and disregarded their duty and their obligations to God and man. Industry has had them, too. There have been men in both labor and industry who transgressed the law, who entered into racketeering schemes and combinations. I remember not too many years ago when a New York labor leader was sent up the river to Sing Sing. I also remember that the man right across the corridor from him was Mr. Whitney of the New York Stock Exchange. It is neither fair, nor just, nor even intelligent, to hold all men in labor and in industry and business guilty and to condemn them all because a few have fallen by the wayside. I do not condemn the banking business because a banker occasionally forgets his trust. Nor should you condemn labor because, now and then, a labor leader proves faithless and foresworn.

How to meet the threat of communism concerns not only the people of America; it concerns all free peoples. Here in America the solution lies with those of us who are charged with the responsibility of striving and working together intelligently in this American system of free enterprise, under the finest government in all the world.

First, we must learn to understand each other. Those of us who direct the affairs of labor—to use the vernacular of the street—must have the guts to stand up within the ranks of labor for what we know to be right. Leaders of industry must also have that same qualification.

Industry cannot meet the issue by attempting to destroy the leadership of labor, for instance, by propagandizing the salaries which labor's leaders receive. That will not stop communism; that may build a Frankenstein to destroy us all.

If we believe in the philosophy of free American enterprise, and I believe in it—no man in this room believes in free enterprise more completely and sincerely than I do—then we must realize that if labor is to be represented ably and intelligently at the conference table, if it is to have leadership of high competence, based upon character, experience and brains, then, under our system of free enterprise, labor has the right—yes, the duty—to pay its representatives in accord with the same standards that industry has set for itself. I know an attorney in San Francisco, whose law firm receives a retainer fee of $250,000 a year to represent the interest of employers. Would any sane, fair-minded man insist that labor send a truck driver, earning $60 or $70 a week, untrained and inexperienced and with little knowledge of economics, or labor, or industrial problems, to sit across the conference table from this attorney? Would you think that fair? Does anyone believe that would solve our problems in America? No, it cannot.

There are a great many men in labor who could command much larger salaries if they were working for industry. Through the years industry has watched the leaders of labor carefully. Often, when it has found men of outstanding ability, it has offered them many times more than labor could afford to pay, and put them to work for industry. I offer no objection, for under our system it is each man's individual right to sell his services where and at a price that his own judgment dictates is to his best advantage and the advantage of his family. What I am trying to emphasize is this: do not tear down the outstanding leadership of labor which, under the test of time and in the crucible of action, has measured up to our American ideals. Do not tear such men down, for if you do, the consequences will come home some day to haunt you.

I wish that we had thousands of trained young men within the ranks of labor, not only in this country but throughout the world, striving for positions of leadership, of whom there was not the slightest question as to integrity, citizenship and belief in our economic system and our form of government. We never have trouble with that type of leadership in labor. Our trouble comes in labor from the men and women in positions of leadership who endorse communism, or through ignorance tolerate it. Communists believe the oath that they may take in a courtroom is not worth a snap of the fingers. They will place their right hand on the Holy Bible and swear to tell the truth, but since they do not believe in God, their oath is meaningless.

I am reminded of the university professor who says he is not a Communist, but who objects to taking an oath to that effect. My friends, I advocated within the American labor movement, within our own national convention, long years ago, that we stand up proudly and take the oath. For we are not Communists.

It is my opinion that a certain large percentage of those who object to taking the anti-Communist oath, or to signing such an obligation—and I want to make it plain that I am not referring alone to your problem in the California academic world—are more afraid of prosecution for perjury than of admitting they are Communists. I do not know what makes Communists among faculty members in our universities. It is over my head. But I want to make this statement: all crackpots are not in labor, there are a lot of them in the universities.

I had some small part, let me assure you, not only in getting rid of Communists at the University of Washington, but also along with my associates on the board of regents and in the president's office in initiating that action, and the Communists do not like it. I wish that I could say over the radio what I think about them.

My friends, we can solve the problem of communism in American labor only through honorable dealing between labor and industry.

Labor must come to realize that the man or woman who invests in business does not always find success and profits easy to obtain. I know there are many instances where the owners or managers of business, from time to time, sweat blood simply to meet the payroll. All men in business and industry are not rolling in wealth. Labor must realize that fact. We have a right, under our system of enterprise, to earn a bona fide, legitimate, and reasonable return upon capital investment, if we have the brains and ability to do so. I also believe the owners of industry have a right to plow back into their business sufficient money for expansion and growth, so that more jobs can be created and greater production made possible, for out of such expansion and employment comes the wealth of our country and the ever-improving standard of living for all of our people.

Neither labor nor industry has a right to enter into collusive action or conspiracy, for that will not stand the test of time. It contradicts the right of the great consuming public.

In this system of ours, free and open and unregulated competition no longer exists in many fields of endeavor. A man cannot invest his money in a new railroad, an air transportation company, or a trucking company and take his own chance, in open competition, of making a reasonable profit. He must first obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity, or some other form of regulatory permit which tends to control competition. That is a development which has come about over a long period of time.

I say to you in conclusion: The greatest Government ever founded in all the world is our American Government. Above everything else, above the rights of labor, or the rights of capital, or the rights of the individual, is our duty to our Government. We must always subordinate our interests to its welfare. Finally: If you want to solve the problem of communism in American labor unions, I beg of you to recognize character and ability and honorable dealing wherever you find it—in Government, in industry, or in labor. Thank you.

Party Chairman Tells Commies To Back Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Willard Edwards from the Washington Times-Herald of September 20, 1950:

PARTY CHAIRMAN TELLS COMMIES TO BACK TRUMAN

(By Willard Edwards)

The Communist Party of the United States has been put on notice by its chairman, William Z. Foster, that support of the Truman administration is the best means to obtain a Soviet America.

This is the studied opinion of a number of experts on Communist verbiage after examining a 10,000-word report by Foster in which he outlines a shift in policy, one of the sharp turns and twists which have featured Communist procedure in the last 17 years.

PRINTED IN BUCHAREST

The Foster document reached Capitol Hill recently. It was printed August 11 in Bucharest in the official organ of the Cominform, the Soviet propaganda agency. International directives are carried in this publication but a statement of American Communist policy has never been given such official recognition before.

Instead of the present all-out drive for communism in the United States, Foster called for support of a government "operating within the framework of a bourgeois state" which would have the support of labor and "curb the power of the monopolists."

A number of authorities, attaching deep significance to the cominform imprimatur, spent days in study of the Foster statement. Ex-Communist leaders were called in for an opinion. The final, unanimous agreement was that Foster, with the Kremlin's approval, was conveying a sensational change in policy for American Communists under cloak of the customary Communist double-talk and tortuous wording.

ANOTHER SHARP REVERSAL

Just as the American Communist Party switched suddenly from its "anti-imperialist war" stand on the day that Germany invaded Russia, calling loudly for America's entry into the war, now an equally sharp reversal has been ordered, the experts agreed.

Nowhere does the Foster statement directly call for support of the Truman regime. But a number of significant passages were noted which, to those acquainted with Communist procedure, point to such a conclusion.

Foster began his statement with a discussion of the recent trial of 11 Communist Party leaders which resulted in their conviction for conspiracy to teach and advocate the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence. He referred to a pamphlet, written by himself, which was introduced for the defense at the trial, which analyzed Communist Party policy since 1935.

WRITES APOLOGETICALLY

Paving the way for a change in this policy, Foster wrote apologetically in the Bucharest cominform publication:

"In view of the immensity, complexity and newness of the subject matter, certain errors and shortcomings could and did creep into it (the pamphlet). The most serious shortcomings, dealing with the policy of the American Communist Party, left a number of important propositions open to misunderstanding and distortion.

"I am writing this with the special purpose of clarifying and elaborating upon a number of questions."

Foster then paid tribute to the "tremendous political achievement, under the leadership of Stalin and Dimitrov," at the Communist international meeting in 1935 which called for "certain important changes in policy and action."

PLOTTED CHINESE REVOLUTION

"From it came the great Chinese revolution," he wrote, "the main line of which was stated by Stalin as long as 24 years back."

But, he added immediately, the rise of "people's democracies" (communism) in eastern Europe and China could obviously not be accomplished by the same tactics everywhere.

"Only political fools," he emphasized, "would try to apply rigid, uniform tactics to all these widely ranging situations."

The statement then turned to the American scene.

"It must be solidly emphasized," Foster wrote, "that our orientation is for a people's front government stated in terms adapted to American conditions. This clear policy is in its basic essentials valid for us now."

By a people's front government, Foster explained, he meant one supported by the labor unions.

ECONOMIC CRISIS NEEDED

"The trade unions and every other organization of the workers and their allies would have to throw their whole strength into the struggle for a people's front," he continued. "It may well be that the people's front movement in this country will develop at a very rapid speed.

"One of the most important factors is development of a deep economic crisis. It is possible in the United States, during such a time, to elect a coalition, anti-Fascist, anti-imperialist government."

Foster then explained that a "people's front" government would be compelled to move steadily toward communism.

"A people's front party," he wrote, "would have to orientate to the left or it would be destroyed. It would be compelled to attack monopolists in their economic, military, and political spheres.

NATIONALIZATION EMPHASIZED

"It would have to orientate toward nationalization of banks and industries, break-up of big landholdings, the beginning of a planned economy, elimination of reactionaries from all State institutions."

"Communists would defend such a government against reactionary efforts to overthrow it."

Such a people's front government, Foster continued, "operates within the framework of a bourgeois state, curbing the power of the monopolists."

This was not communism, he warned, but communism would evolve from such a government. And he added a sinister warning:

"Eventually, the Soviet Army must play the decisive role."

The Visitor Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my friends and colleagues an unusual little book entitled "The Visitor Speaks." This account, just off the press, should be of special interest in this Chamber, since it deals with the 36 distinguished guests from other lands who have addressed the Congress since 1800, when Washington became our Capital.

I am confident that each of us will find something of interest and of inspiration in this account, which has been prepared by two talented staff members of the Department of State, my very good friend, Dr. Andor C. Klay, and his collaborator, Walter T. Kamprad. The book was, of course, prepared on their own time and does not necessarily represent the views of the Department of State.

It is appropriate that this fascinating historical research is published in the year of the sesquicentennial of our Capital City. To give an idea of the scope and purpose of the book, I want to insert at this point the authors' introduction:

This book, the first of its kind, traces the birth of a typically American tradition.

Since 1800, when Washington became the Nation's Capital, many celebrated representatives of friendly nations have visited here as honored guests of the United States.

In the course of 150 years, 36 of these guests—representing 31 countries—were accorded the privilege of addressing the legislators of our Congress.

The first among them was General Lafayette, great son of France, beloved hero of the American Revolution, who spoke before the Congress in 1824. It was almost three decades later that the second, Louis Kossuth, exiled Governor of Hungary, romantic hero of a revolution similar in many ways to the American, appeared in Congress. Nearly another quarter century passed before David Kalakaua I, King of Hawaii, spoke before the assembled Houses.

These extraordinary guests of the Nation, whose gallery is presented on the following pages, range from king to commoner; from soldier to statesman and to rebel; from European to Asiatic, African, and Latin American. Some of them spoke no English; one of them could not speak at all when the time came to orate; some delivered resounding addresses and one spoke but five words; one of them had no title or public office and two of them were women.

Symbolized by these honored guests, the people of the world have marched through Washington, paying tribute to American freedom and thanking the people of America for their help and support.

The reader will recall from comparatively recent years the memorable address delivered by Winston Churchill in the Congress of the United States. But does he know who Ishii was? Can he tell why Bakhmetiev was here, or where Apponyi came from? Each was an important man with something interesting to say to the American people; each appraised us with the objectivity of the foreign observer, showing us how American freedom appeared when viewed from afar.

The purpose of this book is to recall the bygone; to re-create the forgotten; to outline the rapid growth of this Nation and this city from 1800 to 1950. It is the heartbeat of an ever-growing, ever-stronger, free, and democratic America that one can hear behind these pages, and it is with pride in our past, trust in our future, and confidence in our destiny that this little volume is offered to the reader.

Behind the Flying Saucers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. JENISON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, in these dangerous days when mass hysteria is created all too easily, there is an unfortunate amount of information—or misinformation—about so-called flying saucers. It has been difficult to obtain a forthright statement on the matter from those who should know, the Air Force, the Navy's air arm, or Governmental aeronautical experts.

In this vacuum of authoritative assertion, we now find a questioning public rushing to buy a book on the subject. Pathfinder magazine, in the science column of its current issue, reports it thus:

FLYING SAUCER RIDE

"No more flying saucers, I'm sorry," was the rueful, day-long chorus at Brentano's midtown bookshop in Washington, D. C., last Friday. "We had ordered only 50," explained one clerk, "and they were gone shortly after the store opened."

The same thing happened at a number of bookstores across the continent. It was an astonishing demonstration of word-of-mouth advertising. There had been almost no advance publicity for Behind the Flying Saucers, by Frank Scully (Henry Holt; New York). It also showed that many people were willing to believe (A) that space ships from another planet might have landed on earth and (B) that the United States Government might have kept such an epoch-making event secret.

This was Scully's story, and book reviewers were stuck with it. They could hardly help remembering that Scully was best known as humorist-author of another book called Fun in Bed, although he also contributes to Variety and once ran for lieutenant governor in California.

However, publisher's representatives vigorously denied that any monkey business was afoot. And in the book, Scully's tone was that of a man belligerently bent on being taken seriously. His story was that a group of magnetic research scientists, apparently working for the Government on a $1,000,000,000 secret budget, had investigated three flying disks forced down at different points across the Nation. These were unmistakably space ships, each manned by a crew of 36-inch-tall, non-terrestrial human beings, all killed in the landings. The Air Force, which was in on the discovery, promptly spirited away the dead little men and their ships, the largest of which was $99^{99}/_{100}$ feet in diameter, for further investigation.

The ships, according to Scully, seemed to be magnetically propelled. They were made of an alloy which resembled aluminum except that no tests could melt or break it. Each contained a "radio," the size of a pack of cigarettes, which beeped hourly in the key of C, but did nothing else. The little men, dressed identically in cloth of incredible toughness, wore wafer-thin watches.

All this was told Scully by a "magnetic scientist" he calls Dr. Gee, on whose trail he was set by a Denver radio man named Koehler. Dr. Gee couldn't explain why the Air Force should have declared the disk discoveries secret, except that he considered the question of magnetic propulsion very hot.

So does Scully, whom Dr. Gee apparently convinced that a magnetic ship could travel through the earth's atmosphere at 186,000 miles a second. Dr. Gee thought the visiting minikins came from Venus, which would be a mere 21 minutes away. He also gave Scully some inside dope on the use of a "Teneseope," a detector device (for spotting space ships anywhere in the earth's air envelope) which is so new the National Bureau of Standards hasn't even heard of it.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the public is entitled to know the truth of this matter in the language of the layman. We cannot afford hysteria in our present hour of defense peril. The public should not have to feed on doubt or conjecture. It seems to me it is time for our authorized aviation experts to speak up. Let us concede them and explain them or expose them and bury them.

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary, I ask permission to extend my remarks on the subject matter of S. 784.

Members of the House, heretofore not aware of the actualities in this case, may be interested to take note of this data. This case encompasses public interest for the reasons stated in the report of the House Judiciary Committee on this bill.

The just merits of this bill could not be adequately explained to the Members of the House on August 31, because the time allotted for debate on rule on S. 784 was used up "out of order" for subject matters not concerned with this bill.

The following data is based on the evidence set forth in House Report No. 2135, in re S. 784, published on May 25, 1950, which recommended that this bill do pass.

On page 9 of this report, the simple, common-sense terms of the operating agreement between the three companies and the Fleet Corporation are set forth; these agreements were entered into in midyear 1920 with the approval of the Shipping Board; these terms covenant a fair and reasonable consideration from one to the other; the three companies and the Fleet Corporation dealt with each other without interference in compliance with these terms during the entire period of the three companies' custody, physical operation and commercial use of the three vessels respectively from commencement of such custody to the termination of such custody in regard to each of the three vessels.

It may be recalled that in 1920, the Fleet Corporation had allocated to it by the Government through its agency, namely, the Shipping Board, the husbanding of all merchant marine vessels owned by the Government.

The Fleet Corporation maintained over 1,000 such vessels at public expense. Of these, it was forced to lay up in idleness at considerable expense, over 750 of the freight vessels, because it could find no business for them under its then current method of commercial operation.

The lay-ups were in effect an outright loss of public funds. Also, most of the seamen, namely, most of the ships' crews of laid-up vessels, were thrown out of employment.

A few hundred of these vessels, however, were being operated by the use of public funds, by the Fleet Corporation for the Government's account, to serve that part of the American commercial foreign trade which chose to or would give trade to these American-flag vessels.

The Fleet Corporation lost approximately an average of $11,000,000 per month of public funds during the fiscal year June 1920 to June 1921 as a result of this operation in cargo transportation of these commercially active Government freight vessels; this loss was the deficit created by the excess of the physical operating costs of these active vessels over the freight income which the vessels were able to obtain for their transporting services.

These aforesaid large losses of public funds included the fees and commissions which the Fleet Corporation paid out to its so-called managing agents to whom the Fleet Corporation allocated or turned over these active vessels for attention; these managing agents collected the freight moneys for the account of the Fleet Corporation which paid for all expenses and costs.

These managing agents did not risk any of the capital of their own in the operations; they were supplied all physical operating capital and costs of the vessels and needed supplies and all costs of maintenance of seaworthiness by the Fleet Corporation, which in turn received public funds from the Shipping Board, the Government's agency, to disburse such costs and overcome the monthly deficits. Schundler's agreements were beneficial to the Government in such ways as follows: Schundler's agreement with the Fleet Corporation was totally different from the agreements by which the aforementioned managing agents were employed.

First. By the operation of the three ships by his three companies, it kept the ships in active commercial use and made them available instantly as ready "spot vessels" for use and activity by the Fleet Corporation whenever needed, wherever needed.

Second. By the commercial operation of the three ships, it kept three American seamen ship crews employed and helped thereby basic American payrolls.

Third. It saved the costly lay-up in idleness of these three vessels, thus saving the Shipping Board's use of public funds for lay-up costs, while Mr. Schundler's companies operated the vessels. By his operation of the three ships by his companies he saved the Government a loss of considerably over $200,000 of public funds, as attested to by a qualified maritime expert of the Department of Justice, as cited on page 8 of report of the House Judiciary Committee.

If the Fleet Corporation had attempted to keep the ships in active commercial use and thus keep the ships and their seamen employed at the time while the three Schundler companies operated and used the three vessels, the Fleet Corporation would have lost, for the account of the Government, public funds exceeding $12,000 per month per trip ship.

On aforesaid page 8 of the House Report, it mentions the table entitled "United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, General Comptroller's Department—summary of specimen voyages in major trade routes from July 1, 1920, to April 30, 1921." This table showed that in the operation of 195 voyages of Shipping Board vessels, the loss of public funds was $5,849,385.21, or about $30,000 per ship voyage.

Schundler operated the three ships for nine voyages which would have resulted, according to afore-mentioned evidence, at that time in about a loss of $270,000 for the Government, from which loss Schundler effectively protected the Government.

Fourth. Mr. Schundler's companies' operation of the three ships brought about an income to the Government in the form of Federal taxes of $30,672.95 or a profit to the Government of about $3,400 per each ship voyage under Schundler's management. This is instead of a loss of about $30,000 a voyage, if the Fleet Corporation had operated the three vessels in commercial cargo transporting according to its then ordinary method.

The over-all picture of the Government's loss of public funds in the fiscal year of June 1920 to June 1921 is best illustrated by the Fleet Corporation's own official report to Congress, set forth on page 21 of the House Judiciary Committee's report. That evidence shows that, as a result of the excess of physical operating costs of cash over the income, the Fleet Corporation lost $133,111,706.38 for the fiscal year of 1920–21, or an average loss of public funds of over $11,000,000 per month during that period.

This proves the undeniable considerable advantage to the Government and the adequate consideration and value of the service which Schundler and his three companies rendered to the Shipping Board—the Government—when he agreed to keep the Shipping Board harmless of loss arising out of physical operating costs over income, namely, when he and his companies agreed to pay as charter-hire-rental of the three vessels in consideration for their commercial use, a sum of over $1,000 per day per ship, with the understanding that the resulting profits or losses were to be that of Schundler's companies.

Let us look at the resulting profits or losses which Schundler and his three companies made as a result of their operating agreement with the Fleet Corporation. As set forth in House Report No. 2135 of the House Judiciary Committee in re S. 784, on pages 11, 12, 13, and 14 thereof; to wit:

> The evidence on file in the case and in the Internal Revenue Bureau, proves that the companies did faithfully fulfill their operating agreement with the Board-Fleet Corporation; and as of January 5, 1921, their cash security funds, as hereinafter set forth, had fulfilled their purpose as a bond and were forthwith returnable.
> The Internal Revenue Bureau's report, reports the details of the companies' fulfillment of their operating agreement with the Board-Fleet Corporation, to wit:
> The companies had had the vessels in custody under their management and use, as follows:
> Two hundred and thirty-three days for the Independence, 166 days for the Hoxie, 104 days for the Scottsburg; i. e., total custody-days of 3 vessels, 503 days; the companies paid out during such custody for the entire physical operating costs, the sum total of $526,559.17.
> Therefore average paid by the companies for hire-rental for use per day per vessel, $1,046.83. This equals and is tantamount to the payment by the companies, for each vessel, of a hire-rental of $1,046.83 per day per vessel or over $31,000 per month per vessel.
> This constitutes a fair and equitable, reasonable value for the use of the vessels, as shown by exhaustive data in evidence on the maritime conditions prevailing 1920–21.
> This latter evidence was assembled at the suggestion of Commissioner Rammseyer, who is referred to in the report by Senator Gibson, dated May 3, 1936. The Commissioner had made inquiry as to the question of maritime conditions existing in 1920 and as to what would constitute a fair measure of the reasonable value of the use of the vessels. Detailed evidence on file in the case affirms the fact that the companies saved the Government's predecessors harmless from a loss which same would have made if same had had the vessels under their own control and custody and under their own management or that of their managing agents, and in commercial operation for the Board's own account and use at the Board-Fleet Corporation's own expenses in 1920 during the specific period while the companies did operate the three vessels for the companies' account at the companies' expense.

Thus, the Internal Revenue Bureau documented that Schundler and his companies had fulfilled their agreement to hold the Board harmless from the expense of physical operation, to wit: He and his companies paid out their own funds for the physical operation costs of the three vessels in the consolidated cash expenditure of $526,559.17, during the period of a few months in the last half year of 1920 while the companies did have the custody, management, and operation of the three vessels, and while, in consideration of their paying these costs of physical operating, the companies had the commercial use of the three vessels.

Their commercial use had consisted of transporting nine full cargoes of coal which brought in a consolidated freight income to the companies of $572,819.74; as evidenced thusly, the companies had expended and risked their own operating capital and had, as a result, made a consolidated gross operating profit of $46,260.57, being the excess of freight income from the companies' use of the vessels over the companies' expenditures for the cost of the "physical operation costs" of the vessels during the period of their custodies of the vessels.

Pursuant to the companies' operating agreement with the Board-Fleet Corporation, his operating profit or loss was the companies' concern; however, the Income Tax Bureau did not permit the three companies to make a consolidated return. Schundler's and his companies' loss in the operation of the Hoxie was $58,048.17. This remained exclusively their loss; this was the interpretation of the Tax Bureau in accordance with the operating agreement, namely, to keep the Shipping Board harmless of the physical operating cost, harmless from any loss resulting from freight income being less than the physical operating costs of a vessel. Schundler declared that he had expected that consolidated returns of the three companies could be made, but the Tax Bureau declined this, after consultations with the Shipping Board-Fleet Corporation.

The Internal Revenue Bureau assessed income taxes of $30,672.95 against the companies as the result of the ascertainment by the Tax Bureau of the following facts:

"The First National Steamship Co. or H. O. Schundler, on its behalf, expended for the physical operating expenses of the Independence, the sum of $248,377.68 and collected freight revenue from such operation of $317,319.60, and thus made a gross profit of $68,941.92, from the operation of the Independence.

"The Second National Steamship Co. or H. O. Schundler, on its behalf, expended for the physical operating expenses of the Hoxie, the sum of $154,888.51, and collected freight revenue from such operation of $96,840.34, and thus sustained a loss of $58,048.17, from the operation of the Hoxie.

"The Third National Steamship Co. or H. O. Schundler, on its behalf, expended for the physical operating expenses of the Scottsburg, the sum of $123,292.98, and collected freight revenue from such operation of $158,659.80, and thus made a gross profit of $35,366.82 from the operation of the Scottsburg.

"The tax assessed against the First National Steamship Co. was $20,271.75, based on profits of $68,941.92 from the operations of the steamship Independence.

"The tax assessed against the Third National Steamship Co. was $10,401.20, based on profits of $35,366.82 from the operations of the steamship Scottsburg."

Thus the total taxes were $30,672.95.

There was no tax assessed against the Second National Steamship Co. based on the operations of the steamship Hoxie, as there were no profits from the Hoxie operation, but a loss of $58,048.17 (there remained Schundler's and his companies' loss, pursuant to the terms of the operating contract).

Therefore, the concluding fact is that: The Internal Revenue Bureau assessed income taxes of $30,672.95 against the companies, and this constitutes the Government's income from this transaction without having had to risk any ship-operating capital.

The fact remains that when deducting these taxes of $30,672.95 from the three companies' consolidated gross operating profits of $46,260.57, there remains, as apparent income of Schundler and his three companies, the sum of $15,587.62 from this transaction.

The following status of accounts, as set forth in each of the congressional reports and reported by each as the factual status, came into existence as of January 5, 1921, as a consequence of the Shipping Board's action in late 1920, to wit, by the withdrawing of the vessels from the companies after same had had the custody and operation and use of each of the three vessels for a few months during the last half year of 1920.

On January 5, 1921, the total sum of $634,256.26 became due and refundable to the petitioning companies.

Of this aforesaid total sum, $538,048.23 thereof was cash deposited with the Shipping Board-Fleet Corporation as a security and bond and as a guaranty for the fulfillment of the agreement of the companies to hold the United States Shipping Board harmless from the expense of physical operation of the three Government cargo vessels while these vessels were in the custody and under the management and operation of the companies and while the companies had the commercial use of the vessels in consideration thereof.

The balance of aforesaid total sum, namely, $96,208.03 thereof, was, per agreement, reimbursable to the companies as of the aforementioned same date; it was a net difference in favor of the companies of certain debits and credits resulting from disbursement accounts between the Fleet Corporation and the companies, and fully agreed upon between both parties, as set forth.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Tax Court of Appeals, after consultations with the Shipping Board as shown in evidence by its report hereon, shows that the taxes were assessed in accordance with the terms of Schundler's operating agreement with the Board-Fleet Corporation and were predicated on the companies' receiving a full return for their deposits, i. e., $538,648.23, and full reimbursement of $96,201.23, being the heretofore stated net difference in favor of the companies of disbursing accounts pro and con between Schundler and the Fleet Corporation.

Thus, an independent agency of the United States, i. e., the United States Board of Tax Appeals, had determined the results of the transaction here involved and the net income of the First and Third National Steamship Co.'s and the net loss of the Second National Steamship Co. from their operations of the three subject vessels, and this determination was based upon a thorough investigation of the facts involved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who had referred to all records and acted at the instance of and with the help of the Shipping Board-Fleet Corporation, as the evidence in the record shows.

This, therefore, proves that Schundler and his three companies as a consolidated operating profit made $15,587.62 as the gross sum total in exchange for their excellent faithful performance of their operating agreements with the Fleet Corporation, and in order to make this profit, they risked their cash operating capital paying out a total of $526,559.17, and in addition thereto, they tied up over half a million dollars of their capital funds as a cash security bond—$583,048.03—to guarantee their performance of these agreements, by placing these funds in good faith, into the escrow custody of the Fleet Corporation pending the termination of their operating agreement with the Fleet Corporation.

It is very pertinent to note that Schundler, if he had become active under the standard Shipping Board managing agency contract used by the Fleet Corporation in 1920, would have been better off; he would have made a fee of $17,184 without tie-up of his cash bond deposit and without risk of his cash operating capital.

Had Schundler been a standard managing agent of the Fleet Corporation, he need not have put up as a security the cash deposit of $538,048.23 as a bond to guarantee his undertaking and that of his three companies; Schundler and his companies would not have had to pay out and risk $526,559.17 of their cash operating capital and Schundler need not have had the trouble of any pro and con disbursement accounts; the Fleet Corporation would have had to supply all consumable supplies and fuel oil and radio service, at its expense with public funds, as part of the physical operating costs; the Board-Fleet Corporation would have had disbursed by the use of public funds for the Government's account as owners the fixed costs of improvements and seaworthiness and owner's hull and total loss insurance, as a matter of course, because these fixed expenses are the owner's own expenses irrespective whether vessels are idle or active.

The iniquity, the injustice of not returning these cash bond funds to the companies in early 1921, when the operating agreements had terminated and faithful performance of their operating agreement had been made by the companies, must become clear to any intelligent examiner.

The sham shallowness, the unjustifiable fallacies of the invalid objections and contentions alleged as adverse to the purpose of S. 784, become glaringly apparent when the service rendered by Schundler and his companies, as evidenced by the above data, is examined.

It is noteworthy that the companies and the Fleet Corporation behaved on the basis of the operating agreements, toward each other, during 1920 and early 1921 without interference as from one to the other, during the entire period of the companies' custody and operation and use of the vessels. These periods were evidenced as follows: Steamship Independence, May 17, 1920, to January 5, 1921; steamship Hoxie, June 2, 1920, to November 15, 1920; steamship Scotsburgh, September 23, 1920, to January 5, 1921.

The evidence proves that the companies returned to the Board-Fleet Corporation when and where so requested by the Board, the Government's property, namely, the three freight vessels, in proper order, without hindrance or delay.

However, the Fleet Corporation did not return in early 1921 when due, the companies' cash property and reimbursements amounting to $634,256.26 in proper order; on the contrary, not until 1935 was $250,000 returned to the companies by the Fleet Corporation; and as of the present, September 1950, the precisely determined stated balance of $384,256.26 has not yet been returned to the companies but is still being withheld by the Government, without warranty or right.

The House Judiciary Committee of this Congress as a result of a review of the evidence in this case by a majority of the Members who made an adequate study of facts, determined that the return of the balance of the cash bond of these companies, ascertained as precisely a balance of $384,256.26, is undisputably due to the companies.

The bill S. 784 is a thoroughly warranted legislation which should be enacted into law in order to do justice, in order to comply with morality, equity, and constitutional law, and as a matter of integrity and honesty required of our Government in dealing with a citizen, who rendered efficient and faithful service.

As set forth so pointedly, in the Judiciary Committee's report on page 17 there to wit:

It is pertinent to remark that Schundler and his companies undeniably rendered a distinct service to the United States Government in saving the United States Government harmless from a serious loss during the period that his companies and he had the vessels under their management, custody, operation, and use. That his companies and he have been treated unjustly to date is undeniable.

And as so clearly stated on page 19 of the report, namely:

The Senate bill, S. 784, will correct the injustice inflicted on the companies for so many years.

In conclusion, the following excerpts from pages 16 and 17 of the report of the House Judiciary Committee in re S. 784, are noteworthy:

The evidence supporting the statements herein are on file with the Judiciary Committee and are on record with the Supreme Court, the Court of Claims, the District Court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the Archives Office, and are available on call for perusal. The evidence is complete and exhaustive and there remains no reason for any misinterpretation of any fact in this case. The evidence includes the attestations obtained by Attorneys General, by the Internal Revenue Bureau, and by congressional committees, from former officials of the Shipping Board-Fleet Corporation, who were in charge of the subject matter in 1920–21, for the Board-Fleet Corporation; this evidence was transmitted by the Senate's direction into the court records, subject to rebuttal. Those of the former officials who became available testified in court and none of the statements made in their affidavits were rebutted. Their attestations and testimony supported the companies' claim in every respect. Their attestations are set forth in full in congressional report (H. Rept. 3005), and include the statements and testimony of the late Captain Foley (U. S. Navy, 1920), referred to by former Attorney General Cummings in his message to Congress, and who was the Director of Operations of the Board-Fleet Corporation; it also includes the statements and/or testimony of W. W. Nottingham, assistant general counsel of the Board in 1920 and until 1926; J. H. Philbin, ship-sales manager and vice president of the Fleet Corporation, 1920 until 1927; R. C. Wells, statistical assistant to the Board in 1920. (H. Rept. No. 3005, pp. 10–12, 28–31, 30–31, 32–34.)

(It is noteworthy that in early 1921 Admiral Benson appointed a committee consisting of the then Commissioner Frederick I. Thompson, Commander A. B. Clements, who was the special assistant of Admiral Benson, Hon. W. W. Nottingham, assistant general counsel of the Board-Fleet Corporation, and Hon. J. A. Philbin, ship sales manager and vice president of the Fleet Corporation for many years. This committee directed in early 1921 the escrowed cash funds to be returned to the companies and set up the formula of accounting of disbursements in keeping with the operating contract, and it is this method which the internal revenue applied in its determinations. The directive of this committee was not carried out by the Fleet Corporation at that time and failure to do so became the commencement of the delay in the return of the funds due the companies.)

There never was any reason for confusion on any circumstance in this case, there does not remain any excuse for misunderstanding of any phase of the subject matter; the evidence on record is comprehensive, exhaustive, and complete; any item or its status, if for any reason not clear to anyone, can be clarified by study of the evidence on file in the record.

This is the first time in the history of the case that all the evidence in its assembled and probative form has come to the House Judiciary Committee for its analysis.

It is readily discernible to any intelligent examiner, that the procrastination in this case was brought about by contentions made by the Maritime Commission and its predecessors; these contentions have been proven as invalid and nonjustifiable objections. Every Member of the House who becomes aware of the probative facts in this case, will no doubt, emphatically support the proposed legislation, S. 784, as a measure of justice, long overdue.

On page 3 of the House report, the following comment of the committee is noteworthy:

The Senators of the Eightieth Congress and the Senators of the Eighty-first Congress have expressed their approval of the bill by voting for same by unanimous consent. The Members of the House of Representatives are warranted in subscribing and in approving the judgment of the other Chamber of Congress.

The Gun Gap

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Reporter, a fortnightly magazine of facts and ideas, of September 12, 1950:

THE GUN GAP

It has become standard refrain in the sermons of our Jeremiahs: We have 12 divisions against the Russians' 175, a few thousand tanks against more than forty thousand. A few thousand modern planes against nineteen thousand. These figures have become particularly night-marish since they were proclaimed in Parliament by that Jeremiah in chief, Winston Churchill.

Only a few months ago—just last spring in fact—one of the main worries of our policymakers was the dollar gap. Our national economy was growing too fast for its own good and for the good of the rest of the world. As a result foreign nations had great difficulty selling us anything or buying anything from us. The Korean aggression has dramatized another case of overproduction. Soviet Russia has—so it seems—produced so many guns and tanks and planes and snorkel submarines that only with a gigantic effort of total mobilization, lasting several years, can the countries of the western alliance hope substantially to narrow or close the gun gap.

Unquestionably, the Jeremiahs have a formidable case. The picture they paint is gloomy enough, yet an even gloomier and more realistic one can be painted, for we should all know by now that Soviet Russia is using several powerful nonmilitary weapons in its systematic campaign for the conquest of the world. In fact, it is rather naive to think that the only form of Russian aggression is to set Red satellite divisions marching, North Korea style, against some weak nation on the perimeter of the Russian empire.

At present the Communist nonmilitary offensive is aimed at the individual—every man and woman who cannot accept the idea of a new war and who is looking for some form of personal exemption. With their drive for new members or with their so-called peace petition, the Communists corner the frightened and bewildered, extract their signatures, and promise in exchange if not peace in the world at least a measure of personal peace the day communism takes over.

The Jeremiahs who bewail our lack of arms sometimes forget that the Communists have become extraordinarily cunning at the art of unnerving, man by man, the people who are supposed to bear arms. They have been particularly skillful in western Europe, where people have gone through too much. The result is called neutralism. Actually, European neutralism is a naive, pathetic expression of the anguish of European individuals who see the next test coming and beg to be left out. More than a policy it is an individual state of mind. And more than a state of mind it is a reaction of the flesh.

WHERE OUR GOVERNMENT WAS RIGHT

Our Government might have miscalculated the Communists' readiness to fight; it might have misjudged the amount and the quality of their arms. But certainly it did not need the Stockholm petition to realize that despair is the best ally of communism. Since the end of the war, the United States has done something more than feed hungry foreign people. It has learned, through the ECA, the first rudimentary notions on how to work on the economy of other countries, speed the machinery of production, reduce unemployment, stabilize the rates of exchange, increase exports. ECA missions have done all this—not as colonial masters, but in the closest possible cooperation with local national, business, and trade-union leaders. Of course, quite a number of ECA representatives have been gullible and indiscriminate in their associations and friendships; yet the job that ECA has done in a little over 2 years has been so striking that the Russians have launched all their offensives, political and military, against what they call the "Marshallized" countries.

After Secretary Marshall's Harvard speech, the main aim of our Government's foreign policy was to reduce and finally to close the dollar gap. We were not happy to be forever outproducing other countries and wanted the friendly nations to catch up with us and trade us the products they were the most fit to produce. This was our policy—what the Communists call the warmongering policy of American imperialism.

Then on June 25 another nation, Soviet Russia, that had been outproducing the rest of the world in its kind of products—weapons—launched its export drive of blazing guns and robotized men.

That rude jolt taught us and our allies quite a few lessons. We suddenly realized that our military weakness had been too tempting to the Communists and that they were aiming not only to conquer South Korea but to unleash a shattering wave of fear in the world that would pave the way to other conquests. It became clear that we as well as our allies had to produce far more weapons and train a very large number of men to handle these weapons. Some people, particularly in Congress, have gone so far that they now consider that all other expenses for foreign rehabilitation and assistance are sheer waste, and that the only thing to do is to produce tanks and guns and planes, prayerfully hoping that Joseph Stalin will kindly wait a few years and let us close the gun gap.

OUR WEAPONS AND RUSSIA'S

If we follow this policy, we shall be entering the kind of competition with Russia that would multiply rather than solve our difficulties. For we need allies in our struggle with international communism; we need men all over the non-Communist world who not only can manufacture weapons but, if need be, use them with steady hearts, with the firm knowledge that the defense of their countries is the only way of defending their personal lot—without any yearning for indulgence or escape. We cannot expect any real help from mercenaries or from captive armies brought to our side by anti-Stalinist chieftains. We need, in our country and in the countries that are with us, well-trained armies of citizen-soldiers ready to fight for the defense of their citizenship.

If we are to win this struggle, the work to improve the economic and political conditions of the people on our side must become immensely more effective and articulate. Now, in western Europe there is no longer any talk of a dollar gap, and war matériel is once more being produced in ever-increasing quantity. This gives the old predatory interests all over the continent a golden opportunity to extract fat contracts from their governments, ultimately to be paid for by the American taxpayer. They are the same interests who have for decades sedulously prevented the large-scale production of consumer goods so as to enjoy the advantages of huge profits and of cheap labor. This is exactly the time when ECA missions are most needed in Europe to see that American money is not wasted or siphoned into the pockets of the most selfish business leaders. Too much of it has disappeared that way already. The ECA representatives must see to it that war contracts go to healthy industries, that war production in the various countries intensifies the process of European economic integration, and that the people's standard of living is raised. In narrowing the gun gap we must attack the causes that have created the dollar gap. Weapons manufactured by workers who do not enjoy a decent living, have no real bargaining power, and are too harassed or ignorant to care about their rights of citizenship ultimately turn out to be of very limited use.

Since the end of hostilities we have been living in a strange twilight between war and peace, war economy and peace economy, conversion and reconversion. At home so far we have managed well. In spite of all the prophets of impending bust we are steering a middle course between boom and crash—for the New Deal taught us to ballast the booms and cushion the crashes. This democratic capitalism of ours has proved to have more resilience than our wise economists could ever have foreseen. Yet, powerful as it is, it cannot buy us out of the Communist menace. It must become closely interlocked with healthy economic systems in the nations on our side. Now our missions abroad must see to it that during the conversion to war production the level of civilian welfare is raised at the same rate as the production of military weapons is increased.

Otherwise we lose, for without allies we cannot stand. The weapons manufactured in Europe with our money will eventually fall into the hands of the Communists, if the large majority of European workers and soldiers do not regain the sense of the stake they have in their countries' freedom. Indeed, it is not the number of Russian tanks that is so frightening, but the prospect of how lonely and friendless we should be if we entrusted our safety only to the guns we can make and the divisions we can raise.

We must be prepared to tighten our belts more than we did during the last war: We have many fronts to defend—military, political, and economic—and they all demand sacrifices. Unlike the enemy we do not use slave labor. We can never neglect the basic needs of man—man as producer, consumer, citizen, soldier. The unit of what makes our strength is man, and the kind of man on whom we can count is as good as his sense of freedom—his capacity to work and fight for it. Given our late start, we cannot easily compete with the Russian Empire in the sheer production of weapons. We must acquire enough strength to discourage political and military aggression while we must start releasing among our own and the allied people that kind of unbreakable strength which the enemy will never match.

In their brutish conception of force the Communists cannot think of anything better than production of guns and the dissemination of fear. Some day the unfortunate people on the other side will realize that they are the main victims of the weapons they overproduce, and that they cannot eat guns.

Norris E. Dodd

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has a number of important auxiliary organizations. Of these certainly one of the most important, if not the most important, is the Food and Agriculture Organization, usually referred to as FAO. FAO deals with subjects of universal interest. Food is of direct concern to every human being and 80 percent of the world's people are engaged in agriculture. I was present at the initial meeting of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations at Quebec in the fall of 1945 and I have attended most of the annual meetings since that time in the capacity of congressional adviser to the United States delegation and have kept in close touch with its progress and activities.

I have been particularly interested in the work of this great organization since Norris E. Dodd became its Director General. Mr. Dodd, whom I have known for a great many years, assumed this important position with a fine background of experience. He was a successful businessman and farmer before he came to the Department of Agriculture a number of years ago. His record in the Departman was outstanding. He quickly became known as one of its most competent executives and at the time he resigned to assume his present position as Director General of the FAO, he was Under Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. Dodd's service in the Department of Agriculture covered a period which marked a tremendous advance in agriculture production. He was there during the war years when American farmers expanded their production by more than one-third. Prior to the war, he helped initiate and work out the agricultural adjustment programs which are still an important part of Government agricultural policy in this country.

During my 24 years as a Member of Congress, I have maintained close touch with the Department of Agriculture. I have known many men there who were distinguished and capable public servants. There are many such there today but I can think of no one during that period whom I hold in higher regard or for whose work I have a greater admiration than Mr. Dodd. During his long service with the Department of Agriculture Mr. Dodd not only became familiar with American agriculture but with world agriculture as well. He was closely in touch with FAO activities from the beginning. With this background it is not surprising that Mr. Dodd has successfully met the great problems which have confronted him as Director General of the FAO during the past 2 years. He has been a good executive. He has thoroughly familiarized himself with world agricultural conditions and has spent a considerable amount of his time in making first-hand contact with agriculture and agricultural producers in all parts of the world.

Shortly the headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization will be moved to Rome under a decision made at the last annual meeting. While many of us would have preferred to have seen FAO headquarters remain in Washington, the fact that this move is being made should not lessen our interest in the work of this great organization. We know that as long as Ed Dodd is at its head the FAO will continue to grow and progress. At this particular time when the organization is just beginning to carry out its tremendous responsibility under the point 4 program, it is especially important that a man with the capacity and experience of Mr. Dodd continue his position of leadership. I therefore hope that he will find it possible to carry on as Director General until the organization is well established in its new home and its point 4 program has successfully gotten under way.

General Fellers Presents Sound Reasoning in Article on Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, the article in Colliers' magazine of September 16 entitled "How We Can Lick Stalin," written by Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers, United States Army (retired), has occasioned a great deal of thoughtful reaction. Among the many who have found it an informed and stimulating discussion is Mr. Joseph H. Barnhart, an attorney at Danville, Ill., long a leading citizen and public figure, and one of the close personal associates of the famed fellow townsman, the Honorable Joseph G. "Uncle Joe" Cannon, for 46 years a distinguished Member of this body and for 8 years its Speaker.

Mr. Barnhart has contributed a guest editorial on the subject of General Fellers' article to the editorial page of the Danville Commercial News. Under permission granted by the House, I am including it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the value it has for every Member. It follows:

GENERAL FELLERS PRESENTS SOUND REASONING IN ARTICLE ON RUSSIA

(By Joseph H. Barnhart)

Vermillion County's distinguished soldier-citizen, Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers, United States Army, retired, is author of a magazine article in the September 16 issue of Colliers which is calculated to send the cold shivers down the backs of a complacent citizenry. The boy from Ridgefarm who attended the United States Military Academy, by appointment of Uncle Joe Cannon, and then set out to make a name for himself as a dependable soldier, knifes into our blissful ignorance of world conditions like a thunderbolt slicing a Chinese elm.

You may disagree with General Fellers if you wish, but disregard what he says we dare not, as individuals and as a nation. A man of his reputation, who was on General MacArthur's staff when Japan surrendered, would scarcely dare make such stunning statements unless he knew what he was talking about. Yet, from the first short paragraph of three brief sentences until the last word, the article sounds like good American horse sense.

In fact, such good horse sense is it that one is led to conclude that General Fellers might be all wrong about his deductions, and yet what he advocates for us to do is sound—bedrock sound, and in the very best American tradition of daring, of courage, and initiative.

Now that disposes of the negative possibility. The other possibility is that he is right. His thesis is very simple. Stated in a few words it is this: America and Europe combined cannot send a ground army against the Red horde whose numbers would total more than one-fourth to one-third of the Red Army. Therefore, we had best exploit our alternative, which is to fight Russia with two effective weapons: (1) air power, and (2) the truth.

And whether you agree or disagree with his conclusions about our Ground Forces' maximum potential, his proposal that we prepare in the air and that we break the iron curtain with definite propaganda moves is sound.

Just to strengthen his whole statement, consider that General Fellers is a West Point graduate. What reason would he possibly have for understimating American manpower? His article reveals the arguments of a patriot who places the will to win on the high plane of something worth fighting for. So he ranks the strength of an intangible weapon like propaganda alongside the more tangible strength of air power. This hardly smacks of the jingo, or the professional soldier on a military bender.

His article deserves calm reading, intelligent discussion, and demands prompt Government action. He has reasons for believing that while we prepare our air defense, we can also do some fast and effective talking. He says that there are millions of disgruntled Russians who long for peace and for freedom. We always suspected as much, but General Fellers cites a case in point that verifies this. He says Russia is ripe for internal dissension, and that there has been more of it than the outside world knows about.

General Fellers has also spotted the possibility which General Patton foresaw shortly before his death—that Russia plans to bleed Europe and America white by having us fight one satellite nation after another, using up a couple of divisions here, a half dozen there, until we are helpless before Russian manpower superiority. It is high time somebody pointed out to us all the possibilities in the present dangerous situation—somebody like the General who is bold enough to argue not from the best but from the worst possible case, just on the possibility that we need a real eye-opener.

Thanks to General Fellers, we have an estimate of our weakness as well as of our strength. But that is not the whole story. Hats off to a man who values the power of right speaking so highly in these critical days. America is too prone to trust her physical resources, her production potential, her inventive genius. Is that all that is to save us? If so, why not put a robot army in the field? Why shed good blood to prove we can out-produce Russia?

General Fellers has hit the right note. Let's put our trust into our words. Ten years ago Mussolini and Hitler publicly abused freedom in their speeches; but freedom of human spirit triumphed over them. Do we really imagine that we must bomb Russia for the triumph of the human spirit? We may have to, yes—but only when freedom's voice has shrunk to too thin a pipe, and free men are too few or too unconvinced to care that many are still in slavery to untruth.

Address of Hon. J. Vaughan Gary of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address of the Honorable J. VAUGHAN GARY, of Virginia, delivered at the commencement exercises of the University of Florida on September 2, 1950:

Mr. President, members of the faculty, members of the graduating class, ladies and gentlemen, I deem it a high honor and I assure you that it is a very great pleasure to be permitted to participate in your exercises on this occasion. I have known your president for a long time. As a fellow alumnus of another great institution, I have watched his progress with interest and pride, and I rejoice that notwithstanding his brilliant success and flattering opportunity in the North, he decided to devote his energy, ability, and talents to the development of this great southern university. The South needs men of his stature.

I love the State of Florida. Next to the Old Dominion, it is my favorite State. I cherish the friendship of the members of the outstanding delegation which represents your State in the halls of the Congress. Practically all of them are alumni of this institution, which has every right to be proud of their records, for in my judgment no State is more ably represented.

However, my task this evening is not an easy one. I would like to paint for you a rosy picture of an attractive world which you will enter when you leave these cloistered halls. But, unfortunately, the world at the present time presents a rather dismal picture.

There are wars and rumors of wars, debts and deficits, taxes and more taxes. The many complex problems with which we are confronted, however, present a challenge to the college graduate of today.

I well remember some years ago when my class, like yours, was graduating into a world of turmoil and strife. We thought then, of course, that we had the answer to all of the problems. I must confess now, however, that my generation does not have a record of which it can be too proud. We have experienced a major depression and two world wars, a cold war, a warm war, and now face the prospect of a third hot war.

We longed for peace, and I am certain that you want your world to be a world of peace. There can be no guaranty of life, liberty, or the pursuit of happiness in a world which is constantly in the throes of war.

Those of us who participated in World War I were fired with the promise and hope that it was a war to end all wars. Our great leader, the immortal Woodrow Wilson, labored diligently to make that hope a reality. After the victory he broke all precedents and attended the peace conference in Paris in person, where he made many concessions in order that he might attain the establishment of a league of nations to stop aggression and to preserve peace. Having concluded agreements with other world powers for the creation of such an organization, he returned home to witness the repudiation of the league by the United States Senate, which was required to ratify it.

We then embarked upon a policy of isolationism. "We care not what course others may take," we said, "but in the future we will take no part in the disputes of other nations, and never again will we send our American boys to fight on foreign soil."

With a broad expanse of ocean upon either side, we lulled ourselves into a sense of false security. We sat idly by as Japan moved into Manchuria. We made no protest when Italy took over Ethiopia. We permitted Hitler to enter the Ruhr. We were against aggression, but we took no steps against the aggressor. We soon found ourselves drawn, against our will, into another foreign war, and again sending our boys by the millions to foreign fields of battle.

Surely, we thought, the misery and destruction of World War II will bring men to their senses and pave the way for a program of world peace. The technique of war had been developed to the point of threatening the destruction of our entire civilization.

The time had come to develop a technique for peace. This was the objective of the United Nations. When 51 nations with different languages, different customs, different ideologies and conflicting interests met in San Francisco in 1945, and agreed upon a charter, we entertained high hopes that at long last the foundations had been laid upon which the superstructure of world peace might be erected in the years to come.

The Charter contemplated that the organization would be further implemented by other instrumentalities for the promotion of peace and better understanding among nations.

It provided for a world court for the adjudication and settlement of international disputes. It anticipated a world police force for the suppression of aggression.

But there is one nation that does not want peace. Its leaders seek world domination.

It was my privilege to visit Europe late in the fall of 1947 as a member of a congressional committee, and even then I was impressed with the fact that the leaders of the Soviet Union had embarked upon a definite program of world conquest. In every country that we visited from England to Turkey, there was coming from behind the iron curtain a vicious line of Communist propaganda against the United States and the free countries of Europe. The United States was being depicted as a warmonger nation.

The Marshall plan was then merely in the stage of discussion and the free countries of Europe were being told that it was a scheme of capitalistic America to gain control of their economy and to enslave their people. There were many then in Europe who were willing to wager on the beginning of a third world war within 6 months.

An effective world organization did not fit into the Soviet plan of world conquest and by use of the veto practically every effort to implement and strengthen the United Nations has been blocked.

The Communists attempted at first to extend their dominion by infiltration, intrigue, and treachery. Finally, finding themselves blocked from further encroachments by those methods, they have now resorted to force of arms.

When on June 25, the armed forces of Korea crossed the thirty-eighth parallel they committed an act of aggression which threatens the security of every free nation. This breach of the peace was met with prompt and bold action.

At the time of the attack, a United Nations Commission made up of representatives of seven nations was in the Republic of Korea. Within a few hours after the invasion was launched, the Commission reported to the United Nations that the attack had come without warning and without provocation. The Security Council of the United Nations convened in New York at the request of the United States just 24 hours after the attack began, and passed a resolution which called for the immediate cessation of hostilities and for the withdrawal of the invading troops to the thirty-eighth parallel. The resolution requested the members of the United Nations to refrain from giving aid to the northern aggressors and to assist in the execution of the resolution.

Immediately upon the adoption of this resolution, in compliance with its terms, the United States sent aid to the South Koreans. Thus commenced a historical engagement in which a police force of the United Nations supported by 52 of the 59 member nations attempted to suppress a breach of the peace of the world.

This situation poses many uncertainties and raises questions of grave import.

The Korean situation as an isolated incident is relatively unimportant. Already those in command have reported that the armed forces of the United Nations have the situation under control and that a change in the tide of battle may soon be expected. We must recognize, however, that this is but a segment of the Soviet pattern of world conquest. If the decisive action of the United Nations does isolate the incident and deter further acts of aggression, the faith of its founders will have been justified and there will be some encouragement to look forward to an era of peace.

But what if the Chinese Communists now mobilized along the Manchurian border should come to the aid of the North Koreans?

What if there is an attack on the island of Formosa or an outbreak in Germany, or in the Middle East?

What if Russia herself should enter the conflict?

Can we wage war in various parts of the world without exhausting our resources and disrupting our national economy to the point that our own shores will be vulnerable to attack? Even now we have a national debt of $258,000,000,000 which will be increased $10,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000 by the anticipated deficit of the present fiscal year.

On the other hand, whatever the cost, can we permit Russia to take over the weaker nations one by one when we are convinced that eventually her entire power and resources will be turned against us?

If there is another outbreak, should we change our long-established policy and attack the instigator of the disturbances so that we will be able to determine the time and field of battle?

I raise these questions not for the purpose of answering them, because frankly I do not know the answers.

For the immediate future, in my judgment, our course of action is reasonably clear. We must continue to support and strengthen the United Nations, for that constitutes our only hope of eventually securing an enduring peace.

We must continue for the time being our economic aid to the countries of Europe. It has been my privilege during the past 2 years to serve as chairman of the special subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee which handles the foreign-aid appropriations. In my judgment no money has been spent which has paid greater dividends to the American people. The Marshall plan has been a major factor in checking the spread of communism in Europe, and the free countries of that Continent have been rehabilitated and strengthened to the point that they can effectively assist in the maintenance of peace.

We must, however, also increase their military strength by speeding up our program of military assistance.

And last but by no means least, we must augment our program of national defense so that we will be able to meet whatever emergency may arise. But while we prepare for war may we ever keep our eyes fixed on the goal of peace.

You will find that your world into which you are now being graduated is a highly scientific world. We have made remarkable progress in all branches of science in recent years. Our knowledge of the universe has so increased that some wag has suggested that we might change the poem:

> Twinkle, twinkle, little star
> How I wonder what you are.

To read:

> Twinkle, twinkle, little star
> Now we all know what you are > Fumes of sulfur,
> Flames of tin
> And incandescent hydrogen.

We have learned to harness the forces of nature for the service of man, but the same discoveries which have opened to us avenues of benefits untold have also disclosed methods of destruction which threaten our existence.

One of the most interesting meetings which I have attended during the 5 years which I have been in Washington took place shortly after the close of World War II. Ten or twelve of the scientists who had perfected the atomic bomb met with Members of Congress and gave us such information as they were permitted to divulge at that time. They informed us that there were about 1,000 physicists in the United States who were familiar with the principals of nuclear energy.

They said that the entire group were in unanimous agreement on three points.

First, they unanimously agreed that there is no defense to the atomic bomb;

Second, that the atomic bomb can be controlled only at the world level; and,

Third, that unless it is controlled at the world level, no nation can be secure from complete annihilation at any time.

We were discussing in the Congress at the time the question of guarding the secrets of the atomic bomb. They said that we were merely wasting time because, regardless of what steps we should take, sooner or later every nation would know the secrets of the bomb and no nation could retain a monopoly of its use. Moreover, they said do not think in terms of a bomb that will destroy 6 square miles, as at Hiroshima, but think rather of one with a destructive power of 100 square miles.

These were by no means comforting words, and yet in contrast, I mention a recent conversation with a physicist from the atomic laboratory at Oak Ridge, which is engaged in developing atomic energy for peacetime purposes. He narrated how atomic cocktails are being used with amazing results in the diagnosis and treatment of diseases. In his judgment the future will reveal untold uses of atomic energy for man's welfare. It is a challenging undertaking for your generation to find the solution to the problem of permitting the world to enjoy the benefits of scientific research without constant fear of extermination.

In conclusion, may I express the fervent hope that your world will remain a place of opportunity. There are many today who seek to substitute security for opportunity in our economic and social order. Our Nation was not developed on the basis of security. When our forefathers first landed on the shores of the New World they built shelters for themselves and families and surrounded them with stockades as a protection from the Indians. Behind this enclosure they enjoyed some measure of security, but as they peered into the vast wilderness that stretched before them opportunity beckoned them on. They sacrificed their security and beat paths through the trackless frontiers until the entire continent was settled.

But you say "there are no frontiers today." The land frontiers have passed away, but notwithstanding the progress which has been made we have only reached the frontiers of science, medicine, transportation, and television. These and many other fields of endeavor are still open to modern pioneers.

Experience has abundantly demonstrated that opportunity for achievement can be best preserved under our American system of individual initiative and free competitive enterprise.

Those who seek to destroy that system by force, infiltration, or subversive activities are public enemies and should be dealt with as such. We must, however, also guard against gradual encroachments, which although less vicious will in the end rob us of our heritage.

My hope in speaking to you this evening is that I might bring to you the challenge which these uncertain and critical times present.

In the days of King Ahasuerus, Queen Esther held a high place in the affections of the ruler. Through the insistence of Haman, his favorite prince, the King issued a royal decree that all of the Jews in the kingdom should be put to death. Mordecai, the uncle of Queen Esther, entreated her to intercede on behalf of her people. Queen Esther hesitated because of the danger of losing her own life if her intercession was not pleasing to the King. Mordecai presented to her this challenge, "Who knoweth," he said, "whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Whereupon Queen Esther repaired to the King, saved her people, and brought about the destruction of Haman, their enemy.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

Address of Hon. Clarence J. Brown, of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by CLARENCE J. BROWN, Member of Congress, Seventh Ohio District, at Chicago, Ill., September 15, 1950, over the Mutual Broadcasting System. The address follows:

This is a time of grave crisis.

If we are to survive as a free nation, and are to continue to enjoy individual liberty under law here at home, the time has come for every American to engage in real soul-searching, straight thinking, and plain talking regarding the problems which confront us.

Each of us, regardless of our political or religious beliefs, has the duty and responsibility of giving our every support, aid, and comfort to our American boys who, on a little beachhead in South Korea 7,000 miles away, are fighting and dying with their backs to the sea. Outnumbered and outgunned, they are going through the hell of a no-quarter war against a cruel and savage enemy, through no fault of their own.

As a Republican I make the pledge that all who belong to our party will, as loyal Americans, contribute their every effort and resource to the support of our fighting men. That is the duty of every true American.

But as loyal Americans, as Republicans, and as the party of opposition, we also have other duties and responsibilities. Under our American system of representative government and free elections, we are on the threshhold of an important political campaign. In the November election one-third of the United States Senate, and the entire membership of the House of Representatives are to be elected. In order to choose well those who will represent the Nation in the Congress—in order that the people may make their views known and have their desires carried out—it is necessary, wise, and urgent we discuss national issues in the coming weeks, and make our decisions known on election day—November 7.

The principal issue of the coming campaign will be the incompetence of the Truman administration to either attain peace or to prepare for war.

Into that one great and all-important issue will melt and blend many lesser ones.

It will probably become necessary to discuss the reasons why we have failed to attain world peace, and to tell how the policies of the Democrat administrations of Roosevelt and Truman have aided the spread of communism thoughout the world, and created misunderstandings and enmities which have put Soviet Russia and her satellites in position to threaten and endanger the security, the liberty, and the freedom of all mankind, including the people of the United States.

It will undoubtedly be necessary, not only to point out and discuss the dangers which threaten us from without, but also those which threaten us from within. Communist infiltration and radical influences within the Government of the United States have brought about a situation which requires the prompt attention of the American people if we are to be safe here at home. They must decide whether to elect a Congress which will cleanse our political blood stream of the impurities which now threaten our national life.

The American people are rightfully asking: What is wrong with our national defense? Why is it, after spending nearly $60,000,000,000 for military purposes in the last 4 years, that our boys fighting in Korea are without the weapons and munitions they need.

The people are also asking: Why, in a grave crisis like this, does the Truman administration continue to play petty politics and keep in office men who have proven themselves unfitted to meet or to solve the problems which confront us? What about the Dean Achesons and the Louis Johnsons? What about the John Maragons and the Gen. Harry Vaughans? Why is it that when American boys are fighting and dying to stop aggression and the spread of communism in South Korea, little or nothing is being done by this administration to stop the spread of communism here in the United States.

In view of the internal dangers we face, why is it the President continues to oppose the Hobbs bill which would permit jailing alien criminals, convicted of subversive or moral crimes, who cannot be deported to their country of origin?

Why is it, with communism threatening us, both abroad and at home, the President announces he will veto the Mundt-Nixon-McCarran bill, which would require American Communists and Communist organizations to register and report their activities?

The President insists the Hobbs bill and the Mundt-Nixon bill are too harsh upon those who would destroy us. Is Mr. Truman forgetting the captured American boys found shot to death in Korea with their hands wired behind their backs?

Yes, Mr. President, this is a harsh world in which we live, and we must meet the dangers of the day realistically. The American people are entitled to protection from their enemies working from within, Mr. President; and they are entitled to security from the forces of evil which threaten them from without.

Administration apologists are attempting to tell us we must forget the past; that we must think only of the future and docilely permit the very same officials and influences responsible for our present situation to continue in charge of our national affairs.

I say to you—those who have failed us in the past cannot, and should not, be trusted in the future. If we do not profit from the mistakes of the past, there is no hope for the future. We must face the fact that we are confronted with great and grave dangers, both abroad and at home. The realization has dawned upon most Americans—if not upon the President himself—that it is a war we are fighting in Korea—not a police action. We are no longer in position to decide for ourselves whether world war III is to come, or when. That decision rests with another power—Soviet Russia.

We are fighting in Korea, technically at least, as a part of the United Nations forces. Fifty-two other nations have joined with us in opposing Red aggression in Korea, but only a few of them have sent token forces to fight alongside American troops on the battle lines. If Communist aggression is to be stopped in Korea or elsewhere, and the ambitions of those in the Kremlin to dominate the world are to be blocked, it is American manpower, equipment, and money which must do the job.

Today Communist Russia stands astride the continent of Asia like a great Colossus, with millions of armed men, huge quantities of guns, tanks, and planes; and limitless natural resources at her command, while within the United States many thousands of Communists, fellow travelers, radicals, parlor pinks, are now doing Russia's bidding.

All of this because of the tragic mistakes of past and present Democrat administrations. The mistake of the Roosevelt administration in 1933 in recognizing and bringing back into the family of nations the government of Red Russia opened the way for the spread of communism throughout the world. An even greater mistake was made during World War II, when the Roosevelt administration decided that because Hitler had invaded Russia, the Soviet believed in human liberty and freedom, could be trusted as an ally, should be given all-out American aid, and supplied with our military and industrial secrets.

It was the dreadfully tragic agreement made by Roosevelt and his advisers at Yalta and confirmed by Truman at Potsdam, which sold eastern Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia into virtual slavery and put Russia in position to control eastern Europe and endanger all the Continent. It was these same tragic secret agreements which betrayed the Nationalist Government of China, gave Manchuria to Russia, and placed the Soviet forces in position to dominate Asia.

It was Alger Hiss, later convicted of perjury when he denied his traitorous acts, who stood whispering into the ear of Roosevelt at Yalta, as Stalin had his way.

It was the same Alger Hiss, fair-haired boy of the Truman State Department, who opened the San Francisco Conference and urged American delegates to give Russia the veto power in the Security Council which has been used so effectively to make the United Nations impotent to bring peace to the world.

It was Alger Hiss, the convicted perjurer, whom Secretary of State Dean Acheson continued to support and call his friend when he said, "I shall not turn my back on Alger Hiss." And in recent weeks we have heard the President of the United States say: "As long as I am President, Dean Acheson shall continue as my Secretary of State."

Yes, it was the Hisses, the Achesons, the Lattimores, the Wadleighs, the Whites, the Services, and those like them—placed in positions of power and influence by two New Deal administrations—who, insisting upon appeasement of Communist Russia, formed and executed the foreign policies which have failed so miserably to bring peace. Now they attempt to tell us they were bipartisan foreign policies. My friends, we have never had any bipartisan foreign policy. What we have had were New Deal foreign policies with some bipartisan support.

The Truman administration must also accept the responsibility for its failure to prepare for war, for the Republican Party, both in and out of Congress, has always believed in and supported a strong national defense for our country.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress, in 1947-48, which passed the Unification Act at the request of the administration, for the purpose of making our National Defense Establishment more efficient, cohesive, and effective.

It was the same Republican Eightieth Congress which established the Central Intelligence Agency to keep the President, our State Department, and military leadership informed as to events in other parts of the world.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which, by law, created the National Security Council, with the duty and responsibility of coordinating all national defense efforts.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which cooperated with the administration in establishing the National Security Resources Board and provided the funds for stockpiling strategic materials needed for war. Yet, for some incomprehensible reason, we now find ourselves without adequate stockpiles of necessary materials.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress, realizing the seriousness of the world situation, which fixed the strength of our Armed Forces at slightly over 2,000,000 men—nearly 600,000 more than the Secretary of Defense and the President insisted were necessary—until the Korean emergency suddenly developed.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which provided for the construction of the Navy aircraft carrier—the United States—upon which work was ordered suspended by the President and the Secretary of Defense on the claim it was not needed.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which sent to the White House legislation to increase the size of our Air Forces from 48 to 70 groups, and provided the funds therefor, only to have the President and the Secretary of Defense refuse to carry out the law or to strengthen the Air Forces, until after the attack on South Korea came.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which, by action of two of its committees, blocked the administration plan for the virtual destruction of the United States Marine Corps—the same Marine Corps to which the President made such an insulting reference recently.

It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which protested, and attempted to block, the unwarranted reduction by the administration in the size of the United States Navy.

Every Republican in Congress during the last war voted for and supported every military appropriation. During the Republican Eightieth Congress, and in the succeeding Congress, no administration request for funds for military weapons or military supplies was ever rejected.

I charge the responsibility for our present dangerous situation rests squarely upon the Democrat administration which controls the Government at Washington. The President's action in getting rid of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson proved the correctness of my charge.

So I say: The one great issue of the coming campaign will be the incompetence of the Truman administration to either attain peace or to prepare for war.

Campaign in Eighth Congressional District of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan there came to a close the night of September 12, 1950, one of the most unusual campaigns attacking a citizen running for renomination to the House of Representatives of the Federal Government that has occurred in the history of the great State of Michigan.

This campaign of innuendo, of character assassination, of violation of State and Federal laws, rules, and regulations, was conducted as would be a prosecution. The intellectually dishonest presentations rank among the vilest which the good citizens of that State ever witnessed.

Those prosecuting this campaign failed to win their objective, and that objective was to bring about the defeat of Representative FRED L. CRAWFORD, who has served his district in the House of Representatives for almost 16 years.

Representative CRAWFORD gave this team of prosecutors the full "length of the rope." They were allowed to demonstrate to the citizens of the Eighth Congressional District just how far they would go, and the foul means they would use, to attain their objective. It would be very interesting to know whether or not this team of prosecutors were offered a legal fee to prosecute their case.

It appears that this team of prosecutors have not only injured themselves professionally and lowered their standing in the minds of the many good citizens of the Eighth Congressional District, but they have, in addition, extended great aid and comfort to the opposition political party. This situation they would have had to deal with had they won the primary election. As a matter of fact, this team of prosecutors went so far in their condemnation of the policies, with respect to a sound fiscal program and the protection of the savings, the industry, and economic and social welfare of the people, which sound policies have been followed over almost a 16-year period by Representative CRAWFORD, that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the team of prosecutors to establish themselves on a sound basis. In the Saginaw News of September 14, 1950, there appeared the following editorial, and I wish to emphasize for the benefit of the reading public that the author of this editorial pointed out that—

It should be enlightening to note that those candidates who campaigned more on personalities than on political issues—who conducted what some would call smear campaigns—failed to make the grade.

The complete editorial follows:

DOUBTFUL POLITICAL TACTICS

The primary election has been called the weak link in our election process. It makes possible the nomination of men of little ability, self-starters, or pressure group spokesmen; it destroys the party responsibility which the convention system of making nominations was supposed to guarantee, say those opposed to the primary principle.

As a matter of fact, all candidates, whether nominated in a primary or in a party convention, are self-starters. It may be true that men of higher caliber might be willing to run for public office if they did not have to go through both primary and final elections, but the primary has the virtue of permitting all who aspire to office to place themselves before the voters. It does not give a party convention, which might be controlled by a small clique, the right to determine who shall carry the party's banner.

The Democratic ticket nominated in Saginaw County Tuesday perhaps might be considered a ticket chosen by party convention. There weren't enough self-starters to produce a single contest; in fact, party leaders had to draft some candidates to fill out the ticket, exactly as a convention would have done.

The Republican ticket, on which most places were contested, stacks up about as favorably as the Democratic ticket does in caliber and ability of the men concerned.

At any rate, the primary system is with us, and here to stay. Voters of both parties must realize that the time and place to nominate party candidates is at the primary. Democratic voters Tuesday had no choice to make in Saginaw County but Republicans who did not bother to vote have no valid complaint if they do not like the choices made. If their favorites lost out, they have the task now of deciding between those candidates who won.

It should be enlightening to note that those candidates who campaigned more on personalities than on political issues—who conducted what some would call smear campaigns—failed to make the grade. There is always the inherent danger that such tactics will boomerang. How much they affected the net results is probably a close question among political dopesters but it is encouraging to note that none of the winners in Saginaw County resorted to those tactics.

The International Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, two recent editorials on the international situation by A. C. Kuiper of the Grandville Star have come to my attention. I sincerely believe that the two editorials from Mr. Kuiper's weekly column entitled "The Leak in the Dike", should be thoughtfully read by my colleagues. Consequently at the conclusion of my remarks the editorials follow.

The views expressed by Mr. Kuiper are to the point and well written. He has made an accurate analysis of our diplomatic blunders of recent years, particularly those in the Far East. At the moment, however, I disagree on a point. In my estimation, it would be unwise to use the atomic bomb on Russia until our military strength is sufficient to prevent retaliation in kind. We know, or at least our President and our intelligence reports indicate, that Russia has the atomic bomb and the Communists have the ability to attack our homeland with this devastating weapon. When our military preparedness is such that we could adequately thwart an atomic attack on the United States, then our country would be in a position to make use of the bomb on Russia providing, of course, Stalin and his associates refuse to stop their tactics on world-wide aggression.

[From the Grandville Star of August 4, 1950]

THE LEAK IN THE DIKE

(By A. C. K.)

It is regrettable that the Korean situation caught our Government off base as it did, but perhaps it took something like Korea to bring the matter of our relations with Russia to a head.

For nearly a decade our leaders (Roosevelt, Hopkins, Wallace, and Truman) have played right into the hands of the Russians. Their antics in the name of diplomacy have made us a bunch of fools in the eyes of the Kremlin. They did everything but deliver the keys to the Capitol building in Washington to Stalin.

Let's review the sad history of our dealings with Russia since the outbreak of World War II. Hitler and his henchman, Von Ribbentrop, sign peace treaties with Stalin. Thus the maniac of Germany is free to slaughter and pillage western Europe at will.

Hitler and Stalin made fine bedfellows for a time. Then Hitler stupidly sent his armies to attack Russia. What does Stalin do? He jumps from Hitler's harlot's bed into ours. We welcome him with open arms. The Washington propaganda machine feeds us a lot of guff about Uncle Joe and we Americans are supposed to forget the godless, brutal system on which Russian communism is founded.

Russia was supposedly our ally in our war against the Axis. But she was never our ally in fact. We could not land our planes on Russian soil, so many thousands of United States airmen gave their lives needlessly because we could not use Russian bases for shuttle bombing. If there was any coordination of our war effort with Russia it was achieved through high level conferences of Stalin, Roosevelt, and Churchill. This was certainly inadequate to achieving real close cooperation.

What happened at Cairo, Yalta, and Potsdam? The full details are still cloaked in secrecy. Perhaps realist Churchill was less easily beguiled than our friends, Roosevelt, Wallace, and Hopkins, but Uncle Joe apparently got all the concessions. Can you name anything he conceded to us?

The war in Europe progresses and our armies are poised for the entrance to Berlin. What happens? We hold our armies back and we let Russia take Berlin.

Then when Germany is zoned for occupation by the victors Russia winds up with a protective belt all around Berlin. All the Allies want to be in Berlin and so we place ourselves in a completely untenable military position, surrounded as we are by the Russians. The Soviets block our transportation through their area and so we have the airlift into Berlin. We let the Russians maneuver us into a mess and then we have to save face by flying planes over their blockade. The Kremlin, undoubtedly, got a good laugh out of that.

Only 20 days before the war in Japan comes to a conclusion Russia is permitted to enter the fray. Certainly our Government knew that the fall of Japan was imminent. But still our craven policy was to let the Russians nominally enter on our side. The victorious Russ are given Manchuria for their efforts. This belonged to China, and it wasn't ours to give, but Russia got it.

As time went on the Russians picked up one after the other of the Balkan countries and placed them securely within the fold behind the iron curtain. We made a show of strength in Greece, but I can't for the life of me see what the purpose of isolating Greece was when we didn't follow up our policy of containment elsewhere.

Our policy in the Far East has been something that will amaze historians for many years to come. Beyond a question our brain trusters in the Government for the last 10 years have aided and abetted the Communists in their drive to conquer China. The bright boys in the State Department viewed the Reds as agrarian reformers. They insisted that we give the Reds as well as Chiang Kai-shek arms during the war with Japan. The Reds used these to overrun their country. Perhaps some of this material is being used against us in Korea today.

As late as a few months ago Truman and Acheson in line with their "Let the dust settle" policy announced that we were not going to defend Formosa. We weren't concerned about the Chinese Nationalists and the Chiang Kai-shek government on the island. Now, suddenly we have an about face. MacArthur rushes over and confers with Chiang.

How can you explain the impasse we have permitted ourselves to get into? We wonder if the historians of a few decades hence will be able to explain it.

Right now we are faced with the grim possibility of long fighting in Korea and outbreaks of Russian advances elsewhere in the world.

The thought of a long war with Russia is too horrible to contemplate. Short of a miraculous change of heart, however, on the part of the Kremlin or an unforseeable revolution in Russia against the present regime Russia will embroil the world in an atomic war.

We have two things in our favor and we should exploit them to the utmost. First, Russia cannot afford to go to war. It does not seem possible that she could have completely recovered from the staggering losses she suffered in the last war. Second, we have a superiority in atomic-bomb production and know-how.

Enough is enough. This writer believes Russia should be warned that any further aggression by her or her stooges will be the signal for an atomic bombing of a dozen of her largest cities.

We can no longer afford to temporize. It is appalling to think what Russia has gained in her drive toward world conquest for communism in the last 5 years. Russia's policy is to grab off any country or area she wants and to do it without resort to warfare. The Kremlin has bluffed their way through 5 years of conquest. They would like nothing better than to see us bleed ourselves white on a dozen fronts scattered around the world.

The time to call a halt is now.

[From the Grandville Star of August 25, 1950]

THE LEAK IN THE DIKE

(By A. C. K.)

There can be no question that the issues in our difficulties with the Russians are clearly drawn. This writer feels that these issues were clearly defined long ago. To anyone who has read the statements of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin, there can be no question as to the basic aims of world domination by communism that has been preached by these men. It should not have taken the North Korean advance across the thirty-eighth parallel to arouse Washington, D. C. to this fact.

From the time Hitler insanely sent his armies to attack Russia until recently, our Government in Washington tried to whitewash Russia, her system, and her objectives of world conquest. Looking back over the history of the last decade we wonder how our leadership could have blithely ignored the candid expression of Russia's ruthless aims and objects. While our boys in Government were abjectly licking Russia's boots the Kremlin goes forward coolly and calmly with her well-laid plans.

Regardless of past mistakes it seems obvious that barring a miraculous change of heart on the part of the Politburo, Russia will not back down from her plan of conquest. Thus the issue is whether we together with the rest of the non-Communist world can permit this undeclared war of attrition to go on.

We raise the question, "How long are we going to permit Russia to make a farce of the United Nations?" If your neighbor tells you he is going to burn down your house and destroy your family often enough and grimly enough you will eventually come to believe him. When are we going to believe Russia?

This writer feels that the travesty in the U. N. should be brought to a sharp focus and immediately. With or without Russia the U. N. should be reorganized into an effective agency for world peace and not a show place for Jake Malik to make fools of the United States of America and the non-Communist member nations.

We also raise the question, "How long are we going to let precious time slip by without resorting to the use of the atomic bomb in bringing Russia to her senses?" The atom bomb, it seems universally agreed, is our ace card in the game of international poker Russia has been playing with the rest of the world.

Over a cup of coffee the other day a businessman and I were talking about the diabolical situation the world finds itself in. We agreed that it seems the devil himself has been unleashed by providence to wreak vengeance on the people of the whole world. How can you explain the mess we are in? Certainly it is hard today to find the spirit and teachings of Christ in evidence in our international situation. Are we to believe the devil has free reign in a world berserk?

When you speak of the devil the corollary connotation is that there is an omniscient providence. If we do not have faith there is providence controlling and guiding the destiny of the world there seems little hope in the world situation today.

There is no question in this writer's mind that Russia and her system represent the most diabolical tendencies ever encountered in world history. Can a Christian believe that God will permit the forces of evil to conquer?

Nishnabotna, Nodaway, Boyer, and Indian Creek Watersheds in Southwestern Iowa

---

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, severe floods have occurred once every 5 years in the Nishnabotna, Nodaway, and Boyer River, and Indian Creek watersheds. These streams are tributaries of the Missouri River in southwestern Iowa. The flood of 1947 on these streams took people's lives, drowned livestock, swept away improvements, took out public roads and bridges, damaged railroads, drainage ditches and ruined several thousands of acres of crops. Floods of damaging character occur on these streams at least once a year on the average. The area of these watersheds is subject to both intense cloudburst type summer storms which result in flash floods and to prolonged rainy periods in late winter and spring. The steep valley slopes and high bluff and hill topography combine to produce quick concentration of runoff waters. The long, narrow character of the watersheds makes it possible for floods originating upstream to sweep and damage the entire valleys. The uplands have a very fertile, silty soil and are intensely cultivated. As a result the area has the highest rate of sediment production per square mile of drainage to be found anywhere in the entire Missouri River Basin.

The original alluvial deposits along the stream bottomlands have some of the most fertile soil in the world. Floods, since man's occupation of the area, have not only ruined crops year after year but have scoured the flood plain, deposited sediment and made poorly drained land until now hundreds upon hundreds of acres of once highly productive land is no longer usable.

Floodwaters from these streams contribute materially to damage in the main Missouri River bottomland and also increase the height of floodwater at the time the Missouri River is at flood stage. The sediment carried by these streams adds to the already overloaded sediment carrying waters of the Missouri and increase the need for flood control works on the main stream.

These four watersheds in southwestern Iowa comprise the following area: Nishnabotna River, 3,094 square miles; Nodaway River, 1,777 square miles; Boyer River, 1,140 square miles; Indian Creek, 18 square miles. The Indian Creek watershed is a high bluff area lying immediately north of the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa. It is the source of many floods through that city since the outlet is directly through the central part of the city to the Missouri River. The Corps of Engineers and the city of Council Bluffs have constructed floodways and levees to protect property, but there is an immediate need for a program of soil conservation and upstream flood prevention on Indian Creek.

The Corps of Engineers is engaged in the protection of downstream property on each of the Nishna, Nodaway, and Boyer Rivers. These works of improvement lie unprotected as long as upstream flood-prevention work goes undone.

The entire acreage within these four watersheds is in organized soil conservation districts. Rapid progress is being made by individual farmers in applying soil and water conservation measures to their land. In fact, the lands of more than a dozen subwatersheds are almost all completely treated with soil and water conservation measures except for major gully controls and small stream channel improvement works. These latter works are awaiting Government assistance and give rise to the urgency of work being initiated on these watersheds.

Watershed associations, in which both upland and bottom land farmers, city people and townspeople alike are interested, have been in operation for several years. These associations are a medium for combining the interests of all the local people to work with the State and Federal Governments in developing a plan and carrying out works of improvement to reduce damages by flood. The people of these watersheds are not only ready but awaiting Federal Government cooperation to accomplish their objective of a complete valley-wide watershed soil-conservation, flood-prevention, and flood-control program.

Due to the facts I have stated, about 30 days ago I submitted the following resolution to the Public Works Committee of the House:

Resolved by the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives, United States, That the Department of Agriculture be, and is hereby, requested to review the reports on the Missouri River Basin, submitted in House Document No. 373, Eighty-first Congress, first session, with a view to determining whether any modifications in the recommendations contained therein with respect to the Nishnabotna, Nodaway, Boyer, and Indian Creek Basins in Iowa should be made at this time.

The Public Works Committee requested Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan to review his Department's Missouri River Basin agriculture program in regard to specifically named watershed with a "view to determining whether any modifications in the recommendations contained therein" should be made at this time.

The Department in a written statement to Committee Chairman WHITTINGTON considered the request inadvisable and suggested that Congress instead expedite the approval of the Missouri agricultural program at a total cost of more than $3,000,000,000—$8,000,000,000, mind you.

My resolution stems from a growing desire of various watershed groups in my district that needed flood-prevention work not be retarded until Congress saw fit to approve the highly controversial $8,000,000,000 Missouri Basin agricultural program, as recommended by Secretary Brannan.

Since the passage of the 1936 Flood Control Act, and as later amended, Congress has authorized and appropriated funds for a number of upper watershed flood-prevention programs. Surveys have been approved on still a larger number with detailed plans requested when the benefits sufficiently exceed the cost of the proposed work. Surveys on the Missouri River Basin had been requested by the Public Works Committee but to date the committee has not received the requested material. Instead, the Department after making the requested surveys used a portion of the material as a base for the Missouri agricultural program, now before Congress as House Document No. 373. Hearings were held in the past couple of months on the document, but no decision was reached or action taken.

As I pointed out, the four watersheds named in the resolution are in drastic need of immediate upper watershed flood-prevention work. The watersheds cover a total of about 6,000 square miles and have on the average at least one destructive flood every year.

Although basically rich in productive soil, many hundreds of acres of the intensely cropped uplands and the fertile alluvial bottom lands of these watersheds are fast losing their productiveness because of sedimentation and constant flooding. Preliminary studies show that these watersheds have the highest rate of sediment production per square mile of any drainage area to be found in the entire Missouri Basin. Damage to town property, public roads, railroads, drainage systems, and other improvements is also high.

Watershed associations in my district have taken the initiative to encourage the State and Federal Governments to develop a flood prevention program for the area. All of the four watersheds except the Indian Creek have such associations made up of both farmers and town people. The State of Iowa also has such an association and recently a national council of water associations was organized. An upper watershed flood-prevention program would provide for small headwater-retarding reservoirs, sediment-retaining structures, channel improvement, and similar works to reduce flood and sediment damage. This is the type of work generally approved by the Public Works Committee under the Flood Control Acts, primarily because it is the quickest, and by far the cheapest and best way to get this necessary job done, because the farmers themselves do most of the job and want to do more.

Much of the needed flood-prevention work is already underway in the conservation programs being applied by farmers through their local soil conservation district operations, such as good land use, contouring, strip cropping, and pasture improvement, all of which contribute to flood and sediment prevention, but a complete job cannot be accomplished until the Congress directs the Soil Conservation Service and the Army engineers to cooperate with the farmers in a valley-wide watershed soil-conservation, flood-prevention, and flood-control program, such as I have requested for the watersheds in my district. But Mr. Brannan refuses to approve, or at least, has refused to approve up to this time. I hope he will soon see the light.

A Report to the Farmers of the Second District of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORGAN M. MOULDER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, several years ago we wisely adopted a national farm policy which declared that all of us must share with the farmer the responsibility for maintaining our agricultural resources. We decided that the farmer must be protected against low prices and low income and against the danger of inadequate credit. Our Government adopted laws establishing farm programs to assist and cooperate with the farmer to eliminate speculation in the farming industry, and to provide the opportunity for the farmers to have the use of electric power—REA—and other modern machinery and conveniences to secure for himself and family the high standard of living to which he was and is justly entitled to receive for his investments, labors, and management. Because we adopted this policy, American agriculture was able to set new production records during every year of the war.

One of the great lessons of history is that no nation can be stronger than its agriculture. Hungry and ill-nourished people cannot practice and promulgate democracy and peaceful commerce. Peace cannot be built on a foundation of human want.

The continuing high volume of agricultural production in the United States has been an important element in our efforts toward postwar reconstruction and rehabilitation of other free nations to preserve world peace and prevent the spread of communism. During the year ending June 30, 1949, the United States exported over 22,100,000 tons of food. This was exceeded during the year ending June 30, 1950, which amounts to more than five times the average amounts exported during the 1935–39 years inclusive. Financial gifts and loans by the United States Government to foreign nations have contributed significantly to supporting the record large volume of farm exports from this country. The United States furnished or sold one-half of all world grain exports last year, which is approximately seven times the amount of grain exported from the United States in prewar years. Therefore, our European recovery program to build forces against communistic aggressors, and the International Wheat Agreement, have contributed substantial support for our farm prosperity. We must continue our efforts to facilitate and increase the flow of world trade on a permanent, long-term basis through the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the Export-Import Bank and international agreements, such as the wheat agreement.

Mr. Speaker, Missouri contains 242,934 farms, covering 5,300,000 acres. The farmers of Missouri by producing unprecedented quantities of food in the first half of the decade helped to win World War II. Since 1945, by expanding their production, they have been helping our great Nation in its efforts to maintain prosperity and to establish world peace. I have the honor of serving, as Representative in Congress, the Second District of Missouri. Its boundaries include an area of 15 large counties in the heart of Missouri, and it is one of the most fertile and productive agricultural regions of the United States.

This is my first term in Congress and at it, the Eighty-first Congress, draws to a close I believe it appropriate that I present a report of the actions taken by this Congress and my votes on such measures affecting the interests of the farmers in my district. I believe they are entitled to be informed of my votes on legislation affecting agriculture and to know why I have served them as their Congressman. This they have the right to know when deciding whether or not to cast their vote for me on general election day, the next 7th day of November.

Mr. Speaker, more than 12,000 legislative bills and resolutions have been introduced during the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, and several hundred were reported by committees for our action on the floor of this House. I have carefully studied and considered each bill voted upon, and have cast my vote in accordance with sound judgment and highest principles—that is, for the best interests of the people.

Of that number the following legislative actions are of major importance to the farmers of my district and my vote appears of record, as follows:

REA

The Rural Electrification Administration Act was enacted by Congress in the year of 1935 and it empowers the Administrator of the REA to make loans for the construction of power plants and transmission lines to serve rural areas.

Mr. Speaker, the rural electrification program is of great and special importance to the farmers. I have vigorously supported and voted for all appropriations to provide for loans to establish and expand rural electric power and service to the farmers.

Almost everyone agrees that the farmers and people residing in the rural areas should have the opportunity of the advantages and conveniences provided and served by electricity. The farmer, especially, has as much or more use and practical need for electricity than most other people. He needs electricity not only for providing lights and conveniences for his home, barns, and storehouses, but he also needs electricity to provide power for his use in the many productive activities on the farm.

The vast expansion and improvement of the Rural Electrification Administration, and the appropriations by Congress which made this activity possible have always received my sincere and consistent support. I would like to relate a few facts which clearly and concretely show that the farmers of Missouri have been greatly benefited by this beneficial type of legislation. As of June 30, 1950, approximately $125,000,000 has been loaned to the REA cooperatives for the expansion of their facilities. As of the same date approximately $50,000,000 has been earmarked for loans in Missouri for the construction of generating and transmission facilities. Also, as of this same date, loans in the amount of $627,000 have been made for the purchase of consumers' facilities which have materially aided and lightened the farmers' operation in many of the onerous burdens that must be performed by hand where electricity is not available. Briefly, one must reflect upon the fact that as of June 30, 1950, there were over 56,000 miles of energized lines in Missouri, and 181,000 consumers are being benefited at the present time by REA. Seventy-eight percent of the farms of the State of Missouri are served with electricity.

In 1935 less than 7 percent of the farms in Missouri used central-station electrical service. As your Representative in Congress, during my first term, I have consistently supported all legislation and appropriations which have so materially benefited the farmer and brought to him those benefits and that standard of living which he so justly deserves.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. Speaker, more miles of rivers flow within the boundaries of the Second Congressional District of Missouri than in any other congressional district of the United States. Destructive and disastrous floods have been a constant menace and danger to the welfare of the people in my district. Therefore, I requested and was assigned to the Public Works Committee in the beginning of this my first term in Congress. The Public Works Committee, of which I am a member, has jurisdiction over rivers, harbors, and flood-control legislation. You will recall H. R. 5472, approved May 16, 1950, now Public Law 516, drafted and reported to the floor of the House by the Committee on Public Works, and my vigorous efforts and support for the passage of that bill, which authorizes flood-control projects on and in the Missouri River Basin, which includes Missouri River tributaries, the Osage, Chariton, Grand, Moreau, Blackwater, Lamine, and others. This law, Public Law 516, abovementioned, authorizes flood-control projects, for the prosecution of the comprehensive plan by the United States Army engineers, $250,000,000, and also authorizes flood-control projects for the prosecution of the comprehensive plan—levees and soil conservation—by the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, $200,000,000. A total authorization of $450,000,000 for such flood-control projects on the Missouri River and its tributaries.

Mr. Speaker, if reelected to Congress I will continue my efforts to obtain each year such appropriations as the circumstances of national and international affairs may reasonably allow or permit for complete construction of the Missouri River Basin flood-control projects, authorized by Public Law 516, which we passed during this session of Congress.

As evidence of such efforts on my part I quote from the RECORD of the debate on the floor of this House, August 22, 1949, concerning the Garrison flood-control dam on the Missouri River in North Dakota, which is of vital importance to prevent floods on the Missouri River in my district:

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On page 19, line 15, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: 'Provided, That no part of the authorization of this appropriation shall be available or used to maintain or operate the Garrison (N. Dak.) Reservoir at a higher maximum normal pool elevation than 1,830 feet, or for acquiring land, or for constructing dikes or levees which would be required by a higher maximum normal pool elevation than 1,830 feet for operating such dam.'"

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

[Mr. LEMKE addressed the Committee. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I hope you will be patient with me while I present very briefly my arguments against the proposal made by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

First, I will state that 200 miles of the Missouri River winds its way through my Second District in Missouri. I would also like to acquaint you briefly with something about the physical facts pertaining to the Missouri Valley. The waterway formed by the Mississippi-Missouri Rivers is the longest waterway in the World. The Missouri River is by a considerable margin the longer of the two rivers which form this waterway, over 2,400 miles in length. The Missouri River originates in the slopes of the Continental Divide in the Yellowstone National Park in southwestern Montana, and courses its way through or along seven States. It has an average slope of slightly less than 1 foot per mile downstream from the Montana-North Dakota State line, and is 1½ to 17 miles wide, flanked on both sides by bluffs. It has 30 tributaries, varying in length from 100 miles to 1,000 miles.

This vast region is called the Nation's bread basket. The two basic problems that prevail in the Missouri Valley are drought and floods, affecting 10,000,000 people who reside in the Missouri Valley.

The Public Works Committee has carefully considered the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] and unanimously rejected the amendment. The amendment would destroy the very purposes which the North Dakota project, known as Garrison Dam, proposes to effect. It is for flood control and irrigation, and after the gentleman from North Dakota has succeeded in obtaining the project that has already been started and $60,000,000 expended on the production of the project, he now wants to control the plans of construction, and says after the Government has spent that money, "You shall keep the water level at 1,830 feet in order that those who are expecting to develop resorts along the bank, the real-estate operators, may keep it at such constant level so that it cannot be used for flood control."

Now, the Garrison Dam; it was planned to be built to the full ultimate capacity of the site, based on a unanimous agreement of the members of the Missouri River Basin Interagency Committee, which met at Omaha, Nebr., in August 1945. The project as originally planned by the Corps of Engineers and as proposed for construction at this time contemplates the provision of the greatest water shortage capacity available in any reservoir within the Missouri River Basin. The project will provide a storage of 23,000,000 acre-feet of water at an elevation of 1,850 feet above mean sea level.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] would restrict the water level to 1,830 feet, which would provide storage capacity of only 17,000,000 acre-feet. The objector, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE], contends that it is not necessary nor desirable to build the project to provide water reservoir at an elevation of 1,850 feet, but that an elevation 20 feet lower would provide all the capacity that is needed in the reservoir. This contention is not correct. By the Flood Control Act Congress authorized full development and utilization of water resources of the basin. Accordingly, the plans of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army contemplated construction of the Garrison Dam to a height of 1,874 feet, with a normal operating pool elevation of 1,850 feet. To illustrate that this height was contemplated right from the inception of the plan, the estimate of $130,000,000 for the Garrison project as set forth in the Chief of Engineers report in House Document 475, Seventy-eighth Congress, was based on construction of the dam to an elevation of 1,874 feet with an operating water level of 1,850 feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOULDER. At the time that capacity was estimated at 17,000,000 acre-feet. It was purely an estimate. No firm figures had been prepared. It was a rough approximation of the storage capacity that would be available with a water reservoir operating at an elevation of 1,850 feet, since accurate contour maps of the Missouri River Valley were not available until a later date. Subsequently the valley was accurately mapped by the Corps of Engineers and it was found that the Garrison Dam with a pool elevation of 1,850 feet would provide 23,000,000 acre-feet of storage instead of approximately 17,000,000 acre-feet.

Any limitation on the construction and operation of the Garrison Dam and Reservoir project to the full capacity planned by the Corps of Engineers would be in contravention to the policy of Congress to fully utilize and develop the water resources of the Missouri River Basin. Further it would be very uneconomical to limit the operation of the Garrison project to 1,830 feet since the Garrison site provides the least unit cost per acre-foot of storage of any reservoir site within the entire Missouri Basin. A reduction of the normal operating pool elevation of the Garrison Reservoir to 1,830 feet would cause a loss of 6,800,000 acre-feet of storage. Based on comparative costs for a project constructed to the 1,850- or to the 1,830-foot elevation, computations by the Corps of Engineers have shown that the additional 6,800,000 acre-feet of storage in the "1,850" reservoir can be provided at a cost of $5.53 per acre-foot. For comparison the cost per acre-foot of storage in the "1,830" reservoir is $12.15.

The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] mentioned the fact that people will lose their homes and their land. The Constitution and laws of our country protects the interests of such persons and specifically provides that they shall receive just compensation for their property and interests. They will be fully compensated for their land and properties acquired by the Government for use in connection with the Garrison Dam flood control project. We are here trying to provide a properly designed flood control project to protect the farms and homes of the people residing in the Missouri River Valley below the Garrison Dam, of North Dakota. They who produce the major part of the food for our Nation, and whose crops and homes, produced by their labors, are frequently destroyed by destructive floods, and without any recourse, they suffer the loss from such floods. We must consider the overall benefit to all the people who live in the lower Missouri Valley, millions of people who will be affected by this amendment if it is adopted, whose homes and farms are ravaged by floods without compensation for damages which they will suffer and continue to suffer from floods, if the proposed amendment is adopted; and I earnestly urge the Congress to reject and disapprove the proposed amendment to restrict or reduce the water storage capacity of the Garrison Dam by limiting the water level of the storage pool to 1,830 feet above mean sea level.

The foregoing record of my argument on the floor of the House against an amendment which was defeated is only one of many of my efforts to secure proper legislation for adequate flood control projects.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF MY WORK AS A MEMBER OF COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

In addition to general legislative work in Congress, my daily mail requesting miscellaneous services for the people in my district, and my work as a member of the Public Works Committee, I was assigned and have served as one of nine Members of Congress to serve on the Committee on Un-American Activities. It was and is a great honor for me to serve on this important committee, and I am especially grateful for such recognition to the Second District of Missouri, because I am the only first-term Member of Congress on our side of the House serving on the Committee on Un-American Activities. This committee has conducted many hearings and investigations on communistic and subversive activities. Hundreds of witnesses have appeared before the committee. Our committee staff and investigators work daily in our work of exposing communistic and subversive activities. Thousands of letters are answered each week and thousands of bulletins and other information exposing the evil of communism and how it operates as a danger to our Nation have been prepared by the committee and distributed throughout the country in our work to expose and spread the truth about communism. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Un-American Activities prepared, drafted, and reported to the Congress H. R. 9490, a bill to protect the United States against certain un-American and subversive activities, by requiring registration of Communist organizations. In addition, the bill bars Communists from Government and defense plant jobs, requires labeling and identification of Communist propaganda, denies passports to members of the Communist Party, requires publication of subversive organizations in the Federal Register, prevents the running of the statute of limitations in certain cases. A major provision of the bill authorizes and directs mass round-up, jailing or internment of suspected Communist subversives in time of war or national emergency. In addition to providing for internment of subversives, the compromise agreed upon by Senate-House conferees this week, will—

Require Communists and fellow travelers to register with the Government, under penalties up to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine for failure to do so;

Bar Communists from Government jobs or work in defense plants;

Provide stiffer penalties for espionage and sabotage, and make it a felony to picket Federal courts as happened in the famous Communist trials in New York;

Tighten the immigration and naturalization laws; bar citizenship to aliens belonging to subversive groups, and permit canceling the citizenship of persons who join subversive organizations within 5 years of naturalization.

I am proud of my work and services on the Committee on Un-American Activities and equally proud of the above-mentioned Communist-control bill which we prepared and reported to the House. I vigorously supported and voted for the bill on the floor of the House, when it was passed by a vote of 354 for to 20 against. It may not be a perfect law to discourage and control communism and subversive activities, but as time develops needed changes can be made by amendments.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have diligently performed my duties with conscientious devotion to the people of my district and for what I honestly and sincerely believed to be for the best interests of the district, State, and Nation. However, there are some who may find fault and criticize, and when I hear of such criticism, I will think of the words of Benjamin Franklin when he said:

> We must not in the course of public life expect immediate approbation and immediate grateful acknowledgment of our services. But let us persevere through abuse and even injury. The internal situation of a good conscience is always present, and time will do us justice in the minds of the people, even those who are at present the most prejudiced against us.

Hospital Care for Civil War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, while our minds and hearts now naturally turn primarily to the men who are fighting in far-off lands, nevertheless we should not neglect our older veterans who have already made great sacrifices in our country's battles.

To correct a situation which is working a grave hardship on a group of men, unfortunately few in number, but unusually deserving, I have today introduced a bill which would permit veterans who fought for the United States in the Civil War to enter the hospital of their choice when they require medical treatment.

While these veterans are eligible for treatment at veterans' hospitals now, the few who are still with us are well over 100 years old and should not be forced to undergo the inconvenience, and often impossibility of traveling many miles for treatment. In most cases, the only practicable way that these aged heroes can obtain medical assistance is at a local hospital, since, once disease strikes, they cannot be moved the necessary distance to a veterans' facility.

Therefore, my bill provides that every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and received an honorable discharge, shall be entitled to the payment of hospital costs in the hospital of his choice in the locality where he lives if there is no Veterans' Administration facility in such locality in which he may receive treatment.

James A. Hard, 109 years old, is one of the most venerated elder citizens of Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Hard, who is the oldest living veteran of the Civil War, has suffered several illnesses of such gravity that he has needed immediate treatment and could not travel the distance required for treatment at a Veterans' Administration hospital. The Government pension granted these veterans is not sufficient to meet the burden of these additional expenses which Congress certainly never intended that they should have to bear when the original provision for their medical care at Veterans' hospitals was made. Several friends of Mr. Hard's have been kind enough to bring this situation to my attention.

There are only a handful of these veterans who are still living, but we cannot allow ourselves to ignore the additional problems which come with their advanced age. At a nominal cost, we can provide extra security and good health for the remaining years of their lives. Certainly our conscience and sense of gratitude should require no less of us.

I appreciate the fact that it is late in the present session to obtain immediate action on this legislation, but it is my hope that the Committee on Veterans' Affairs will consider it sufficiently meritorious that early and favorable consideration may be accorded the proposal.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a text of the bill to which I have referred:

> A bill to permit Civil War veterans to receive hospital treatment in hospitals of their choice if Veterans' Administration facilities are not available in their locality
> Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, or was on June 9, 1930, on the pension roll as a Civil War veteran, under then existing pension laws, shall be entitled (in addition to any benefits to which he is now entitled) to the payment of hospital costs in the hospital of his choice in the locality where he lives if there is no Veterans' Administration facility in such locality in which he may receive treatment.

So-Called Antisubversive Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues in the Congress to the following editorials from the leading press of the Nation. These important newspapers, of unquestioned reputation, take their stand against the so-called antisubversive bills.

The editorials follow:

[From the Washington Post of September 20, 1950]

HARD CHOICE

The internal security bill agreed upon by House and Senate conferees will impose upon the President a most difficult duty. It contains provisions which he specifically asked Congress to adopt and which are needed to protect the country from the danger of espionage and sabotage. It contains drastic provisions for the internment of dangerously disloyal persons in case of war, insurrection, or invasion—provisions which the President did not think it necessary to request but which might well seem acceptable to him. And it contains the substance of the Wood bill which, when it was adopted by the House as a separate measure a fortnight ago, the President said he would veto. The Wood bill has not been made any less objectionable by virtue of being packaged with other more reasonable measures.

The difficulty of the President's choice stems only in part from the fact that he must veto the entire internal security act if he wishes to keep the Wood bill from becoming law. The difficulty is compounded by the fact that most of his own supporters on Capitol Hill voted for the omnibus legislation in the final showdown. No doubt it would be embarrassing to him as well as to them if he should publicly dissociate himself from their decision. Moreover, any temperance or rationality in dealing with the Communists is considered politically disastrous today.

Nevertheless, it is precisely in such a situation that a Presidential veto serves its most significant constitutional function. The bill passed so overwhelmingly by Congress is panic legislation. It contains features of which this country will be ashamed when sobriety returns. The prestige of the President's office ought to be interposed in an effort to stem the panic—even if the effort now seems a hopeless one and overriding of the veto is considered inescapable. For the sake of the historical record, if for no other reason, the President of the United States ought to register his opposition to an act which flouts the Nation's best traditions. And perhaps it is not too much to hope that leadership of this sort will inspire the palsied Members of the Senate who saddled the President with this painful responsibility. Courage, no less than panic, can be contagious.

[Letter from Reinhold Niebuhr in the New York Times of September 18, 1950]

SENATOR LEHMAN COMMENDED

NEW YORK, September 14, 1950.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

A special acolade should be awarded to Senator LEHMAN for his vote on the bill, which has just passed the Senate, designed to curb communism in this country.

One need not add anything to your own wise editorial comment on the unwisdom of this type of legislation, which, as Senator LEHMAN observed, seems to assume that a totally submerged iceberg is less dangerous than an only partially submerged one.

The point about Senator LEHMAN'S vote is that he was not only one of seven Senators who dared to brave the dangerous hysteria which is arising in this country but he was also the only Senator facing a fall election who took this position.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR.

Editorial from the New York Times, September 17, 1950, said in part:

THE WORK OF CONGRESS

So far as domestic legislation goes, the most serious failure of this session of Congress was in the entire field of civil right. Both Houses showed a disheartening willingness to accept shotgun legislation which, in the name of anticommunism, represents a very real threat to liberty of thought, speech, press, and political association.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of September 15, 1950]

NO JOB FOR AMATEURS

We would stake a good deal on an assertion that everybody in the United States, from archconservatives in both major parties clear through the ranks of the Socialists, would heartily support legislation which would thoroughly dispose of the actual menace in domestic communism.

The Kilgore portion of what has come to be known as the McCarran bill aims at the core of the danger. In event of declaration of war, or imminent invasion, foreign-inspired insurrection, or other circumstance declared a national emergency by Congress and the President, it would empower the Government to round up and intern all foreign agents, saboteurs, spies, and members of the Communist Party. It also would protect and facilitate the individual's right to judicial review.

The trouble is, Congress seems likely either to drop the Kilgore sections or to lump them with provisions which threaten not only to smother freedom of opinion and to harm many sincere and loyal people, but also actually to hamper apprehension of the real subversives. And the President will have no choice but to sign or veto in toto what comes to him.

This newspaper already has pointed out how the arbitrary power to declare any group subversive and compel it to label everything it says or prints "Communist front" could be turned to choke off any reform at the moment unpopular or misunderstood.

Of more immediate concern is the prospect of swamping the FBI with the task of seeing to it that everyone of some 60,000 Communists registers, and that the roster of every alleged "front" organization is complete and correct. The dangerous spies and saboteurs won't register. In fact, not many take the risk of tying up with suspect organizations. The few that have would go underground while the FBI ferrets out political ideologists whose attempts to persuade Americans already have failed dismally.

As we have remarked before: We don't like rats around the national farmstead. But we are chary of amateur exterminators who propose a little poison for the general water supply—especially when even that wouldn't get many rats.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of September 15, 1950]

A DANGEROUS ROAD

The McCarran internal-security bill is admittedly a catch-all; it contains what its author likes to call segments of a broad and diverse nature. Among these segments are the President's recommendations for tightening espionage laws; the amended Hobbs bill; the Mundt-Nixon bill, and (as it now stands) the Kilgore bill. Some of these are good, some bad; and the whole is a mixture which, it seems to us, could have been more effectively dealt with on a piecemeal basis. There is, however, one portion of the bill which has received from the public less attention that it deserves, and which casts across the entire measure a disconcerting cloud. This is the portion dealing with immigration and naturalization.

Senator MCCARRAN'S general attitude toward foreigners and their admission to this country was made unpleasantly familiar to the country during the long debate on the Displaced Persons Act. Much of the mistrust and narrowness which the Senator revealed during his obstinate fight against the DP's found expression in his omnibus immigration bill (S. 3455) introduced last April; and that is in turn extended into his internal-security bill. The parts of the immigration bill incorporated in the new measure ostensibly deal with subversion and sabotage; but they are so broadly and so loosely framed, so inclusive in their prohibitions and so generally menacing to our traditions of freedom and tolerance, that it is difficult to foretell the lengths to which they might lead us.

Aliens to be denied admission to the United States are classified, for example, under a diversity of novel heads. Those would be excluded who seek to enter the United States "principally or incidentally to engage in activities which would be prejudicial to the public interest." Or again, those would be excluded who at any time may have written or published, or had in their possession, printed matter advocating (among other things) "the economic and governmental doctrines of any * * * form of totalitarianism." These, it seems to us, go far beyond the safeguards required. They are not directives defining the role of administrative officers but are invitations to every form of exaggerated and hysterical intolerance.

Other provisions of the bill would prohibit the naturalization of an individual who within the preceding 10 years had been in any way connected with an organization registered with the Attorney General as subversive; and would hold one to be prima facie disloyal to the Constitution who, within 5 years of naturalization, was found to have joined such an organization. The effect of the latter provision would be to create a second-class citizenship, the members of which could be deprived of basic rights on technical grounds, or as a result of ignorance or misjudgment.

The problem of internal security is a real one; its very urgency requires that it be treated with soberness, clarity, and a rooted respect for traditional liberties. It is highly regrettable that there should have been injected into the present bill a group of provisions of a patently dangerous character. The duty of the President and the Congress is plain; they must deal—and deal resolutely—with the menace presented by communism. That duty, unfortunately, has not been made easier by Senator MCCARRAN'S particular contribution, in the fields of immigration and naturalization where he has so often before shown himself prejudiced.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of September 14, 1950]

A HODGE-PODGE ANTI-RED BILL OF DOUBTFUL VALUE

As a result of its Members' preelection day determination to pass anti-Communist legislation—without being too choosey about what form it should take—the Senate has approved a hodge-podge bill that is loaded with impracticable and perhaps unconstitutional provisions that promise little real hurt to subversive movements in this country.

In their rush to get something through that might avoid a Presidential veto, opposing sides in the Senate, who had been hotly accusing each other of trying to assault the Constitution, managed to accept each other's proposals and place them side by side in a compromise bill.

Its major defect is its superficiality in fighting Communist-promoted erpionage and sabotage. It would rely upon two measures: A requirement that all Communists and Communist fronts register as such and an authorization for the internment of Communists in the event of war, invasion, or insurrection.

But such moves would only scrape the surface of subversion. Our greatest danger does not lie in the known, out-in-the-open, loud-mouthed members of the Communist Party but those unknowns, many of them not card-carrying members of the party, who in underground channels labor for Soviet interests. They won't register under the new bill and they cannot be interned under it, either, until they are first exposed and seized.

But even in coping with known, or suspected, Communists and fronts, the bill is deficient. It will be necessary to prove that the persons whose registration, or internment, are wanted, are Communists, and that process is likely to take a great deal of time and machinery. In addition, provisions of the bill are almost certain to be attacked in the courts as unconstitutional. Judging from past performances put on by Communists, it might take 2 years or more before such cases could be adjudicated. Meanwhile, pro-Soviet activity might be spreading rigidly in many parts of the country during a period of increasingly grave emergency.

What is needed, above all, is more aid for the FBI in its efforts to track down and expose spies, saboteurs, and subversives generally—quite aside from identifying by means of registration Communists who are already well known. J. Edgar Hoover has warned that the problem we had in the last war from the Nazi fifth column was very small compared with that caused by Communist activities now. He has pointed also to an increase in the Communist movement underground since beginning of the Korean war. The proposed legislation will probably accelerate this movement. It will not, certainly, take care of the problem of Communist subversion and it would be the worst kind of folly to depend upon it for that purpose.

PRESIDENT PLEADS FOR TOLERANCE

(By Drew Pearson)

Sometimes the President's off-the-record remarks that never reach the papers are his best. Those present thought this was the case when Truman addressed the joint session of the AFL-CIO last week.

Speaking without notes and obviously straight from the heart, the President made a plea for tolerance in wartime.

To a considerable extent it was a historical speech. The President reviewed the different periods of hysteria which have gripped the country—the Alien Sedition Act in the early days of the Republic, the Know-Nothing Party, and Ku Klux Klanism.

He pointed out that the Know-Nothing Party had been anti-Mason and referred to the fact that he, himself, was a Mason. The Klan, he recalled, was first against the Negro; then when revived in the 1920's, against the Jew and the Catholic

These were evidences of intolerance which did not truly represent the American people, he said, and he was absolutely confident that the good judgment of the American people would always win out.

The President did not mention the Mundt-Nixon bill or the McCarran bill, but it was obvious he had them in mind. For he referred to congressional witch hunters who wave the American flag while persecuting alien immigrants and trampling on the rights of loyal Americans.

"This is the raw material of totalitarianism," he said

While fighting the intolerance of totalitarianism, he emphasized, we must not take on the methods of totalitarianism. Recalling that totalitarian regimes had persecuted labor unions, religious groups and fraternal organizations, he pointed out that under the Alien and Sedition Act, naturalized citizens hardly dared say anything in public about the Government for fear of being thrown in jail, and this, he inferred might also happen under the Mundt-Nixon and McCarran bills.

[From the St. Louis Post Dispatch of September 14, 1950]

WORDS TO MARK

Statements by two of the seven Senators who voted against the McCarran-Mundt-Ferguson-Nixon-Wood thought control bill deserves to be read and reread by their colleagues and by the American people.

Senator KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, said:

"I could not live with my conscience if I gave my approval to a bill which does violence to the Constitution, to the Bill of Rights, and which I think destroys many of those freedoms which makes America the great land of the free."

Senator LEHMAN, of New York, who goes before the voters of his State in some 6 weeks, did not hesitate to describe the repressive catch-all as "this tragic, this unfortunate, this ill-conceived legislation." For voting against it, he said:

"My conscience will be easier, though I realize my political prospects may be more difficult."

There are times when a few words count for more than overwhelming numbers on the other side. This is such a time. President Truman should not deviate in the least in his resolve to veto this hysterical bill. He should welcome his opportunity to give the country as great a veto message as any one of his predecessors back to Washington ever wrote.

Betrayal at the Expense of Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity last fall to make an on-the-spot study of the operations of the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund when in Europe as Chairman of the Select Committee on International Organization. I was very much impressed with the excellent work of this agency in the humanitarian work of feeding and caring for children in war-devastated areas of Europe and the Near East, and I am sure that the other members of the committee were likewise impressed.

I was therefore most disappointed when the conferees eliminated the $12,500,000 appropriation for the children's fund contained in the supplemental appropriation bill. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial appearing in the September 20 issue of the New York Times. It follows:

FOR THE WORLD'S CHILDREN

One of the most useful and successful activities of the United Nations has been the children's fund, known throughout the world as UNICEF. Throughout the difficult postwar struggle to keep the peace the children's fund for nearly 4 years now has been busy saving lives, perhaps five or six million of them. It has spent close to $150,000,000, and it is to the great credit of the United States that the major part of the funds have been supplied by this country without thought of political or economic return. At the present moment emergency feeding programs in such areas as Greece and Yugoslavia, India, and the Near East are being conducted by UNICEF, and $500,000 was set aside only a few weeks ago for work in Korea.

But the emphasis has been gradually shifting to longer-range projects primarily in Asia and in Central America. As the critical postwar food shortages in Europe have been ameliorated, attention has been turning toward helping governments in the less-developed areas of the world to eliminate disease directly and, perhaps even more important, to train personnel in public health and related matters as they affect mothers and children. In fact, the United States is one of the principal backers of a resolution, to be brought up at this session of the General Assembly, which would formally establish the children's fund as a permanent agency of the UN instead of as the emergency body that it is at present.

All of this is by way of saying that it is almost incomprehensible that in approving a $17,000,000,000 supplemental appropriation bill a conference committee of the two Houses of Congress should have completely eliminated the American contribution of $12,500,000 to the children's fund for the year 1950–51. If this move was supposed to represent "economizing," we can only say that it is economizing of the most misguided sort. Failure to provide these funds will not only seriously cripple UNICEF by making it almost impossible to plan for the coming year but inevitably also will have a depressing effect on contributions from other countries which have always looked to the United States for leadership in this cause.

Inspiring Statements of Famous Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORGAN M. MOULDER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, in this hour of history, when the free nations of the world are under great stress and burdened with the fear of world-wide communistic domination, and while our Armed Forces are fighting for the defense of freedom, to promote and preserve international peace and our democratic way of life, I believe it is appropriate to consider and record some of the immortal words of famous Americans who have inspired us as a nation in times of momentous problems of the past.

Now we are challenged by a ruthless communistic totalitarian dictatorship, and the following great statements of wisdom and courage should inspire our heritage of freedom and stimulate our true American spirit:

OUR IDEAL, AS EXPRESSED BY FAMOUS AMERICANS IN THE BEGINNING

(William Bradford, History of the Plymouth Plantation)

But here I cannot stay and make a pause and stand half amazed at this poor people's present condition. * * * Being thus past the vast ocean and a sea of troubles before in their preparation, they had now no friends to welcome them, nor inns to entertain or refresh their weather-beaten bodies, no houses or much less towns to repair to, to seek for succor. * * * And for the season, it was winter, and they that know the winters of that country know them to be sharp and violent and subject to cruel and fierce storms, dangerous to travel to known places, much more to search an unknown coast. Besides, what could they see but a hideous and desolate wilderness full of wild beasts and wild men? * * * May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say, "Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wildnerness"? But they cried unto the Lord, and He heard their voice and looked on their adversity.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

(Roger Williams, the Bloody Tenet of Persecution)

Breach of civil peace may arise when false and idolatrous practices are held forth, and yet no breach of civil peace from the doctrine or practice, or the manner of holding forth, but from that wrong and preposterous way of suppressing, preventing and extinguishing such doctrines or practices by weapons of wrath and blood. * * * Whereas it is light alone, even light from the bright shining sun of righteousness, which is able, in the souls and consciences of men, to dispel and scatter such fogs and darkness.

We Must Fight

(Patrick Henry, speech in the Continental Congress, 1775)

If we wish to be free, if we wish to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending, if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight. An appeal to arms and to the God of hosts is all that is left us.

We Hold These Truths

(Declaration of Independence)

We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive to these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Times That Try Men's Souls

(Tom Paine, the Crisis, 1776)

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.

An Early Charter

(Virginia Bill of Rights, 1776)

That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them. * * * That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and, therefore, all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity toward each other.

The American

(Crévecoeur, letter from an American farmer, 1782)

The American is a new man who acts on new principles; he must, therefore, entertain new ideas and form new opinions. From involuntary idleness, service, dependence, penury, and useless labor he has passed to toils of a very different nature, rewarded by ample subsistence.

Three Essentials

(The Northwest Ordinance, 1787)

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

We the People

(Preamble of the Constitution)

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The Four Freedoms

(First amendment to the Constitution)

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Intolerance Condemned

(Jefferson, first inaugural address, 1801)

Let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty and even life itself are but dreary things. And let us reflect that, having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind has so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions.

The World's Best Hope

(Jefferson, first inaugural address, 1801)

I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a republican government cannot be strong; that this Government is not strong enough; but would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment abandon a government which has so far kept us free and firm on the theoretic and visionary fear that this Government, the world's best hope, may by possibility want energy to preserve itself? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest Government on earth.

Remember the Alamo

(William Barrett Travis, appeal from the Alamo, 1836)

To the people of Texas and all Americans in the world: Fellow citizens and compatriots: I am beseiged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Ana. I have sustained a continual bombardment and cannonade for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion; otherwise the garrison are to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the demand with a cannon shot, and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender nor retreat.

The Building of the Ship

(Longfellow)

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all it fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hope, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee.

The Fiery Trial

(Lincoln, Message to Congress, December 1, 1862)

Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or another of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor, or dishonor, to the latest generation. * * * We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last, best hope of earth.

Shall Not Perish

(Lincoln, Gettysburg Address)

It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

Ship of Democracy

(Walt Whitman, from Leaves of Grass)

Sail, sail thy best, Ship of Democracy,
Of value is thy freight, 'tis not the present only,
The past is also stored in thee.
Thou holdest not the venture of thyself, not of the Western Continent alone.
Earth's résumé entire floats on thy keel, O ship, is steadied by thy spars
With thee time voyages in trust, the antecedent nations sink or swim with thee,
With all their ancient struggles, martyrs, heroes, epics, wars, thou bear'st the other continents.
Theirs, theirs as much as thine, the destination port triumphant;
Steer then with good strong hand and wary eye, O helmsman, thou carriest great companions,
Venerable priestly Asia sails this day with thee,
And royal, feudal Europe sails with thee.

Safe for Democracy

(Woodrow Wilson)

The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

Eternal Truths

(Franklin D. Roosevelt)

If the fires of freedom and civil liberties burn low in other lands, they must be made brighter in our own. If in other lands the press and books and literature of all kinds are censored, we must redouble our efforts here to keep them free. If in other lands the eternal truths of the past are threatened by intolerance, we must provide a safe place for their perpetuation.

LIBERTY UNDER GOD

(Franklin D. Roosevelt)

We are going to win the war and we are going to win the peace that follows. And in the dark hours of this day—and through dark days that may be yet to come—we will know that the vast majority of the members of the human race are on our side. Many of them are fighting with us. All of them are praying for us. For, in representing our cause, we represent theirs as well—our hope and their hope for liberty under God.

Increase in Production and Income

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as far back as I can remember, America has been afflicted by the weepers and the wailers, the gloom-peddlers who see nothing ahead except disaster and destruction for this great country. These defeatists and professional pessimists who have been placing us in the poorhouse every 2 years for the past 20 years have been completely consistent in one thing—they have been wrong about every prediction they have made.

At the present time America is enjoying the greatest economic prosperity in the history of this Nation. The value of the goods and services produced by the American people is now approaching $270,000,000,000 a year. Americans have more income, more money in the bank, and more savings than they have ever enjoyed before.

The gloom-peddlers do not try to deny these facts. But they do try to spread fear and uneasiness by telling Americans that the dollars we have today are not worth nearly as much as the dollars in past years. That is true, but we have a great many more dollars now than we had in the years of the great depression.

In those times, millions of Americans had no dollars at all. Their families existed on charity while they paced the streets in search of work or stood hopelessly in the bread lines. I wish to place in the RECORD at this point, an editorial from the Pike County Democrat of Pittsfield, Ill., which brings out this point very clearly.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pike County (Ill.) Democrat of August 16, 1950]

AT LEAST MOST PEOPLE HAVE MORE DOLLARS

We try not to be such prejudiced Democrats that we claim the Democrats bring about everything that's good and the Republicans are the cause of everything bad. Even so, when our all-wise, distinguished and exalted Republican editorial contemporaries vigorously charge that everyone is so much poorer than they were in 1932-33, we can't resist trying to reply—meekly and timidly.

At least, most people have a lot more dollars than they had in 1932-33—statistics prove it. A letter from Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS gives us some of these Government figures. The national income this year is estimated to reach 221 billion dollars, two and a half times the 1929 level and at least five times that of 1932-33. Corporation dividend payments are now highest in history, as is total personal income and per capita income. Savings at highest peacetime level.

Figures for Illinois show that income payments to individuals totaled $3,335,000,000 in 1933 and $15,167,000,000 in 1948. Bank deposits were $2,252,972,000 in 1932 and $11,464,000,000 in 1949. Bank suspensions during the period 1930-33 were 817 and 1934-49 only 10. There were 2,117 business failures in 1932 and only 305 in 1948. Total cash farm income for Illinois in 1932 was $256,000,000, but in 1949 it was $1,702,943,000.

Figures for Pike County show that total retail sales in the county for 1929 were $5,579,000 as compared to $2,645,000 in 1933 and $14,374,000 in 1948. Bank deposits in Pike totaled $5,304,000 on December 31, 1941, and $13,672,000, June 30, 1949. These figures tell the story of all business statistics—in every case the number of dollars is from three to five times what it was in 1932-33.

We do not even claim that these better business conditions and higher individual income are due entirely to the Democratic administration. Naturally, other factors have helped bring about the vast increase in production and the highly increased volume of money in circulation. However, policies of the Democratic administration have made possible many of these achievements. Take just two examples, the farm price-support program and rural electrification. Just think of the tremendous volume of business these two factors alone have created. Good farm income and rural electrification have made it possible for farmers to buy a vast volume of manufactured products—in 1932-33 they could not even pay their taxes.

We are also fully aware of the serious economic problems facing the country, due to World War II and the threat of inflation since the war started in Korea. The national debt is something to think about, too, but even at that, we doubt that it is as serious as pictured by some when you compare the debt of around 255 billion dollars to the total national income of 221 billion dollars.

Even in view of the serious economic problems presented by war, past and present, we think that most people are much better off financially right now than they were in 1932-33. At least we have a lot more dollars and a mighty lot of people think they are better off with more dollars (even 65-cent or 50-cent dollars) than they were in 1932-33, when they had no dollars at all—50-cent dollars or any other kind of dollars.

Report From the Department of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have received a report from the Department of Agriculture on its September 11 estimates of the quantities of some of the food commodities held by the Federal Government in storage. The following is the estimated inventory on nine of these items:

	Pounds
Dried milk	320,700,000
Cheese	106,100,000
Butter	191,800,000
Dried eggs	110,595,296
Beans, dry edible	942,700,000
Peas, dry edible	76,600,000
Rice, rough	7,500,000
Mexican meat	52,623,504
Grain sorghum	3,052,500,000

Although this represents a slight decrease in the amount of dried milk from the report of June 30, the amount of cheese has increased approximately 47,200,000 pounds, or about 80 percent; butter has increased approximately 30,200,000 pounds; and eggs show an approximate increase of 16,700,000 pounds.

This makes it all the more imperative that full legislative action be taken without any further delay so that the President may sign the bill and the Department of Agriculture may start promptly the task of distributing these surplus foods.

The Mobilization Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal this morning, dealing with the work of the Senate Armed Services subcommittee headed by our esteemed colleague, the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. This story is an illuminating commentary on the great work already undertaken by this "watchdog committee" and I am sure all of us in the Senate, and the people of this country, will benefit greatly from the work being done by this subcommittee. In these times, it is comforting to know that such a committee is maintaining the constitutional watchfulness over the operations of the executive agencies concerned which is the duty of the Congress under the law.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFENSE PRODDERS—NEW SENATE COMMITTEE BEGINS SCRUTINIZING MOBILIZATION PROGRAM—ON LOOK LIST: STEEL INDUSTRY, ARMS OUTPUT, MANPOWER, ALASKAN DEFENSES—WHITE HOUSE GIVES GO AHEAD

(By Philip Geyelin and Ellis Haller)

WASHINGTON.—Keep an eye on the Senate's new Preparedness Committee. It's about to put the heat on the administration's slow-moving mobilization program.

If you're involved one way or another in rearmament plans as a businessman, a worker, or even a serviceman—chances are you'll feel the warmth from the committee's activity.

The Senate group, headed by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON (Democrat, Texas), is a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee. It was set up, quietly, a few weeks ago to keep continuous watch over the progress of the new defense buildup. Take a look at the impressive subjects the committee already proposes to investigate:

It's launching a study of the whole steel industry of the United States to find out if there's adequate capacity to meet demand in the next 10 years, and whether more production facilities—perhaps Government-financed—should be built. This has been a Fair Deal interest both in war and peace.

It is pushing a survey of the Government's manpower policies. It wants to know whether Federal bureaucrats know what they're doing on this subject—and whether they need some new laws to strengthen their control over the work force.

ALREADY CHECKING IN ALASKA

The committee will range as far as Alaska, where its checkup on Alaskan defenses is already in progress. Investigators are starting with the assumption that there's a probable lack of coordination between civil and military activities in the northern Territory, that bottlenecks are arising in the over-all construction program, and that labor difficulties there are possibly subversive in origin.

The Ordnance Corps, and manufacturers who produce guns and other weapons, will come in for scrutiny, too. The committee thinks it should study and ascertain reasons for the delay in production and issue of certain types of equipment.

As if these far-reaching checkups weren't enough to keep the committee busy, it's also going to try to determine whether farm commodities are being used effectively in war and peace, and look into the "effect of foreign monopolies on the cost of our mobilization program."

What will come of all this probing and surveying remains to be seen. Apparently the committee feels that nothing related to the national defense is outside its scope. Other investigations probably will be coming along later. Judging from the experience of the last war, knuckle-rapping from the Capitol tends to increase efficiency in laggard defense agencies.

This ambitious set of projects is already well-launched. But lack of publicity about the committee's plans is catching some Federal officials off guard. The Labor Department, for example, is not anxious now for a study of its manpower program, which has been slow to develop.

UNHAPPY AGRICULTURE

The Agriculture Department is none too happy about the prospect of a fresh spotlight on its hoards of surplus commodities purchased under Federal price-support operations. The committee makes it clear it wants to find out whether some of the present surpluses can't be used to further the defense program. It wonders whether other Government agencies (such as the Army) couldn't use up some of the food now in Federal storage. It suggests more surpluses might be traded for strategic and critical materials overseas. It hints that future foreign aid programs ("we will undoubtedly shortly be faced with the problem of feeding millions of starving Koreans") might use up Government-owned foodstuffs.

What's behind this new congressional study group and who's making it tick?

Strangely enough, one of the prime movers is President Truman himself, who owes much of his political prestige to his chairmanship of the special Senate War Investigating Committee in World War II. That group served as the model for the new subcommittee.

Even though some of Mr. Truman's lieutenants will come under fire from Senator JOHNSON and his colleagues, the President is understood to be in favor of such a vigorous watchdog group. White House intimates say, "The boss is willing to let the chips fall where they may."

The committee has promised to take a bipartisan approach to mobilization problems. In that respect, one Government agency official proclaims, "It looks like a pretty tough group."

SEC MEMBER IS COUNSEL

Here's the line-up: In addition to 42-year-old Senator JOHNSON, the chairman, the Democrats are represented by Senators KEFAUVER, of Tennessee; HUNT, of Wyoming; and CHAPMAN, of Kentucky; and the Republicans by SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts; BRIDGES, of New Hampshire; and MORSE, of Oregon.

General counsel of the set-up is Donald Cook, Democratic Vice Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. He is on loan from the SEC to handle legal snarls that may arise as the committee gets into full swing.

Committee staff members say the spadework is already in progress for each of the major studies the group has proposed so far—steel, manpower, foreign cartels, ordnance output, Alaskan defenses, and farm commodities.

"We'll get down to work on the studies on Alaska and ordnance next month," one committee expert explains. "The other studies will be pushed just as rapidly as we can get at them." He added the committee will continue its operations regardless of whether Congress adjourns soon, or comes back for a special session in November.

SEE A RASH OF HEARINGS

"No particular study has priority," the committee aide says. "We're going to have them going simultaneously. We don't know which one may be completed first."

Another committee expert declared the studies now contemplated won't turn into congressional investigations with witnesses and full-dress hearings—"unless," he added cautiously, "we happen to flush out something that appears to need investigating."

Congressional old-timers are predicting, however, that the defense prodders likely will run into enough questions in their studies to bring on a rash of hearings and a parade of witnesses to Capitol Hill.

The committee in its brief existence has already stirred up a ruckus in some parts of official Washington. It issued a report criticizing the sale of some World War II surpluses that are needed in the present Korean fighting, and it has openly questioned the way the Munitions Board has gone about stockpiling natural rubber and other commodities.

Largely as a result of this criticism from the Johnson committee, Munitions Board Chairman Hubert Howard resigned last Monday. Mr. Howard had been scheduled to appear before the Preparedness Committee yesterday.

Committee Chairman JOHNSON, who moved into his Senate seat 2 years ago after serving 11 years in the House, got some experience in prodding defense programs in the last war. He then headed a Naval Affairs Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. Activities of that subcommittee drew praise from the late James Forrestal, who was Secretary of the Navy in those days.

Though the committee started its operations without much fanfare, and has gone out of its way to protest that it is "not looking for headlines," some of its recent actions indicate a desire for more attention.

A recent session, originally scheduled as a closed hearing, was opened to reporters at the last minute. And Senator JOHNSON personally writes letters to Washington correspondents assuring them of his interest in their stories.

OUTLINE FOR STUDIES

Here are some of the details the new Preparedness Committee wants to find out about the subject it intends to "study":

Steel.—The investigation will trace the steel industry's growth, probe gray markets in steel, and survey the financial resources and dividend records of steel companies. The committee's outline for the proposed steel study ends with this heading: "Conclusions: Do we need more production? If so, how quick? If so, where? If so, what should be done?"

A steel company representative here thinks the study will be "pretty comprehensive." He adds, "The committee has already asked us for statistics going back to 1920."

The new steel checkup will be the third congressional probe into steel problems in the past 12 months. The Joint Economic Committee under the chairmanship of Senator O'MAHONEY (Democrat, Wyoming) held hearings on the December 1949 steel price increases back in January of this year.

Later, in April, Representative CELLER (Democrat, New York) studied the steel industry as part of his antimonopoly investigation. During the CELLER hearings, SEC Commissioner Cook, the new Preparedness Committee counsel, gave testimony on the financial history of the steel industry and details about the affiliations of officers of various steel companies.

Ordnance.—The committee wants to evaluate the relationship of the Ordnance Corps with other organizations within the Army and the Defense Department. Among other things, it proposes to inquire into "the reasons for the failure to have 3.5-inch bazookas and ammunition in the hands of combatant troops throughout the world; what is the status of development of an accurate long-range projectile capable of delivering a shaped charge?" Looking farther ahead, the committee suggests it may find "other areas for further study, such as types of guided missiles, tanks, and other improved ordnance."

The committee's staff thinks it already knows what may turn up as part of the ordnance look-see. It says, "We will probably find a tendency to delay production awaiting perfection of design" and a "tendency to reject suggestions from manufacturers and others outside the Ordnance Corps, and reluctance to incorporate such suggestions in either their research or production." It also believes there's a "tendency to withold production of recommended items because of pending development of new models."

Manpower.—The proposal in this field is to "test the adequacy of plans, policies, and operating structures and programs pertaining to manpower against the requirements of the Nation for (A) the current international situation, and (B) total mobilization."

The committee's outline suggests there is some question in the members' minds as to whether policies are now "clear, well-defined and adequate." And whether "the delegation of authorities and responsibilities is clear and effective."

Foreign monopolies.—The purpose of this study is to look into the effect of cartels on the cost of the United States mobilization program. This will trace basic facts about production of strategic materials overseas; whether producers are organized; price movements; and "recommendations made to facilitate acquisition for stockpiling without having to pay exorbitant prices." The committee suggests as "possible approaches" a look into the possibility of direct Government-to-Government dealing on critical materials; whether buying of strategic items couldn't be tied more closely to United States foreign aid; and whether the United States couldn't barter with other countries.

Alaskan defenses.—This investigation is just getting started, under the direction of Senator HUNT. Senators MORSE and SALTONSTALL propose to accompany him to Alaska for a first-hand glimpse of problems there. They'll look into military housing, transportation, communications, and similar matters. Hearings probably will be held after preliminary facts are developed.

Farm commodities.—The group will try to estimate normal United States peacetime commodity requirements, as well as those for a period of semimobilization or for a full-scale 5-year war. It will inquire into the status of current inventories and ask what can be done about stocks of commodities acquired under the price-support program.

Democracy in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 20 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Democracy in Washington," published in the New York Times of Wednesday, September 13, 1950.

This editorial points out the great importance of this Congress extending home rule and suffrage to the people of the District of Columbia. It calls attention to the fact that only 10 or 12 additional signatures to the discharge petition now pending in the House of Representatives are necessary to bring the measure up for consideration.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRACY IN WASHINGTON

Home rule for the District of Columbia is in a situation somewhat analogous to that of the statehood bills for Alaska and Hawaii. All three of these proposals, which would bring a greater measure of democracy to important areas under the American flag, seem at last to have victory almost within their grasp; yet all three are in peril because of the drive for adjournment of Congress.

The statehood bills, which have passed the House, require mainly a little more determination and fortitude on the part of the Senate Democratic leadership. But the bill that would bring self-government to the Nation's Capital, which has passed the Senate, requires something more concrete; it needs less than a dozen additional signatures on a petition that would force it out of the House committee where it has been bottled up for many months.

In view of all this, the wonder is not that so many Members of Congress have endorsed the discharge petition for Senator KEFAUVER'S proposal to give self-government to the District, but that it still lacks enough signatures. For example, although all Democrats and 4 Republicans of the New York State delegation have reportedly signed the petition, there are still 16 New York Republicans who have failed to sign. They alone could carry the petition over the top, and there is still time—not much time, but enough—for them to do so. It is hard to see why at this late date they should hesitate to bring one step nearer realization a plank of both party platforms of 1948.

United States Marine Corps Has Earned and Deserves a Place in the Joint Chiefs of Staff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I have written another letter today recommending the appointment of a representative of the United States Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the Armed Forces. This one to the newly appointed Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall.

I trust that one of the first official duties of the newly appointed Secretary of Defense, George C. Marshall, will be to give serious and favorable consideration to the following letter which I have mailed to him today, immediately following his being sworn in to the most vitally important office in the President's Cabinet at the present time as Secretary of Defense.

The following is a copy of my letter to Secretary Marshall:

MY DEAR SECRETARY MARSHALL: In a recent exchange of correspondence with President Truman on the subject of the United States Marine Corps representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the President in his reply to me used what he later described as "an unfortunate choice of words" which he sincerely regretted in stating that "the Marine Corps is the Navy's police force and as long as I am President that is what it will remain," and then added, "They have a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's."

It is my hope that you will be successful in convincing the President that he is wrong. This is the positive and definite opinion of the American public as indicated in the large volume of mail I have received from all parts of the Nation criticizing the President's opinion of the United States Marine Corps and supporting representation of the United States Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The United States Marine Corps is held in the highest regard and respect by the people of the United States whom they have successfully defended and fought for on the world's battlefields since it was established. They believe that the United States Marine Corps, as a major integral part of our Armed Forces, are entitled to recognition and equal representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff along with the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy.

I am confident that you will agree with me that the United States Marine Corps has earned equal status and recognition with the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy because of their military know-how which has been demonstrated so many times in defense of the United States in all parts of the world since 1776. And that we need all the military know-how we possess on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I, therefore, sincerely suggest that you as Secretary of Defense urge and recommend to President Truman that the United States Marine Corps be given representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in response to the Nation-wide, considered opinion of the people of the United States, who believe that the appointment of a representative of the United States Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff would strengthen and improve the unification of our Armed Forces, and be a beneficial addition to the national security.

Yours sincerely,
GORDON L. MCDONOUGH,
Member of Congress, Fifteenth District, California.

There appears to be no logical reason for denying the United States Marine Corps equal representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the Armed Forces, especially since the Marine Corps is the oldest military organization in the Armed Forces of the Nation with an unblemished record of courage, faith, and devotion to duty in defense of the Nation.

I am hopeful that Secretary Marshall will act favorably on my proposal in the interests of unity in the Armed Forces and security of the national welfare in view of the present threatening and perilous position of the United States in world affairs.

United States Information and Education Program—T-Bomb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming clearer that in our battle to win the world's peoples to our side in the struggle between democracy and Communist totalitarianism, that the T-(truth) bomb is as potent a peace weapon as the H-bomb is a war weapon. Not to utilize the T-bomb is to jeopardize democracy's battle by default.

Appended hereto is a letter from Hon. Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, detailing some phases of the campaign for truth in which our country is engaging. The letter follows:

SEPTEMBER 14, 1950.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. JAVITS: I was interested in the questions you raised on the floor of the House recently regarding the appropriation for the campaign of truth and thought you might like to have a few comments on them.

Regarding the consolidation of the State Department and ECA information activities under one common direction, I would like to point out that it was the Congress which established two separate information entities in ECA countries. On the other hand, the State Department and ECA have made, and are making, a very special effort to coordinate the information activities of the two organizations so that they will represent joint planning and will not overlap at any point in their functions. Last winter we sent the director of our program planning and evaluation staff overseas to look into this coordination and to make suggestions on the development of closer working relations between USIE and ECA. At the end of a 3 months' survey, he reported that the coordination in practically all posts was extremely effective and that little, if any, duplication existed. He did find, however, that some improvement in joint planning was possible and we have now set up additional machinery to provide for this. This same man is returning to Europe at the end of this month to work with ECA and the State Department information officers to develop further coordination and joint planning of all such activities. ECA has entered into the spirit of this coordination with the same enthusiasm that we have, realizing that the United States Government must speak with one voice in foreign countries. It is my belief that the two information programs are actually working in close harmony.

On your question of whether the Department of State is working with indigenous people, organizations, or agencies sympathetic to us, I wish to assure you that this is one of the guiding principles of the information and educational exchange program. We have done our utmost within the capacity of our manpower and funds available to work with and assist indigenous groups favorable to our cause. In some countries this has been done with marked effect and substantial result, while in others the task has been more difficult due to the existence of prejudice and fear. You may be sure, however, that we are not neglecting this highly important phase of our work.

Another question you raised was why the State Department, through its information program, could not sell the United States as effectively as American companies sell automobiles or toothpaste. This question has been raised before by members of the advertising profession, among others, and is a little difficult to understand unless you have actually been engaged in information work abroad. The basic reason, however, lies in the fact that the purchaser of an automobile or a tube of toothpaste is not deciding whether an automobile or a tube of toothpaste is a useful article but merely whether he will buy this brand or another brand. The State Department information program is attempting to sell a philosophy of living to people who in many cases have already made up their minds that they do not want it. To influence them we must reach them through far more subtle means than paid advertising. We must not only tell them that we have a better product but we must prove in realistic terms the facts which support our case. One of the ways in which we do this is through the very indigenous organizations which you mentioned on the floor of the House. Our information program is most effective when it is heard but not seen.

I hope you find these comments helpful and I will be glad to give you any further information on our program if you so desire.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD W. BARRETT,
Assistant Secretary.

Albany, N. Y., and the Felt Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statements:

THE THREAT TO ALBANY, N. Y., OF A FURTHER REDUCTION IN THE TARIFF ON PAPERMAKERS' FELTS

1. Both the management and the CIO and A. F. of L. unions in the papermakers' felt industry are alarmed that the tariff on these felts may be again reduced during the trade agreements negotiations which begin this month at Torquay, England. This is a matter of the greatest concern to the community of Albany, N. Y., since the papermakers' felt industry is the largest single source of employment in Albany.

2. The duty on papermakers' felts provided by paragraph 1109 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930, has already been twice reduced—once by 50 percent in 1935, and again by 20 percent to 33⅓ percent in 1947. These reductions were greater than those imposed on any other part of the woolen industry.

3. As a result of the tariff cuts already made as well as of monetary devaluation, foreign-made felts can now be sold in the United States at a price less than the United States cost of production for domestic felts. The demand for felts will not be increased by any reduction in price since such demand depends on the number of papermaking machines in the United States. Consequently, every foreign felt imported into the United States can only mean one less felt sold by the American industry.

4. Taken together, these facts show that any further cut in the felt tariff will see the American industry gradually dry up and disappear. The capital equipment and highly skilled labor force in the felt industry cannot be readily adapted to other types of production. The destruction of the industry would be a vital blow to the whole Albany area, a useless waste of capital and a tremendous disruption in the lives of a group of loyal and efficient American workers, many of whom have known no other type of work.

5. The papermakers' felt industry is a small business consisting of 11 small competing companies The industry has provided a livelihood for American labor for over 100 years. To turn over the American market for felts to foreign production could not significantly improve the dollar earnings of Europe; it would wreck this established American industry and do tremendous harm to the entire Albany community.

ALBANY AND THE FELT INDUSTRY

1. The Albany Felt Co. and F. C. Huyck & Sons are two of the oldest and most important industries in Albany, both having been established for more than half a century. Together they provide employment for over 2,000 men and women in the Albany area.

2. These companies produce woven woolen felts which are used for machine clothing in many industrial operations, but principally in the manufacture of paper The making of these felts is a carefully developed art requiring highly skilled labor. The cost of this labor is a high percentage in the cost of each felt. For this reason the American industry cannot compete in an unprotected market against low-paid foreign workers.

3. The American industry was driven from the world market a number of years ago by the competition of cheap labor in Sweden, Finland, Germany, Britain, France, Argentina, Brazil, and Japan. During the war and immediate postwar period, while the European industry was occupied or disorganized, American felts were again seen in the world market, but with the revival of the foreign industry, American felt exports are again disappearing. The American industry has been able to survive in the domestic market only by virtue of the United States tariff. This tariff is being rapidly eaten away by the trade agreements program and the continued existence of the woven woolen felt industry in Albany is in grave jeopardy.

4. Until 1935 felts were dutiable under an ad valorem tariff ranging from 50 percent to 60 percent and under a specific duty of 50 cents per pound to compensate for the duty on wool. However, a trade agreement with Sweden in 1935 cut the ad valorem duty in half so that the range, instead of being 50 percent to 60 percent, was 25 percent to 30 percent. This was a greater cut than that imposed upon any other part of the woolen industry.

5. Following this reduction imports of felt into the United States, which had averaged only about 6,000 pounds per year, rose 633 percent to 38,000 pounds by 1939. Foreign manufacturers were beginning to invade the American market in force when the war interrupted foreign trade.

6. Following the war foreign felt mills were taxed to capacity to supply the accumulated European demand. During this period of shortage a trade agreement with Great Britain in 1947 further cut the American tariff by another 20 percent to 33⅓ percent. As a result the ad valorem duty is now only 20 percent, and the compensatory duty has been reduced to 37½ cents per pound

7. Monetary devaluation has come on top of this second cut. It has operated to reduce British and other foreign prices by an amount in the neighborhood of 15 percent to 20 percent.

8. The result is that the cost of producing felts in the United States is far greater than the cost of producing felts in Europe. So-called common wet felts, which constitute the single largest felt item, can be landed in this country at a price, after payment of duty and all other costs, of $2.75, against the price for comparable United States felts of $3.50, after giving effect to a recent cut in American prices. A similar price differential exists for other types of felt. The principal felt mill of Sweden has announced that by 1951 it will double its felt-making capacity, which, on the basis of its own figures, will give this single mill a surplus capacity for export equal to 25 percent of the whole American production.

9. The production of felts at Albany is high cost production, in spite of the highly efficient manufacturing methods which the Albany companies have developed. Any further tariff reduction would raise a serious question whether these companies would survive at all, or could survive only by removing their production activities to a cheaper labor market such as Canada or one of the Southern States.

10. Such a further tariff reduction is now threatened. The State Department is planning a third round of tariff negotiations with more than 50 countries at Torquay, England, which will begin the latter part of this month. Papermakers' felts have been included in the list of commodities for tariff negotiation.

11. Under the existing authority in the trade-agreements legislation, the tariffs, which are now 20 percent ad valorem and 37½ cents per pound, may be reduced to 15 percent ad valorem and 25 cents per pound. This reduction may well represent the critical margin upon which the life of the American industry depends. Because of disturbed conditions abroad, the effect of previous tariff cuts has not yet been tested. Up to this point there have been few imports of foreign felts because there has not existed a foreign felt surplus production, but now foreign producers have goods to sell and are pressing at the door to the American market. There is every sign that we are at the beginning of a major export drive to capture that market. The present low tariff, the currency devaluation and the expansion of foreign production which is now under way, may without any further tariff reduction, bring disaster to the American industry. Such a further reduction would bring disaster even closer.

Air Power Alone Hit by Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I include the following article from the New York Times, Wednesday, September 20, 1950, concerning Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Air Force Chief of Staff, which everyone should read. He is great because he is fair. The article from the New York Times follows:

AIR POWER ALONE HIT BY VANDENBERG—GENERAL SAYS IT NEVER WILL WIN A WAR—HE EMPHASIZES NEED FOR TEAMWORK

WASHINGTON, September 19.—Air Force friends who see air power as the answer to all the Nation's military needs are a source of worry to the Nation's top air commander.

In an interview today Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Air Force Chief of Staff, pointed with pride to a job well done in the skies over Korea, and then pricked a series of gas balloons raised by all-out air-power enthusiasts.

"Air power," he said, "can never win a war by itself. Air power cannot now and never will be able to guarantee that enemy planes may not deliver some atomic bombs to American cities."

Finally, despite the current Korean success General Vandenberg said United States land, sea, and air forces could not be expected to play fire brigade everywhere and, by themselves, guarantee the safety of every land on the globe.

As he answered critics who have found fault with the country's military performance in Korea, the 51-year-old general ticked off the fundamentals of an air-war lesson that, he said, "I wish both our friends and our hostile critics would understand."

First, there is the theory that victory will automatically flow to the nation with the biggest air force.

HE EMPHASIZES TEAMWORK

"It is not," he emphasized, "the Air Force's job to win wars alone, and no one in authority in the Air Force has ever said it was or could be. By 'authority' I mean the Secretary and Chief of Staff, the only two individuals who can speak for the Air Force on such a matter."

The Air Force, he said, "is one part of an air-land-sea team on which no one unit is more important than the other two.

"It is not," he emphasized, "a matter of dividing available men and money in equal portions between the services. Each needs its own tools to do its job and the respective size or cost of each of the three branches is unrelated to its importance."

General Vandenberg has his own three-step timetable of Air Force defense obligations.

"Since we will never start a war," he said, "our first problem is to have a defense of interceptor planes ready to go in the air at once, if enemy planes start an atomic attack early on any given morning. We know that, just as Germany at the peak of its air power was unable to force the turnback short of the target of a single one of our bomber strikes, we cannot expect to prevent all enemy planes from getting through. But we will stop some."

Next, he said, is the Air Force obligation to hit back at an enemy.

"Perhaps late on the day of the assumed morning attack, or maybe the next day, we must hit long range at the force attacking us. That strike-back power, combined with local defense at home, constitutes 'air security' and is designed to make any potential enemy hesitate over the costs of an attack upon us."

THE NEED FOR TACTICAL AIR POWER

Third, the general said, comes the matter of tactical air power—the branch in which some critics say the United States is lacking.

"Tactical air power is for the support of troops," he continued. "Up until now we have not had a large Army to support and, for that reason, have concentrated on the first two essentials. In the near future that situation may be changed."

The general said flatly that national air defenses were still below the safety level he sought.

"At present," he said, "we scarcely have 48 air groups, let alone the 69 that is talked about. We have just got the money to start building a radar net around the country. That net is an essential for air defense but it will not, it should be remembered, be any sort of mosquito bar that will make it impossible for any enemy plane at all to reach an American target."

Turning to Korea, General Vandenberg first warned that a success there must not lead to the assumption that the United States was ready to do "fire brigade" duty everywhere on earth.

These 48 States Are Truly United—Back of Our Men in the Field Is the Entire Nation. In the Shops and Factories, on the Farm, in Office Skyscrapers, and in Every Home Men and Women Are Contributing Their Bit To Keep the Fires of Freedom Burning.—John Steelman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss in brief the fifth Battle Report—Washington, made by our good friend, the Assistant to the President, John Steelman, in collaboration with the National Broadcasting Co.

In this teledocumentary Mr. Steelman took the American people on a sort of a visit with Vice Adm. Ross T McIntyre; the Honorable Adrian Fisher, legal adviser to the Secretary of State; and Brig. Gen. Wallace Graham, personal physician to the President.

He then took us on a visit with Rear Adm. Norton D. Willcutts, commanding officer of the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md., where the wounded are daily coming in from Korea by the dozen.

Mr. Speaker, while they are mostly Army men, now under the program of unification that has been perfected, they are being treated by the United States Navy. This is indeed substantial evidence of the manner in which the unification problem which long beset us in Congress has now been achieved and is working insofar as hospitalization is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot point out too strongly the wonderful work that Dr. John Steelman is performing in rendering this service to the American people. These reports, telecast over the National Broadcasting Co.'s tremendous television system, bring the White House and top-flight officials of our Government right into the living rooms and the homes of our people.

This particular Sunday broadcast was made most interesting and highly informative in many aspects, particularly so with respect to that portion of the talk made by the Air Force Flight Surgeon Brig. Gen. Wallace Graham, which dealt with new drugs, surgical and medical procedures, and techniques which our armed services have been employing since World War II.

Mr. Speaker, again I wish to point out that there is a veritable arsenal of information not otherwise obtainable made available by this program, Battle Report—Washington.

In order that it can receive the greatest possible dissemination throughout the Nation, I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks and place the same in the RECORD:

BATTLE REPORT—WASHINGTON

Mr. ROBERT MCCORMICK. On the second Sunday in September, the sixty-eighth day of bombs in Korea, NBC television once again turns its cameras upon both war front and home front for your fifth Battle Report, Washington.

Washington, where the President and Congress, this week, moved another step forward to assure—thousands of miles away in embattled Korea—the victory men of United Nations are struggling to achieve.

This is Robert McCormick, greeting you from the Nation's Capital. Here with us today, waiting to report to you against the background of the conflict in which we are engaged, are men who represent the executive, the military, and the diplomatic arms of our Government. Our cameras turn first upon the Assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. It is not an exaggeration to say that the eyes of all the world are upon the United States today. To many millions, we are the champions of the cause of liberty—the enemies of every system which makes men slaves. Men everywhere are watching every action we take—and listening to every word we speak.

The heroic work of our men fighting in Korea under the United Nations flag is reported almost hourly all over the world. With each success, freemen everywhere rejoice. With each reverse, they do not become disconsolate or fear for their own freedom. They know we cannot and will not fail.

For back of our men in the field is the entire Nation. Every one of us is in this struggle. In the shops and factories, on the farms, in office skyscrapers, and in every home, men and women are contributing their bit to keep the fires of freedom burning. These 48 States are truly united.

This afternoon we will visit with several Government officials and hear how they are carrying their share of the load. We will take a short trip to the Bethesda Naval Hospital where we will hear from soldiers who were wounded in Korea and are now fighting their way back to health. We will hear what steps are being taken to guarantee them the best medical care in the world. Several pertinent parts of the address the President made last evening will be repeated for us.

Next week a meeting will be held in New York which is of tremendous importance to every citizen of the free world. There the council of foreign ministers will gather to discuss and make plans to avoid war and to preserve freedom. Mr. Philip Jessup—our ambassador at large—will tell you about that meeting, and of our hopes for the future.

Truly, this is a struggle of all freemen everywhere. Each of us has his work to do, and the better he does it, the sooner the day will come when we will know a genuine peace.

Mr. McCORMICK. Our studio cameramen now pick out a man to report to you on an aspect of the war that concerns all our troops. He is the President's personal physician—Air Force Flight Surgeon Brig. Gen. Wallace Graham.

General GRAHAM. You have probably heard many accounts of the new drugs and the new surgical and medical procedures and techniques which we have been employing since World War II. This has been augmented, of course, by the discovery of the antibiotics such as penicillin, streptomycin, etc., and the residency program which the general hospitals of all services have been combined in putting forward. Since World War II, however, we have made commensurate advancement much more rapidly than from World War I to World War II, which was like from the horse and buggy to the jet airplane, but we are making steady advancement all along the line. Tonight, however, I would like to talk to you about an advancement in military medicine which is a bit different but fully as important. It stemmed essentially from a nonmedical development when our President Truman and the Nation's leaders decided that our Armed Forces could achieve greater defense strength by integrating their power and by integrating their plans and cooperating more closely in their operations. When the National Defense Act of 1947 and its amendments were made a law the military medical services were confronted with many of the same problems as the fighting forces they support. Now, when the combat units grow closer in mutual strategic and tactical support, they know that the medical services must be closely integrated into one solid fighting force. The results of these changes have brought into sharp focus the necessity of our integration since our assault upon South Korea. Well, the Army, Navy, Marines, and Air Force have carried out combined operations against the enemy. Their medical services have worked closely together so that a man now wounded can be returned to the zone of the interior or to the first stage for his treatment within a matter of minutes and his life depends upon this. Now, to those of us who have the privilege of caring for the men who are wounded in Korea as I am at Walter Reed General Hospital every day, where we can get first-hand information from these men, as a splendid example of American team play and action, it is a stimulating development in military medicine which is only surpassed by the spirit and courage of the wounded man himself.

Mr. McCORMICK. As war continues in Korea, last week Defense officials reported approximately 2,000 more casualties, bringing the total announced since war's beginning to close to 9,000. Of these, over 5,000 are wounded, removed from the battlefield and, if seriously injured, hastened home for treatment by the speedy air-evacuation system we described to you 2 weeks ago. Today, by means of a special remote television pickup, we have arranged to take you some 10 miles away from Washington to Bethesda, Md., where rises the tower of the National Naval Medical Center. Originally intended strictly for the Navy, it serves today as an excellent example of what unification has done—for its doors are now swinging open to receive Army wounded. Off we go, then, to Bethesda, Md., to the eighteenth floor of a Navy hospital to hear about Army injured from NBC's civilian—David Brinkley.

Mr. BRINKLEY. We are on the eighteenth floor of the Naval Medical Hospital in Bethesda, Md., just outside of Washington, D. C.—the National Naval Medical Center. The wounded from Korea are coming in here by the dozens. Though they are Army men mostly, they are being treated by the Navy. Today in the next few minutes we are going to talk to a few of them, and the man who is responsible for the care they are getting.

First of all, Pfc. Gilbert Weatherly.

Mr. Weatherly, where are you from? Where is your home?

Answer. My home is in Salisbury, Md.

Question. That's pretty near by here, isn't it?

Answer. Yes; it is.

Question. Tell me what happened to your arm. Where were you when you were hit?

Answer. I was on the Naktong front and I got shrapnel in my left arm.

Question. How do you feel now? Is it in pretty good shape?

Answer. It is in pretty good shape and I feel fine.

Question. You are in the Army. The Navy, though, is taking care of you?

Answer. Yes; it is.

Question. Are you looking for a 3-day pass pretty soon?

Answer. A 3-day pass and more if I can get it.

Mr. BRINKLEY. The admiral is here with us. Maybe we can talk to him about it in a minute.

Over here is another Army man. Tell us your name, will you?

Answer. My name is Percy Hubert Davis.

Question. And you are in the Army too?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Well, what happened to your arm?

Answer. I got hit in small arm fire.

Question. Where? In Korea?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And how did they get you back here?

Answer. By ship, all the way.

Question. How's the food here in the hospital? Are they feeding you pretty well?

Answer. Yes, sir; they're feeding me fine.

Question. Did you volunteer for the Army or did they draft you?

Answer. Volunteered.

Question. Would you volunteer now?

Answer. Hard to say.

Question. The Navy is taking pretty good care of you?

Answer. Yes sir.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Well, here with you is the man responsible for it, Director of the National Naval Medical Center, who we are going to introduce right now. He is Read Adm. Morton D. Willcutts, Commanding Officer of the National Medical Center. Admiral Willcutts.

Admiral WILLCUTTS. Mr. Brinkley, the Naval Medical Center is humble and feels keenly the privilege of extending our medical facilities to our brothers in arms, sick and wounded, from the distant battlefields.

Mr. BRINKLEY. About how many do you have, Admiral?

Admiral WILLCUTTS. At the minute we have over 30 Army men from Korea and more coming in.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Tell me, what are these jugs and bottles here?

Admiral WILLCUTTS. We have in these bottles a new development that I am very pleased to report on. You understand the blood plasma bank?

Mr. BRINKLEY. The blood bank; yes.

Admiral WILLCUTTS. We are developing a new human tissue preservation, the bone bank, the skin bank, and the blood vessel bank.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Now what's in here?

Admiral WILLCUTTS. That is the container in which we preserve it to ship it overseas, if necessary, or to another hospital, or to any boy at the front.

Mr. BRINKLEY. And these little bottles?

Admiral WILLCUTTS. The little bottles are some specimens of skin and blood vessels and bones.

Mr. BRINKLEY. How do you use these pieces of bone?

Admiral WILLCUTTS. Well, if you know war wounds, they are often destructive of tissue, wide tissue, and that requires major reconstruction surgery. So when we have a gap, we immediately have available a piece of bone, skin, or blood vessel to use, preserved something very much like blood plasma, immediately available to replace these gaps.

Mr. BRINKLEY. You replace a piece of live bone with another piece of live bone that has been frozen. Well, I thank you very much, Admiral. Now we want to talk to another two or three of your patients over here.

What's your name?

Answer. Pfc. Donald L. Woodie, Institute, W. Va.

Question. What happened to your leg?

Answer. I was shot by small-arm fire.

Question. Where did this happen?

Answer. Korea.

Question. Are you an air evacuee?

Answer. That's right.

Question. How long did it take?

Answer. Approximately 2 days, 2½ days.

Question. How's the Navy taking care of you?

Answer. Fine.

Question. You don't have to say that just because the admiral is here. It's pretty good?

Answer. Yes.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Well, here's one of your buddies here that we want to talk to. He's a master sergeant.

Question. What's your name?

Answer. My name is Jack Poine.

Question. Where are you from?

Answer. I am from East Bank, W. Va.

Question. And you are from Korea, hit in Korea? What happened to you?

Answer. A tank was firing and I happened to get in the way.

Question. Caught you in the foot. I notice there's a mark in the cast?

Answer. That's where a piece of shrapnel went through my ankle.

Question. I see. Well we hope all of you have a very quick recovery. Do you want to go back to Korea? Or should I ask you?

Answer. Well, my outfit is still over there. If they are going to stay I guess I'll have to go back.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Thank you very much. On the 19 floors in this hospital there are a great many wounded from Korea. Obviously there is a great deal of need for medical care. President Truman just yesterday signed a bill authorizing the Defense Department to draft physicians and dentists. Now we are going to hear from a naval medical officer who you all know of. Now let us hear from Vice Adm. Ross T McIntyre.

Admiral MCINTYRE. During the past week President Truman took positive action in signing the bill that established the draft for doctors and scientists. There is no disgrace in this for it is absolutely necessary that we have in the Armed Forces a sufficient number of doctors who can take up the slack that has been so obvious in these past few months.

As we all know, a great number of our young doctors during 1945, 1946, and 1947 had the advantage of free medical training in the various hospitals of the Armed Forces. Many of these young doctors had great opportunity for advanced study, for not only did they have the staffs of hospitals themselves but the consultants who were the finest in the Nation. These men will now have the opportunity to go on following this work that they have done in these institutions and go on to take their places in the field in the various combat organizations, and they will also help fill up the vacancies that now exist. The doctors are doing the job that they have been asked to do, the quick handling of the wounded, that these men may live.

Mr. McCORMICK. At ten-thirty last night, the headlines featured the North Koreans' new strike at Taegu * * * and focused attention on the two vital highway junctions of Youngchon and Kyongju. Against this backdrop * * * and for the second time within eight days * * * President Truman spoke to the Nation. He told us what we may expect in the way of economic mobilization to match our expanded defense program. Because the President's remarks—perhaps more than anything else—give a hint of "the shape of things to come," Battle Report has prepared for you a special digest of the highlights of that speech—as our announcers put it * * * "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States * * *."

President TRUMAN. I want to talk with you about what we must do here at home to support our fighting men and to build up the strength which the free world needs to deter Communist aggression.

Our goals are plain.

We must produce the military equipment that is needed.

We should pay for our defense as we go.

We must hold the cost of living steady, and keep down the cost of defense items.

We have been spending about $15,000,000,000 a year for defense. We are stepping up this rate rapidly. By next June, under our present plans, we expect to be spending at the rate of at least $30,000,000,000 a year. In the year after that, we shall probably have to spend much more than $30,000,000,000.

We must do everything we can to expand our total production. This will require harder work and longer hours for everybody It will mean additional jobs for women and older people

It means the businessmen should expand productive facilities, develop new techniques, and increase efficiency in every way possible. It means enlarging our capacity to produce basic materials such as steel, aluminum, and copper.

There is only one sensible way to pay for our increased defenses. It is the plain, simple, direct way. We should pay for them as we go, out of taxes.

There are very good reasons for this.

To to the extent that we finance our defense effort out of taxes now, we will avoid an enormous increase in the national debt. Furthermore, if we tax ourselves enough to pay for defense, we will help to hold down prices. Taxation—just an equitable taxation—is the way to distribute the cost of defense fairly. We must carry out the defense program without letting inflation weaken and endanger our free economy.

Everybody would lose if we let inflation do unchecked. Workers would be hurt. The extra dollars in Saturday's pay check would be taken away by the higher prices for Monday's groceries.

The wives and children of our fighting men would be hurt even more. Everybody living on a pension, on retirement benefits, or a fixed income of any kind, would be hurt in the same way.

We must not let these things happen.

The fight against inflation is not just the Government's fight. It is your fight, the fight of all of us, and it can be won only if all of us fight it together.

For the consumer, the guiding principle must be: Buy only what you really need and cannot do without. If every American housewife does this there will be enough of the essentials to go around. But if she buys more than she needs there will not be enough to go around and prices will go up.

For businessmen, the guiding principles must be: Do not pile up inventories; hold your prices down. There is no excuse for price increases which go beyond the amount of cost increases. For wage earners, the guiding principle must be: Do not ask for wage increases beyond what is needed to meet the rise in the cost of living. If wage earners ask for higher and higher wages, they will be driving prices up—all along the line.

The Government is not putting on mandatory ceilings on prices and wages at this time. But we will impose ceilings as vigorously and promptly as the situation calls for them.

I am sure that we will be willing to make sacrifices here at home, if we think of the much greater sacrifices being made by our sons and brothers and husbands who are fighting at the front.

Mr. McCORMICK. To fill what Winston Churchill has called the "hideous gap" in the defense of Europe, last year, 11 nations, America included, bound themselves into the North Atlantic Treaty organization—and signed what is called the Atlantic Pact for mutual defense against the threat that faces us in Europe. This week, in New York, America will play host to its partners, the signatories of the Atlantic Treaty, who will meet following an important conference of the west's big three foreign ministers. To sketch the significance of these meetings, we now present to you a man who is daily concerned with the strategy of international relations—the legal advisor to the Secretary of State—Mr. Adrian Fisher.

Mr. FISHER. You have seen and heard the heroic sacrifices which our men are making for us in Korea. You have heard of the steps that are being taken to see that they get the best medical care. You have heard the President of the United States tell us what is going to be done to back them up here at home. What I would like to talk to you about is what the Department of State is going to do in the next few weeks in the big job that faces us all, to see that these sacrifices are not made in vain. On Tuesday our Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, will meet with the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, Mr. Ernest Bevin, and Mr. Robert Schuman, Foreign Minister of France. The problems they face are without precedence. I can say simply that every discussion in this meeting between the foreign ministers at New York will revolve around this one central issue, "How Can We Best Meet the Threat of Communist Aggression"' Later in the week, these three men will join the representatives of the other countries which have signed the North Atlantic Treaty. We and our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty are convinced that the best defense against aggression is strength, strength which can be quickly summoned and unmistakably recognized. To achieve that strength and to achieve it quickly the United States and its partners in the North Atlantic Pact are engaged in a great effort to develop balanced collective forces. The President of the United States has indicated that we are prepared to increase substantially the United States forces stationed in Europe. We will expect comparable efforts by our North Atlantic partners so that our contributions together will result in real strength and security. On Tuesday the 19th, the circle widens. As the General Assembly of the United Nations opens its meeting, there we will have again the town meeting of the world where the leading statesmen of 59 countries will meet to work for peace. All of these countries by adhering to the United Nations Charter have solemnly resolved to unite their strength to maintain international peace and security. In this larger meeting, which many of you will possibly follow on the radio and on television, there will be one discordant note. You will find the Soviet and the satellite representatives following the pattern of obstructing the work for peace which has been made so familiar in the United Nations Security Council. It is a good thing that the Communist imperialists should meet with the free world in the General Assembly. It is well that the world should see and hear them trying to obstruct the efforts of the free nations to end the threat of war. It is well that the representatives of Communist imperialism should see at first hand the united determination of the free world to prevent aggression, and to work for peace. Communist aggression has the physical power to disrupt the peace, but the truth is that the free countries, the peoples of the free countries, and the plain men and women who live behind the iron curtain want peace. By remaining united and by increasing their determination and strength, the free countries of the world can make this universal human wish come true.

Mr. McCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America—as top Federal and defense officials have come before you to report—moves into the twelfth week of war in Korea. And the latest headlines, that reflect that war.

HEADLINES

Communist troops apparently are squaring away for another smash at Taegu, the anchor point of our defense line, on the northwest corner. The Reds are drilling away with a heavy barrage, on our positions about 5 miles north of Taegu. United Nations military men are convinced it's the first step, of a big offensive, so they squared themselves away as best they could and waited for it to hit. Our answering artillery fire was fairly light.

Around Pohang, the second best port we had in Korea—around Pohang, we were forced to retreat but spokesmen deny emphatically that we have lost the Pohang airport, as claimed by the Reds

Air work has again been held down by weather, but over the week end began to pick up; but the lull was long enough to give the Commies a chance to move fresh supplies up to the front.

And aside on the news; American military men tell us that they've liberated 73 South Koreans, who had been captured by the Reds, forced to fight, with North Korean troops.

Mr. McCORMICK. But even as we hear these headlines, let us not forget the vision of faith of our forefathers who welded our Thirteen Original Colonies into the democratic system for which we are fighting. Author Paul Green has captured that vision for us in his stirring symphonic drama, Faith of Our Fathers, now being enacted here in the Nation's Capital under the auspices of the Washington Sesquicentennial Commission. To Laurence Ryle who performs the leading role of George Washington in Faith of Our Fathers, we turn now for the final words of that play and this battle report.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON. Today there is rising in the east a dictatorship of tyranny and oppression. The hopes of men there are perishing, the people all over the earth are looking toward us as guardians of the rights they are losing. We must keep those rights safe and inviolate here until the blessed day when they can share them, for it we do not stand ready to fight for these principles, giving our very lives if necessary, then our struggle is in vain. The hopes of men will perish and the light of liberty will go out, engulfing the sons and daughters that come after us. Freedom, justice, truth among men—this is our dream, this our faith forever more, and that dream shall not die."

Mr. McCORMICK. Until we point our cameras upon the Nation next week for another teledocumentary—this, then, against the background of battlefront Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your fifth—Battle Report, Washington.

Diplomatic Immunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Peter Campbell Brown, Assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, before the insurance section of the American Bar Association at the Hotel Willard, Washington, D. C., on September 19, 1950:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, members of the insurance section, fellow members of the American Bar Association, ladies, and gentlemen, I deem it a high honor and distinct privilege to be here this morning to participate with you in the discussion of the doctrine of diplomatic immunity, a subject not often encountered in the average lawyer's general practice, but one which bids fair to occupy us much more frequently with the passing of time.

It should be noted at the outset of such a discussion that we are dealing with individuals who comprise that class which is known generally as the diplomatic corps and to whom the general rules of civil conduct do not apply. In order to further appreciate the reasons for such special treatment we must briefly survey the historical background of the doctrine.

The practice can be traced to the nether reaches of history and carries through to the present because it has proved to be essential to the conduct of international relations. In ancient times, rulers, whether patriarchs, kings, or emperors, were each regarded by their subjects as the veritable fountainheads of all rules of conduct or law. Each ruler, in his own domain, was not subject to the law but was himself the guardian or patron of the law. So, also, he was the dispenser of justice within his realm and each subject could seek the ruler's opinion or advice touching upon the rights and duties of the individual subject under the law. Thus the phrase, "The king can do no wrong," came into general use. As the population of a particular political subdivision increased so that the king could not personally hear and determine every matter brought to his attention, it became necessary for him to deputize his authority to chancelors, magistrates, or judges, who would, in the ruler's stead, hear and determine the rights of the subjects under the precepts of the law.

It frequently came to pass that some rulers would meet with other rulers to discuss the problems which were mutual to the domain of each. As each ruler was supreme insofar as his subjects were concerned, the laws of neither country could apply to any ruler. This is the basic origin of the concept of sovereign immunity wherein each ruler was accorded abroad the same privileges and immunities which he enjoyed at home.

As time went on and with the increase in commerce between the peoples of the world, it was not always possible for sovereigns to continue to meet face to face to discuss various matters. Too, it was often not politic for one sovereign to leave his own domain in order to travel to the land of another lest he return later to find a usurper in his place. It thus became necessary for the rulers to send out deputies or agents to conduct such negotiations as might be necessary. In all respects each of these individuals represented their respective sovereigns strictly in accord with specific instructions given them by the ruler of each, and they were known as legates, nuncios, envoys, ministers, or ambassadors. Since they were commissioned by their rulers to act for them in a representative capacity of the highest order, they were accorded the prerogatives, privileges, and immunities which were enjoyed by their masters.

The envoy was thus regarded as a sacred individual and treated as though he were the ruler who had never left his own country. This was formerly, and is in many countries today, referred to as the privilege of extraterritoriality. The envoy was considered to embody the head of the state from whence he came and was regarded as the personification of the ruler himself. The primary purpose of immunity, however, was to grant the envoy complete freedom of action in the advancement of his representative functions, by relieving him of the fear of transgressing the law. It is most desirable that he be permitted to discharge his responsibilities unfettered and free of the possibility of harassment and indignities. On the basis of reciprocity, privileges and immunities are the accepted means by which the normal functioning of diplomatic intercourse is assured.

Thus in the concept of the law of nations there became established the doctrine of diplomatic immunity. This idea of diplomatic immunity was a part of the law of nations or international comity for many centuries although never reduced to writing. Each nation adhered strictly to the unwritten code and exercised only the right to expel an ambassador or one of his retinue if such an individual were ever to become offensive.

While there has never been a written international code embodying this doctrine, we do find occasional reference to the subject such as, for example, in the body of the ancient written law, like the code of Hammurabi, but those references have been somewhat scant as to the extent to which the privilege obtained.

In the thirteenth century (1263 A. D.) we find the subject was not neglected by the compilers of the Lao Siete Partidas, or the seven parts of the law of Spain, since in part VII, title XXV, law IX, appears the following:

"Envoys frequently come from the land of the Moors and other countries to the court of the King, and although they may come from the enemy's country and by his order, we consider it proper and we direct that every envoy who comes to our country, whether he be Christian, Moor, or Jew, shall come and go in safety and security through all our dominions, and we forbid anyone to do him violence, wrong, or harm, or to injure his property.

"Moreover, we decree that although an envoy who visits our country may owe a debt to some man in our dominions, which was contracted before he came on the mission, he shall not be arrested or brought into court for it; but if he should not be willing to pay any debts which he contracted in our country after he came on the mission, suit can be brought against him for them, and he can be compelled to pay them by a judgment of court."

In 1708, in England, several turbulent and disorderly persons in the town of London took occasion to seize upon the ambassador extraordinary of his czarist majesty, the Emperor of Great Russia, taking him out of his droshky in the public street and detaining him for several hours in a place of confinement. Her Majesty, Queen Anne, upon being told of this indignity to a diplomat, called upon the lords spiritual and temporal of the British Parliament, and caused to be enacted a law for preserving the privileges of ambassadors and other public ministers of foreign princes and states. On the basis of this British statute, the United States enacted laws for the protection of diplomats in the year 1790, which laws are still in force and effect. They are contained in sections 252-255 of title 22, United States Code, and are as follows:

"SEC. 252. Suits against ministers and their domestics prohibited.

"Wherever any writ or process is sued out or prosecuted by any person in any court of the United States, or of a State, by any judge or justice, whereby the person of any ambassador or public minister of any foreign prince or State, authorized and received as such by the President, or any domestic or domestic servant of any such minister, is arrested or imprisoned, or his goods or chattels are distrained, seized, or attached, such writ or process shall be deemed void (R. S. sec. 4063).

"SEC. 253. Penalty for wrongful suit.

"Whenever any writ or process is sued out in violation of section 252 of this title, every person by whom the same is obtained or prosecuted, whether as party or as attorney or solicitor, and every officer concerned in executing it, shall be deemed a violator of the laws of nations and a disturber of the public repose, and shall be imprisoned for not more than 3 years and fined at the discretion of the court (R. S., sec. 4064).

"SEC. 254. Exceptions as to suits against servants, etc., of minister; listing servants.

"Sections 252 and 253 of this title shall not apply to any case where the person against whom the process is issued is a citizen or inhabitant of the United States in the service of an ambassador or a public minister and the process is founded upon a debt contracted before he entered upon such service; nor shall section 253 of this title apply to any case where the person against whom the process is issued is a domestic servant of an ambassador or a public minister, unless the name of the servant has, before the issuing thereof, been registered in the Department of State and transmitted by the Secretary of State to the marshal of the District of Columbia, who shall upon receipt thereof post the same in some public place in his office. All persons shall have resort to the list of names so posted in the marshal's office and may take copies without fee (R. S., secs. 4065, 4066).

"SEC. 255. Assaulting, etc., foreign minister.

"Every person who assaults, strikes, wounds, imprisons, or in any other manner offers violence to the person of an ambassador or a public minister, in violation of the law of nations, shall be imprisoned for not more than 3 years and fined, at the discretion of the court" (R. S, sec. 4062).

In recent years, the problem has arisen as to whether this doctrine of diplomatic immunity includes foreign governmental representatives to international conferences, courts or other organizations and bodies who are not generally regarded as diplomats within the meaning of the term "diplomatic immunity." Nevertheless, the functional need for protection, courtesies and immunities exists in such instances as well and, accordingly, such immunity has been extended in the case of such bodies and their officials and employees.

To be sure, prior to 1946, instances did exist where privileges and immunities were, by statute or treaty, accorded to representatives of sovereign states to international organizations. In almost all these cases, the immunity was brought about by according these representatives "diplomatic status." It became apparent, however, that the carte blanche granting of diplomatic privileges and immunities to such persons did not realistically meet the problem, because in some respects diplomatic immunity was too broad, and in other respects too narrow, to meet the needs of a foreign representative to an international body.

It has therefore now become the practice to define the scope of the immunity applicable to such a class more specifically, and to measure it according to the standing and the function of the person on whom it is to be conferred. A typical example is the provision with respect to immunity in the United Nations Charter. Thus, in article 105, chapter 16, subsection 2 of the United Nations Charter it is provided that:

"The organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its members such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfillment of its purposes."

Subsection 2:

"Representatives of the members of the United Nations and officials of the organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the organization."

This has been implemented by the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, to which the United States of America has not yet acceded, but is expected to do so. This provides that the Secretary General and the Assistant Secretaries General of the United Nations shall enjoy the privileges and immunities, exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic envoys in accordance with international law, and representatives of members, in addition to specifically enumerated privileges and immunities, shall enjoy such other privileges, immunities and facilities not inconsistent with the foregoing, as diplomatic envoys enjoy; whereas experts are accorded such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of functions during the periods of their missions, including the time spent on journeys in connection with these missions, and most officials are immune only in respect to acts performed in their official capacity.

Though the United States of America has not acceded to the General Convention, it has adopted the headquarters agreement, which is intended to be complementary to the provisions of the General Convention. The headquarters agreement makes provision for immunities to resident representatives to the United Nations and prohibits the impediment to transit to or from the headquarters district by such resident representatives, officials of the United Nations and certain other specified classes of persons whose attendance at the headquarters is deemed necessary to the proper functioning of the United Nations.

It is interesting to note that it is specifically provided in the General Convention that the immunity shall be waived where "the immunity would impede the courts of justice and can be waived without prejudice to the interest of the United Nations."

A good example of the functional limitation is that employed in the International Organizations Immunities Act, which provides that "representatives of foreign governments in or to international organizations (as defined in the act) and officers and employees of such organizations shall be immune from suit and legal process relating to acts performed by them in their official capacity and falling within their functions as such representatives, officers, or employees, except insofar as such immunity may be waived by the foreign government or the international organization concerned."

It should be observed, however, that diplomatic envoys and their staffs, by virtue of their immunity, are not entitled to break the law or disturb the peace. They must be law-abiding people, but if they do break the law they cannot be punished or made to submit to civil, criminal, or police jurisdiction. When the law is broken by an envoy under the cloak of diplomatic immunity, or if in any manner such diplomat becomes undesirable or objectionable, the receiving state has two remedies:

1. Formal request for recall.
2. Reprisals or retortion.

The procedures for obtaining redress are as follows:

1. Proceed through diplomatic channels first by approaching the offender. This is seldom done.

2. Approach the chief of mission. The offender, if approached by the head of a mission, may be willing to make satisfaction to protect his honor and pride, and to guard against getting a bad reputation and perilling his diplomatic career.

3. Approach the foreign office. The second approach is the one generally followed.

The sending state may waive the immunity in which case the diplomat may be sued or prosecuted.

The receiving state may request recall of the diplomat offender. This method has limited application and is followed only where charges are grave and have a nation-wide impact.

Immunity is frequently waived in cases of minor officials involving violations which should be decided on their merits. The United States waived the immunity of one of the staff members in the American Embassy, London, in a case in which the diplomat was sued for breach of promise. In this case the diplomat secured judgment in his favor on the merits of the case. Quite recently the United States waived the immunity of a clerk in the Embassy at London in a suit brought by her landlord on a lease. This case has not yet come to trial and is therefore not here cited.

There are certain rules for the waiver of diplomatic immunity which prevail in different countries. The British, for example, place authority in the chief of mission to waive his own immunity or that of any member of his retinue. The United States, on the other hand, permits none of its diplomatic personnel to waive immunity, but requires them to submit the question of waiver to the Department of State for decision. This determination by the State Department precludes further inquiry by any other tribunal.

Violations of traffic regulations constitute the largest group of violations of law on the part of the diplomatic corps in Washington and this is probably also true of those enjoying diplomatic immunity at the seat of the United Nations in New York.

In replying to an inquiry some years ago by the Attorney General of Maryland, Counselor Polk, of the Department of State, advised that the chauffeur of a foreign minister should be regarded as immune from arrest, whether or not the foreign minister was in the car, and whether or not the chauffeur was driving it for his own pleasure.

It is interesting to note here that it has been held that the diplomatic immunity attaching to a passenger in a taxicab does not protect the driver—a nondiplomat—from prosecution for violating the speed laws. However, a contrary view has also been officially announced, and this latter determination is the more recent decision.

On occasion it has been said that the only employees entitled to protection by virtue of the diplomatic immunities attaching to their employers are those contributing to the performance of their employer's official duties and in an "intimate association with the work of a permanent diplomatic mission."

Where the employment of a person by a foreign diplomat is in such a capacity that such person would be entitled to the immunities attaching to a foreign diplomat the better view seems to be that the immunity will not be lost merely because the employee is a national, provided such employment is not prohibited by law, except in the one case covered by section 254, title 22, U. S. C., i. e., where process is served upon the national because of a debt contracted before he entered into the service of the foreign diplomat.

A distinction has been drawn between immunity from the operation of a law and immunity from prosecution under the law, and, as applied to diplomatic immunity, it is held that the diplomat is immune merely from prosecution while holding the diplomatic rank, and not from the operation of the law, with the result that once the status ceases, he may be prosecuted even for acts performed while he held the diplomatic rank.

It might be parenthetically added that until recently diplomatic immunity caused very slight concern to the United States. The diplomatic corps in Washington, prior to World War II, was an extremely small, compact group; only a very limited number of international organizations were in existence, and the staffs of each were small; the United Nations organization did not yet exist, and its predecessor, the League of Nations, had its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. In contrast, today the diplomatic corps in Washington has increased immeasurably. This is the result of the creation of several new states and an increase in diplomatic functions brought about by reparations, rehabilitation, military aid and economic assistance, together with the backlog of regular and ordinary functions which had accumulated during the course of World War II.

In addition, the United Nations organization and its specialized agencies have brought to the United States additional delegations, many of the personnel of which being accorded diplomatic privileges and immunities.

The problems arising as a result of administering these privileges and immunities have increased materially, and it is regretted that time does not permit a full discussion of the subject which deals with the protection of diplomatic property and archives, leases, taxation, and insurance. Within our limitation, it is believed that a discussion of the problems arising out of the insurance of diplomats would be of greater interest to those present.

It is only quite recently that any problem has arisen in this field although diplomatic personnel have carried casualty insurance for many years. In most instances in the past where damages were caused by a diplomat in the operation of an automobile, the cases were usually settled without much difficulty and the question of waiver of immunity did not arise. A few months ago, however, a serious accident occurred here in Washington in which a diplomat was charged with negligence, which he admitted. He felt, however, that since he had insurance coverage there would be no difficulty. As the investigation progressed it became apparent that the damage caused would far exceed the amount of coverage in the policy. As a consequence, the insurance carrier was hesitant to make any settlement until all parties damaged had been investigated. At this stage of proceedings the attorney for one plaintiff sought the good offices of the Department of State to secure a waiver of diplomatic immunity, but such waiver could not be obtained. The policy contained a legal liability clause. At this point it occurred to someone that selling a legal liability policy to a diplomat who, while under immunity, could not be subjected to the jurisdiction of a tribunal to determine legal liability, was a practice not to be condoned and one that should be discontinued. Most of the casualty companies agreed that this was true and many now refuse to insure diplomats on such a policy without first obtaining a waiver of humanity. The case under discussion has since been settled and, I believe, for an amount somewhat in excess of the total coverage.

In the case of Dickenson v. Del Solar, the First Secretary of the Peruvian Legation in London was sued for injuries caused by the negligent operation of a motor vehicle. The Chief of Mission at the Peruvian Legation in London notified the court that the First Secretary's immunity was waived, and the Secretary thereupon sought to invoke the third party liability of his insurance carrier. The carrier defended on the grounds that (a) the First Secretary was not legally liable and (b) that, having permitted his immunity to be waived, the insurance company was discharged. The Court, however, held that the First Secretary was not immune from the law, but only from the jurisdiction of the courts and therefore, was at all times legally liable for his culpable negligence, and secondly, that the First Secretary's immunity having been waived by his superior officer, the Secretary had done nothing which would discharge the carrier from liability.

In a similar case in New York, involving a delegate to the United Nations, the delegate's government waived his immunity. The insurance carrier then sought to stand on the immunity on the ground that the carrier might avail itself of any defense which the insured might have. In this case, which had not reached the court, the Department of State notified the legal adviser of the United Nations that the plea of diplomatic immunity was not a defense since it was to the jurisdiction and not to the merits. Following this the case was settled without litigation.

Lately, there has been a hue and cry in the United States against the application of the doctrine of diplomatic immunity under any circumstances. It therefore appears necessary to present some defense of the system. In the first place, the size of the class which enjoys diplomatic immunity is extremely small. Moreover, there has been a minimum of abuse by those who enjoy the privilege. Most of the cases are adjusted to the satisfaction of all. Besides, the functions of diplomats would be difficult, if not well nigh impossible, of performance, if such immunities were not granted. It would seem that there is every reason for a continuance of the system without change. It is based upon the law of nations and it is reciprocal. We of the United States give no more than we receive since our American diplomats in foreign countries are accorded like privileges and immunities. Without such immunities the United States representatives in foreign service would be unable to function in many countries, and I am certain that all of us readily appreciate the importance of their work in the present state of world affairs.

Social-Security Amendments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that many of my associates here in the House are concerned as I am at cuts made on the social-security items in the appropriation bill today. Many of us are much concerned because the Social Security Administration, which has an excellent record for a very minimum administrative cost, has had its appropriation to administer the social-security amendments that we approved this session cut in half.

There is nc one in the administration who feels that the job can be done on any lower per capita basis than is now being done. Since Congress passed these social-security amendments and has made commitments to an additional 10,000,000 people who will come under the Social Security Act and to others who will be brought in by the new start and who will also receive the protection of this law, can it be assumed that the Social Security Administration has the authority of Congress to proceed with the administration of this law as economically as possible but still if it finds that $8,000,000 will not do the job can they go right ahead and carry out the program as intended and come back to Congress for money when it runs out?

When we passed the social-security amendments we extended the old-age and survivors insurance program to 10,000,000 more people and about a million more survivors but now we are proposing to appropriate only one-half the funds that are needed by the Social Security Commissioner to carry out our intention.

The Congress practically doubled the Federal grants for the States' health programs for mothers and children and the services for crippled children; it tripled the child-welfare grants for States. Now we are proposing to deny any interest in seeing that these programs actually get underway for we provide no money whatsoever to the Children's Bureau for administering these additional grants.

In addition, Congress voted to provide more adequate assistance to dependent children, and now we are planning to appropriate less than 20 percent of the funds needed to administer this program.

We are proposing to save a small amount of money by a means which will adversely affect a large number of children and old people whose families had a right to assume that we meant what we did when we passed the amendments to the Social Security Act.

The American Citizen Must Not Surrender One of His Few Remaining Birthrights—To Locate and Secure Title to Mining Claims on the Public Domain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, ever since the days of Harold L. Ickes as Secretary of the Interior there has been a sustained effort by some of the Government departments to secure a revision of the mining laws and substitute a mine-leasing system for the present laws that give an American citizen the right to go upon public land, including the national-forest land, and prospect for mineral deposits and locate and patent mining claims.

These proposed changes in our mining laws were the subject of the hearing in the Spokane meeting of the Mines and Mining Subcommittee of the House Public Lands Committee on October 17 and 18, 1949.

My response to an invitation to address the meeting is inserted herewith:

Mr. GOLDBY. I'd like at this time to call upon Congressman WHITE for a statement. I asked and Congressman WHITE kindly consented to have himself put on the agenda for the meeting, and he has consented to present a statement at this time. Congressman WHITE.

Congressman WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply grateful to you and appreciate your splendid courtesy in permitting me to participate in the meeting and ask the questions I have, because they come before us all the time in the committee. Nothing can go through Congress, in dealing with mines and land, unless it goes through our committee. If we stop it, it stops.

You know, I believe it was Mr. Dooley that said Uncle Sam bet you $13.50 you can't live on 160 acres of land for 5 years without starving to death. Then there's another saying that more money has been put into the ground in mining than has ever been taken out. Now, all I want to do as your Representative of Idaho and the rest of the Northwest is to see that the common fellow, the fellow that's struggling along, looking for an opportunity, gets a square deal. We have a number of birthrights. Some of us with gray heads, when we were born, had more birthrights than we have today. We had the right to go out and locate, if we could find an unappropriated piece of public land, whether it had timber on it or not; we had the birthright of homesteading and acquired it and living on it and developing the country. Today we haven't that right. I was in Congress when the Public Lands Committee passed the Taylor Grazing Act, which abrogated the homestead law. You can no longer squat on a piece of land and take it; you must get it classified and get permission, or you'll never get the land. There are very few classifications going on today.

I can take you down in Idaho through the beautiful Bear Valley, beautiful grassland and pretty brooks going through it, and the law plainly states if you want to locate a piece of land more valuable for agriculture than for timber you have that right. They've first got to classify it, but you try to get the Forest Service to classify any part of it as more valuable. In that big valley it's one of the most productive grazing areas in the State of Idaho; it's used for sheep under the administration of the Forest Service, and they're hanging on to it. It's all right, but it could make nice homesteads.

But I think our system in the wisdom of the Congress and the men that passed that law, in 1872 they revised the mining law. Prior to that time a mining claim was only 10 acres or 300 feet wide, then they revised the law and made it 600 feet wide. Presumably or theoretically, you locate a vein; as near as you can, you stake it out in such a way you have 300 fect on each side of the vein and 1,500 feet up and down, and you make your discovery where you select, and you can either have most of your claim below it or above it. That's up to you.

Now, as between the system we have here and the fruits of our policy in developing this country, and the system in the South American countries, where you can get a concession for so many thousands of acres, some big company, or the system in Russia where the poor humble Russian uncovers a vein of gold—he has no incentive to uncover it; he just covers it up; it belongs to the Czar—I think our system is the best ever devised. It provides, if you found a mine or the outcrop of a vein and you think there might be a chance to develop a mine, you could stake it out, 20 acres, by doing 10 feet of discovery work, putting up your stakes, and you have, if I remember right, 60 days to do the work and 30 days to do the filing after that; in all, 90 days. Each year you must go back and do $100 worth of work.

Now, that's pretty heavy expense to own a piece of ground, to do $100 worth of work every year. Then, if you want to own it, you must pay $5 an acre, and you must bear the cost of the patent survey, and most of those mining claims are located where there was no Government sections or survey; so you had to tie it in as best you could by metes and bounds, and it's all provided in the law, you must get a competent man to survey it, and it will cost you, I'm told today, about $500 to obtain a mining patent to a mining claim.

Now, there's great stress on the timber. Most mining claims are not where there is any, they're not down in the heavily wooded Olympic Peninsula A great many of the claims are where the timber is scarce and needed. You can't do much with a mining claim unless you have timber to timber up your underground workings, and then you must have some buildings and other equipment. If you develop a mining claim you'll need every stick of timber on that claim, and a lot of the surrounding timber, and I want to say this to you from experience: That if you and I went out today and found a fine deposit or outcrop of good rich ore, and the mining engineer comes along and gives you every assurance that it was a fine mine, you'll have to put down $200,000 before you can pump that mine and put it into production. Now, if you think that isn't true, try it. You'll have a mill—that costs a thousand dollars per ton capacity to build a mill. You'll have tunnels; you'll have equipment. I doubt if you could put a mine into production today, no matter how convenient and good it was, and how rich, for less than $500,000.

Just remember that, and the main thing that I am struggling for, and I say struggling, because I've been sitting on the committee and seen these gentlemen from the departments come in with their theories, their college theories, if you please; they have never been out and dug a tunnel, or as I've seen them, hew rails out of poles in the woods, and covered them with strap iron, to lay a track in a tunnel and cover the wooden wheels of a home-made mine car with rawhide, and stand there 10 hours a day windlassing up that rock; when you sink a shaft by hand, they've never done that; they don't know anything about what these men that go forth, these prospectors, and find something, stake their claims and think they've got a fortune, go through; they live in isolated countries, make their own bread, rustle some meat, cut their wood, build a cabin, and it's a hard life and today the prospectors are dying off. There was many a good American citizen imbued with hope and expecting to win a fortune as others have in the fastness of the mountains.

You know, I live up here, in north Idaho, I never knew, living in Idaho, living in a mining State, very much about what we have in central Idaho in the way of mining. I lived up there just over the hills from the Coeur d'Alenes mining district where the prospectors flocked in there in the early days, built their cabins, dug their tunnels, none of them ever got anything out of it; the depression hit them in 1893 and they faded out of the picture. In later years I've run across editors and college men down there in central Idaho that have gone in there before Teddy Roosevelt withdrew land and threw it into a forest. I'll go into Dixie with you, on the Divide beyond Elk City, Idaho City. I didn't know there was such a country, and I didn't know there was such men in there waiting for the Forest Service to do something to open up the country. The Forest Service have their laboratories; they study the culture of grass, and they'll spend millions of dollars promulgating the improvement of the range. What do they get? Two and a half cents an acre a year from grazing land.

They've got in central Idaho all this lodgepole pine—most of it scrub timber that the lumber companies can't use and don't want and are not interested in—that would make ideal mining timber. I have letters on my desk where men have gone in and located a mine, developed their ore, and asked for roads, and I have letters from the Forest Service telling me it's set aside as a primitive area, and they can't build roads in there. That's the big country south of the Salmon River, where Buffalo Hump, Seven Devils, Artillery Dome, and the Thunder Mountain, and many other mining districts are located. We've got an empire down in central Idaho that we should pay a little attention to. Just as the Forest Service propagates grass and has a big laboratory back in Wisconsin to study every little thing about timber, let's do something for mining. There may be more value, more wealth, more tax revenue under those hills than there ever will be on their surface.

When I was a boy and got my first job in the sawmill at Bonner, Mont., in the railroad office back in 1897, we were shipping 10 to 20 cars of timber a day to the Butte mines, one of the richest hills on earth, they said. Today, after all these years have rolled around, there's still 10 or 20 cars of timber going into the Butte mines every day from the mills at Bonner. It's the best market for timber and nearby farm products we've got. Let us develop our mining industry and build up our markets right here at home.

The best thing that ever happened to little Idaho Falls, one of the most prosperous and prettiest cities we have in Idaho, was the building of a direct rail connection into Butte, which gave an outlet for their products, turkeys, chickens, potatoes—everything they can raise The Butte mines have made a beautiful and prosperous city out of Idaho Falls. I've been trying to hammer the fact home to these Forest Service fellows that if they want to develop their timber, and develop a domestic market for it right here at home, let's develop our mines.

Dr. Thomson, who used to be the head of our mining school, now president of the Butte School of Mines, wrote some very splendid articles on the Idaho mineral veins and big mineralized dikes and low-grade gold deposits in central Idaho. I, your Congressman, in an effort to convince Chief Forester Silcox, of the Forest Service, that he should do something for mining, went to the library of the Bureau of Mines and got copies of the engineering and mining journals from the files containing Dr. Thomson's articles and laid them on the desk of Mr. Silcox, the Chief Forester, to convince the Forest Service they had values underground as well as on top of the ground, and that we had something to develop in our mountains that would make Idaho great and build up the Northwest.

We have got to get a change of policy, gentlemen, from the Bureau of Land Management and the Forest Service, if we are to develop our country. We must keep the door of opportunity open to our citizens. We want to keep hope alive in the breast of the fellow getting a start in the world. We want to tell him if he goes forth and finds minerals on the public land it's going to be his.

Leasing: Where would we get with the development of our mining resources if we left it to a leasing program? That puts me in mind of the policy of the Standard Oil Co. They do little prospecting. They let you do the wildcatting, and when you strike oil they come in and buy it. So it is with mining. You can do the prospecting, and take the chance of developing a new mine, and after you get that ore, the big companies will come in. You can do as Tommy Cruse did at Marysville, near Helena, Mont. I told the story of Tommy Cruse on the floor of the House, and the Washington papers printed it, something they rarely do for a new Member of Congress. We are told that Cruse drove 900 feet before he struck the ore. Old Tom drove that tunnel single-handed and alone, only stopping when supplies gave out to earn a grubstake, and return to his work. He had no money to patent his mining claim. All he could do was hammer away, driving his drills into hard rock and labor to extend his tunnel day by day.

What would the Forest Service and mining fraternity say if Tom was doing that work today? People were skeptical even then, and chalked on the door of his tunnel "Cruse's Folly" And then what happened? When Tommy hit the Drumlummon vein he hit it rich. Tom always wanted a million dollars. He wanted to be a millionaire. We are told that Tom Carter, an enterprising young lawyer in Helena, afterward, Senator Carter, sold the Drumlummon for Tom for a million dollars. So Tommy got his million But Carter was thoughtful enough to retain a sixteenth interest in the mine for old Tom, and he got more out of his sixteenth interest than he got out of his million. Then Tom wanted to be a banker, and started a little bank in Helena. In those days, when I was a boy, during the time my father was a railroad agent, the railroad remitted all its cash receipts to the First National Bank of Helena, and a good many people got the idea that the First National Bank of Helena, because it was a railroad bank, couldn't go broke. But the depression of 1893 hit, and all the banks went under, including the First National Bank with its railroad deposits.

The depositors started a run on Tommy Cruse's bank. He went to the vaults and set the gold up in trays and said, "Come and get it." This stopped the run and made financial history in western Montana.

There's a lot of romance in mining, and I'm wondering if these gentlemen ever recall the days when a few men developed the Hercules Mine in Idaho's Burke Canyon, and how far these pioneer individuals would get in acquiring title to the Hercules property under the changes in the mining laws being posed here.

These pioneer mining men, who developed the fabulous Hercules Mine, were E. W. Hutton, a railroad engineer on the railroad run between Missoula and Wallace; the three Day brothers, running a little feed store at Wardner; F. M. Rothrock, a butcher; Cardoner, a Portugese merchant; Dad Reeves, a barber; and August Paulsen, a dairyman whose sister, a schoolteacher, we are told, put in her money to help drive the tunnel that opened the great Hercules ore body that produced $88,000,000 worth of ore, and paid $22,000,000 in dividends. It is reported that when they encountered the ore, they didn't recognize what they had in their vein—a white substance that some old miners told them was carbonate of lead. We are told that when they got into the vein the ore was so rich in the Hercules mine that they got around the efforts of the local smelters to freeze them out when they refused to buy their ore, by making shipments of crude ore to Swansee, England, and to Belgium, which paid handsomely and soon put these pioneers on their feet and enabled them to finance the development of their mine. The Hercules later provided the money to build many of the beautiful office buildings that grace the streets of the neighboring metropolis of Spokane, Wash.

The ore in the Hercules Mine might still be lying dormant if the Government departments had applied the rules to mining that they seek to impose on us today.

I want to report to you a little further. As you know, as a result of my retirement from Congress for a term, I went to the foot of the class on my return to the Public Lands Committee and the Mining Subcommittee, and have little to say about conducting the affairs of these committees.

The strategic metals procurement program now being put through by the Munitions Board and the manipulations of the metals market by the big fellows doesn't look good to me.

This stockpiling program was first proposed by the late Senator Jim Scrugham, former Governor of Nevada, in a program to stabilize our mining markets and help our domestic mining industry by getting the Government to buy and stockpile strategic metals so that we would be prepared in case of war and would have the strategic metals that we can't produce domestically, bought and piled up ready for use. Senator Scrugham worked for the adoption of this plan persistently and continuously. On week ends down in his summer home on Chesapeake Bay he would invite admirals and generals and occasionally I and others, always talking stockpiling. And then he would have meetings in his office and invite Director Finch and later Dr. Sayer of the Bureau of Mines to confer with the generals and admirals and talk stockpiling.

Now old Jim is gone and we have the stockpiling program under way, financed with an appropriation of over a billion dollars. And now what is being done? A Munitions Board, comprising the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior, has been set up. And how is it being managed? They went to the Du Ponts of Wilmington, Del., and borrowed Mr. Carpenter to manage the stockpiling purchase program for the Munitions Board, and the next thing we knew, by manipulating the market, lead went to 21½ cents a pound, and copper, zinc, antimony, and the rest of the nonferrous metals followed suit, and we soon heard talk about the high prices and the scarcity of domestically produced metals which couldn't be obtained in the United States and the Government would have to go outside the country to get the metals for stockpiling. It appears that purchases were made in Mexico, Canada, South America, Africa, everywhere but here, under long-term contracts at high prices.

Realizing the adverse effect of this procurement program of foreign-produced metals, coupled with the heavy importations of nonferrous metals being made by the Economic Cooperation Administration, the Mines and Mining Subcommittee, of which I am a member, endeavored to ascertain something concerning the stockpiling program and its effect on our domestic mining industry, by calling in the Director of the Munitions Board and his assistants for a short session with the committee.

At this hearing, I asked one of the generals in charge of procurement to tell me the percentage of strategic metals being bought in foreign countries, and the percentage being bought in this country, and what do you suppose he said: "I am sorry. For security reasons I can't tell you." This led to quite an argument. It's all in the record. I went on to explain to him that the Bureau of Mines was getting out data publicizing our mining and metal reserves, and that I didn't think that revealing what was in the stockpile would be any more dangerous to be known by a potential enemy than our domestic metal reserves. But we were given no information concerning the purchase of foreign-produced metals. The members of the committee and the chairman seemed satisfied to let the Director and his assistants get by with their evasions.

When the bill for the ECA came through, the Marshall plan, there was a clause in the bill providing for stockpiling; a provision that earmarked 5 percent of all the money appropriated for the procurement of critical materials. When you read that provision you would naturally think of rubber and other strategic materials not produced in this country, but the money was used mainly to purchase lead, zinc, and copper and other nonferrous metals.

ECA brought in Mr. Evans Just from New York, and they've got a whole building down there on Pennsylvania Avenue filled with his assistants, and they are buying and bringing in this copper, lead, and zinc and other nonferrous metals from foreign countries for stockpiling in this country. At the hearings, I got out of them that the earmarked money out of the first ECA appropriation amounted to $192,000,000, and they were using this money to build up foreign mining industries. The Strategic Metals Division of ECA has divided their appropriation into two funds, one a development fund and the other a procurement fund. We learned that out of the development fund, they are advancing money to build mining roads, develop mines, and build smelters. They are financing the opening of manganese deposits in Madagascar in Africa. We were very much surprised to learn that ECA is using our money to develop lead mines in French Morocco. They are not only buying the lead produced there but are financing two American companies, the Newmont Mining Co. and the St. Joseph Lead Co. in developing French Morocco lead mines.

We are told that two mining funds have been set up by ECA to finance this Morocco lead-mine development program. One a fund of $1,500,000 and the other a fund of $3,500,000. The French don't permit these American companies to operate on their own; they must operate as a minority interest in the French mining company.

We also learned that ECA is building a smelter in France and another in Italy with our money.

We have just made another ECA appropriation, and it still carries the 5 percent for the procurement of strategic materials, which is another $192,000,000 to be spent by the Strategic Metals Division of ECA. Is it any wonder that our mines are shutting down all over the country, particularly our lead, copper, and zinc mines?

Having been retired in the election of 1946, I am now at the foot of the class in the Mining Committee of which I am a member, and have little to say about conducting the affairs of the committee. If I had my old job as chairman of the main Public Lands Committee and the subcommittees, I would bring those fellows to committee hearings and get to the bottom of their procurement program until I found out what they were doing, and how far they intended to go in wrecking our mining industry.

Gentlemen, in considering our mining program and the policies of our Government, I want to keep the door of opportunity open to the common fellow. This leasing scheme would simply deprive the ordinary citizen of his birthright to locate, own, and develop a mine if he can find one on public land, and give the advantage in developing our mining resources to the big companies.

An issue has been made of the pitifully small amount of timber that some prospector might cut in developing his claim, as in the case of Jack Moore in his efforts to develop the Oro Grande mining property in central Idaho. When he cut the timber for three mining claims to build the flume and mill on the Oro Grande property, the Government came in and penalized him triple damages for the timber they cut.

Our mining industry has a lot to contend with. One of them is the attitude of the Forest Service. There's a classic in this record, and I'm glad it's there; the statement made by the game commissioner, which will be quoted back and forth in Washington many times. He simply stated the attitude of the departments, rehearsing a story I've heard in committees over and over again, pounded into these Members from Florida, Oklahoma, Alabama, and other farming States. They don't know much about mining when they come to Congress, and many of them believe everything that's told them by the representatives of the Government bureaus. Mining bills are drawn over in the departments and handed to the chairman, and then introduced, and bear his name. The department heads act as they did in introducing the Taylor Grazing Act. They work to put their legislative schemes across on the Congress, and sometimes there are jokers in the bill that you don't catch until after the bill is passed and has become law.

There are many things that I would like to talk about from my experiences of 16 years in Washington. I have been fighting the tide and working steadily to keep the door of opportunity open to the prospector and the miner.

One of the most pathetic things in mining that has ever come to my attention, a thing that would make a good Saturday Evening Post story, is the history of the prospectors and their claims way up in the mountain fastness on the Divide between the Clearwater and Salmon Rivers at Dixie, Idaho. These hardy pioneers followed the placer miners and staked their claims on the big, low-grade gold-dike veins that abound in that isolated region. Louie Larson, one of their number, had the good fortune to locate his claim on a small vein of free-milling gold ore, and was able by hand methods and the use of a primitive Mexican arrasta to mine the freegold in his vein. It might be explained that a Mexican arrasta is a circular, stone-lined pit with a post in the center, to which was attached a sweep for a horse to pull around and drag the big boulders chained to the sweep over the gold-bearing ore that had been dumped into the arrasta until the ore is ground fine enough to release the gold which can then be washed and amalgamated.

It is reported that by the use of these primitive methods, Louie Larson took out over $50,000 in gold in working this claim over the years, while his neighbors, with their claims staked on big veins of low-grade, refractory gold ore had to content themselves with holding their claims and doing their annual assessment work year after year, earning money for their subsistence as best they could, waiting for the country to open up and capital to come in to develop their big, low-grade mining properties.

While Louie Larson has been growing old and making some money by his mining operations, these other old gray heads have been dropping off, one by one, and are buried over on the hillside in the little cemetery at Dixie, and Louie out of compassion takes his worn-out arrasta stones and chisels their names to mark their graves—"Buried hopes and buried opportunities," because the country is locked up and neglected by the Forest Service. You couldn't get a road in there to save your soul. I know, because I have tried it. An old friend of mine, a lumberman, took me back to see the Thunder Mountain country and told me this story, of the trials and efforts of the prospectors in this vast mountain region to interest their Government and the Forest Service in opening up the country for development. We went as far as we could in automobiles to the end of the road, and had to finish the trip by riding on horseback the last 10 miles to the Thunder Mountain country and the surrounding low-grade gold mines.

We were told that the Washington office of the Forest Service some years before had allocated the money to build the road down to the Sunnyside mine, a famous early-day mining property on Thunder Mountain. It seems that the owner had been a little critical of the dilatory tactics of the Forest Service, and the supervisor in charge of the area in retaliation for the criticism, used the money to construct the road into the country to the top of the Divide and then turned off to a dead end miles off in the other direction where it did no good to anyone, leaving the miners and their property isolated and without any access except by pack train.

Observations and experiences of this kind have something to do with the sort of questions I have been asking these gentlemen.

Over on the Snake River we have in the Seven Devils district admittedly one of the richest copper areas in the Northwest. Could I get a road into that country? Ever since I have been in Congress I have been trying to get access roads built into that country, but the Seven Devils region is as primitive and isolated today as it was when Teddy Roosevelt withdrew all that country and put it under the control of the Forest Service. There is a real man's job for your Congressman in Washington, and I have been trying to fill it. Thank you.

Mr. GOLDY. Thank you very much, Congressman WHITE.

Our Farm Legislation Needs an Overhaul

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is very unfortunate that the Eighty-first Congress has not seen fit to enact legislation which would clarify and correct the complete muddle which exists in the farm legislation picture at present.

Many of the faults in the present program can be traced to the Eightieth Congress; some are merely the result of changing picture in regard to certain commodities and support prices. It remains for the next Congress to do all in its power to correct the glaring inadequacies of the present laws.

The so-called potato scandal of this past spring, plus the fact that the Commodity Credit Corporation has vast quantities of many commodities stored all over the country clearly point up the fact that we need new laws in the price support field.

The growing public reaction against excessive Government storage of commodities is proof that we need a farm plan which will allow for the natural consumption of most of our most abundant commodities. The bulk of the annual crop of each perishable commodity should be allowed to reach the market and have its retail price determined by the law of supply and demand. At the same time, the farmer is certainly entitled to a fair price for his crop and he should be guaranteed such a price if the market price does not bring it.

The present muddle exacts an unfair toll on some groups of farmers. A good example is the squeeze which hits dairy and poultry farmers. Their products bring prices determined on the open market, but their feed, which is their biggest expense, is supported at a high level.

These and other inequities should and must be corrected for the good of our economy and I only regret that this Congress has not acted on the matter.

Defense of Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Constantine Brown, from the Washington Evening Star of September 19, 1950:

BRITAIN, FRANCE WANT EUROPE DEFENDED, BUT AT EXPENSE OF AMERICAN MANPOWER

(By Constantine Brown)

Britain and France, our principal allies in Europe, want to eat their cake and have it, too. They want Europe defended against the Russians, but they do not want to tax their own resources and do not want anybody but the United States to provide the bulk of the manpower.

Secretary of State Acheson made positive suggestions for the integration of a German military force into the over-all defense of Europe. Before the western Big Three foreign ministers met in New York there were indirect approaches by the military for the inclusion of Spain in the over-all program to resist eastern aggression. But the French and British Governments remained adamant against it.

The members of the North Atlantic Alliance admit frankly that they cannot, for domestic political and other reasons, provide manpower for the ground force to oppose the vast Russian and satellite armies.

NEED 60 DIVISIONS

The original optimistic estimate that 25 ground divisions would suffice to stop an eastern onslaught were drastically revised after the outbreak of the Korean war.

The top-ranking officers of the Atlantic Alliance calculate that we shall need at least 60 divisions to do the job.

The growing threat from Russia has worried the people of continental Europe. Soon after hostilities started in Korea there was a clamor for increased American military forces in Germany. The French requested at least 5 additional divisions. They were right. The recent allied war games in Germany under the supervision of Gen. Mark Clark showed that present allied strength there is totally inadequate to cope with an attack from the east.

Factual reports from military specialists led our Government to recommend that the western Germans be rearmed as a part of the over-all defense plan. It was estimated in Washington that a German army of 60,000 men as a starter would greatly bolster our chances of victory.

The idea of rearming Germans under an Allied—in all likelihood American—commander was ill-received by the French and British. Although the supplies for the new German army would be controlled by the United States, French Foreign Minister Schuman refused to accept our plan. He insisted that rearming the Germans would be disastrous for the present government of Premier Rene Pleven.

FRENCH ARE AFRAID

The French, who cannot add substantially to their present manpower under arms, while anxious to prevent another invasion of their territory, refuse to accept the help of their former enemies, even after we offer them the most sweeping assurances that there will be no repetition of the 1914 and 1939 aggressions. They say they cannot afford to put many more men under arms. They are afraid of the political consequences for the present shaky government if they agree to permit Germany to be armed. Yet they want their country adequately defended. This is tantamount to asking us to assume the bulk of the burden of the defense of Europe.

The British are only lukewarm to our proposal. Foreign Secretary Bevin, who stated publicly last week that Britain is opposed to arming the west Germans, is reported to have softened somewhat. But not enough to influence his French colleague.

Both Mr. Bevin and Mr. Schuman are determined to prevent the supplying of modern war materials to the Spanish army, which is 400,000 strong. While psychologically there may be some grounds for the French fear of the Germans—since the two countries have been at bitter odds since 1870—Spain has never been actively hostile to her western neighbors.

In World War I, King Alfonso maintained strict but friendly neutrality toward the Allied Powers. In World War II, General Franco's assurances to Paris permitted the French high command to withdraw its divisions from the Pyrenees and send them to the German front.

Opposition of the French and British to inclusion of Spain in western defense is based only on the fact that the Socialist parties in those countries do not like the present dictatorial regime in Madrid. Yet both governments are most anxious to see Communist China, where Mao Tse-tung rules as ruthlessly as Stalin, seated in the United Nations and fully recognized as a member of the peace-loving nations.

Spain can contribute far more to the defense of western Europe than either Yugoslavia or China.

Know Your Enemy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, heretofore granted, I am including in today's RECORD an editorial which appeared in the September 20 issue of Pathfinder:

KNOW YOUR ENEMY

The free peoples of the world are engaged in a bitter struggle with their arch enemy—communism. Even if the Korean incident is localized, the fight will continue for many years; the Communists have admitted that their war with the democracies must be and will be never-ending. They believe that democracy must be destroyed if communism is to survive.

Obviously, then, it is important for free peoples to know their avowed enemy, to understand communism, to recognize the difference between their present freedom and the way of life communism would force upon them.

Communism is more than a political belief; it is a form of fanaticism. It is an evil doctrine, against all our concepts of life. It is atheistic, and opposes all forms of religion.

Communism claims it works for the benefit of all the people, yet it does not trust those it claims to help. Did you ever hear of a Communist regime voted in by the people in a really free election? Under communism, there is no choice. You vote for it—or else.

Democracy holds the individual as all-important and the master of the state. Communism considers the individual the servant of the state; the state is all-important. Yet under communism the state is a small group of individuals, the bureaucrats who—usually by violence—have gained control of the party.

In a democracy, you enjoy freedom of speech, thought, worship, and opportunity. Under communism, you do as you are told, you even think and speak as you are told; you work where you are told, and for as little as the group of bureaucrats at the top decide you should be paid. If you do not like such a way of life and are foolish enough to say so, you are "purged"; you end up in a labor camp, prison—or a cemetery.

Democracy dignifies man as God's masterpiece, communism disavows God, and man is a robot. No man, woman or child is permitted any individual ambition, any personal hope, any private plans. Communism demands everyone's soul, mind and body—without question, without mercy, without appeal.

Under democracy, the people elect to office those they consider best fitted; if they prove incompetent, the people themselves vote them out and elect others in their place. Under communism, there is no hope of change; the party is considered incapable of error. It gains control of the state by violence and keeps control by violence. Communism has pledged itself to the overthrow of every other form of government in the world—by violence. Yet, would violence be necessary if communism really were the utopia it claims to be? Would not people willingly vote for such a system? Would the millions of suffering Russians, slaving under the Communist yoke, vote in a free election to keep the Kremlin crowd in power?

Small wonder that the Communists maintain their iron curtain; the real reason for its existence is to prevent the people from learning the truth about the high living standards and freedoms enjoyed by the American people. The Russian worker would soon learn what a sham communism is. And in his rage he might use on his masters their own greatest weapon—violence.

Hysteria on March

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CECIL R. KING

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD the following editorial from the Woodland (Calif.) Daily Democrat of September 11, 1950, and a letter published by the Sacramento Bee of September 14, 1950:

[From the Woodland (Calif.) Daily Democrat of September 11, 1950]

HYSTERIA ON MARCH

Whether or not one agrees with Congresswoman HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS' vote against the Wood antisubversive bill, Mrs. DOUGLAS must be commended for her fairness and courage. Undoubtedly, she recognized that as a result of voting against this particular bill, she would be subject to bitter editorial attacks by a partisan press. This is exactly what has happened.

The papers opposing her candidacy for the United States Senate are charging that Mrs. DOUGLAS, by her opposition to the Wood bill, showed signs of leaning toward the Commies. As a matter of fact, Congresswoman DOUGLAS is as much an enemy of communism as the editors who are assailing her.

At the risk of jeopardizing her chances for success in the November election, Mrs. DOUGLAS refused to support the measure because she favors common sense and moderation in legislation dealing with subversive activities. She contends that at all times Congress should exercise reasonable restraint. Mrs DOUGLAS, along with Congressmen FRANCK HAVENNER and JOHN SHELLEY, of San Francisco, and GEORGE P. MILLER and CHET HOLIFIELD, among other good Americans, declined to join in the hysteria which is causing many Americans to do to liberty of their own volition what a potential enemy could not force them to do.

Many influential and independently edited newspapers over the country are in agreement with Mrs. DOUGLAS and the others who teamed with the minority against the bill.

The measure passed by the House is properly known as the Wood bill and is a modification of the Mundt-Ferguson measure.

When the bill went before the House, Mrs. DOUGLAS stood with other members of the California delegation to amend the bill. She demanded that Government employees suspended or dismissed under the law should have the right of appeal. It was her contention, and properly so, that the right of appeal was fundamental.

She had previously recorded her approval of the primary purpose of the bill, which is to safeguard the security of the Government, by voting for an amendment proposed by Representative GEORGE P. MILLER, of Alameda. This amendment would have given a discharged employee the right to appeal to the United States Civil Service Commission from the decision by his immediate superiors to discharge him. The Miller amendment received bipartisan support and lost by only a few votes.

On the final submission of the bill with no right of appeal, no safeguards against administrative abuse, Mrs. DOUGLAS exercised her right to vote against the measure. The bill has now been amended in the Senate to include these appeal provisions. Mrs. DOUGLAS promises that she will vote for the measure when it returns from the conference committee.

Among the outstanding reputable metropolitan papers editorially in accord with the stand taken by California's Mrs. DOUGLAS, are the New York Times, the Philadelphia Inquirer, Louisville Courier-Journal, Washington Post, and St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The following editorial from the New York Times, urging great care and most careful consideration, is typical of the comments of other newspaper editors who are not especially interested in the outcome of the senatorial election in California and have no axes to grind.

CAUTION NEEDED

Now that the House has passed its own antisubversive bill (H. R. 9490), the Senate has for its consideration this week no less than four distinct measures dealing with this highly controversial subject. Maneuverings of both Democrats and Republicans to snare the credit for whatever legislation of this type is enacted may obscure—but cannot lessen—the urgent necessity of examining such proposals with the greatest care.

We have already expressed our opinion regarding the three major Senate bills on antisubversive activities: The Mundt-Ferguson bill (S. 2311), the McCarran omnibus bill (S. 4037), and the administration bill (S. 4061). We have explained why we think the first two, going far beyond the proper and laudable aim of making the Communists harmless, represent a potentially serious threat to American civil liberties.

The bill which the House passed on Tuesday is a modified version of the Mundt-Ferguson measure; but it still contains such drastic registration provisions, it leaves such great power in the hands of an administrative board and it is couched in such broad language that we feel that it, too, is more far-reaching than necessary or advisable. By and large, the law as it now stands appears adequate to protect us against the Communist menace, so far as any law as such can protect us. In fact, between the upper millstone of present legislation and the nether millstone of the American voters' common sense, communism is not getting very far in the United States. But improvement in existing law can certainly be made, and this the administration bill, generally speaking, would do.

It is natural in these times that there should be a demand for anti-Communist legislation; but it is imperative that in our haste to pass such legislation we do not endanger the freedom of thought and speech that is a vital part of the American tradition and is, in fact, essential for the proper functioning of democratic government.

[From the Sacramento (Calif.) Bee of September 14, 1950]

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE

TRUSTS THE FBI

EDITOR OF THE BEE:

SIR: Regarding B. W. Vaughan's letter I agree wholeheartedly with everything he says, including requiring all Communists be indelibly branded on the forehead with a red star.

But in regard to this I do not believe Vaughan goes far enough. If the branding is to be effectual, it should be possible to determine if all Communists and subversives have registered and to accomplish this we should insist that all Republicans be branded with an R, all Democrats with a D, etc., ad infinitum. If every person over 18 years of age were identified in this manner then we would have the means of identifying the Commies as having registered.

On second thought, maybe Vaughan and I are both wrong because I have heard that the Reds will resort to any subterfuge to further their nefarious ends, and in this connection, they might register Republican or Democrat and be so branded and we still would be in doubt as to who was who, even as we are today.

I believe that our best bet in identifying Reds is the Biblical saying: "By their works ye shall know them." By the very nature of their works it is difficult for them to conceal from an intelligent and informed citizenry just what their true character is, no matter what particular label they may choose to be known under.

And as for a twenty-third article in the Bill of Rights, as Vaughan suggests, it seems to me the FBI has done a pretty good job of identifying all of the subversive groups and organizations in this country; and that our present legislative and law-enforcement agencies are capable of handling the situation without any changes in the Bill of Rights.

Planning for Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT W. KEAN
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, for the information of my colleagues and those who are actively engaged in planning for civilian defense, I am proud to report on a civilian defense plan which originated in my district and which may well become a pattern for voluntary efforts, throughout the Nation.

I refer to the offering by a New Jersey industry of its transportation and manpower to aid relief agencies during peace or wartime emergencies. This offering is in the form of mobile emergency disaster relief units composed of trucks and other plant vehicles and manned by plant personnel trained in disaster relief procedure.

This plan originated as a spontaneous and unselfish act on the part of Carl W. Badenhausen, president of the P. Ballantine & Sons brewery in Newark, N. J., on the night of May 19, 1950. Immediately upon hearing of the ruin and human misery caused by the great South Amboy ammunition explosion of that date, Mr. Badenhausen offered the trucking and manpower of his organization to New Jersey State authorities in the disaster area. A convoy of 200 trucks and the company ambulance was formed for use in the devastated area.

While this voluntary act by private industry in time of local crisis is indeed noteworthy, it is the subsequent action of this Newark firm that has national significance and which I commend to the attention of those responsible for civilian defense and disaster relief. This act and the blueprint which Ballantine officials have drafted to make this plan available for other centers is, I believe, an extraordinary example of community-mindedness and responsibility.

The Ballantine Co. has now formed an emergency relief unit in Newark, N. J., on a permanent basis, and is now organizing another in Washington, D. C. These units are available to State civilian defense agencies in the area in which they are located.

The units are built around a nucleus of spot convoys of 10 trucks and 3 cars each, which can move instantly on call, with blankets, stretchers, tools, first-aid kits, flares, portable lights, ropes, and ladders.

They are manned by Ballantine personnel which has been given training in the basic operations of mobile disaster relief units and in duties which normally are in demand at the site of disasters.

The company also is prepared to augment these spot convoys with additional convoys. Within an hour it could have hundreds of trucks dispatched in organized convoys.

The readiness of these units for service is assured by a carefully designed communications system. Appreciate relief authorities have been notified that calls for the units are to be placed with the central yard dispatch office at the plant. The dispatcher and alternate members of the company staff have been trained to obtain from the caller pertinent information regarding the whereabouts of the disaster and the contemplated use of the Ballantine units. Verification of this vital information is made by a return call to the relief agency. The plan provides for full control of the units by the State authorities during the emergency, eliminating the possibility that full use of the units will be lost because of confusion on the part of unit personnel.

In addition to the spot convoys which are ready, the company has pledged the availability of its entire fleet of some 800 trucks if and when they are needed. The units are currently at the disposal of Leonard Dreyfus, civil defense director for the State of New Jersey.

I submit that here we have a concrete example of a workable plan for aid by industry in the event of disaster anywhere in our great country. Whether a particular firm has only one truck or a great fleet of trucks, it can play an important part in disaster relief work by making transportation and personnel available to the appropriate State and community relief agencies.

As those of us who have been at the scene of disasters know too well, removal of disaster victims, transportation of relief workers, quick transportation of medical supplies and other necessaries to the scene of the tragedy, all of these are matters of utmost urgency.

It is not feasible for the average relief organization to have as standard equipment the amount of transportation it often needs to perform the tasks listed. The initial cost of such transportation would be prohibitive, the maintenance of the vehicles would require additional funds, and the personnel needed to operate the vehicles are simply not available in many cases.

The relatively few large and fully equipped disaster relief units which now exist are often called great distances to aid in emergencies. It is not uncommon to read in the press of fire companies and other relief units from a large number of communities converging on one area to aid in an emergency. While this may be an adequate procedure for peacetime purposes, it is not desirable because it leaves unprotected many areas where the equipment is normally based.

It takes but little imagination to picture a wartime situation in which a number of disasters ocur in a relatively limited geographical area. In such a situation, pooling of existing relief transportation to serve at the scene of a single disaster would be impossible. Without an actual plan for the acquisition of supplementary transportation, the suffering which would result at many of the disaster scenes defies description. Because of the lack of vehicles, transportation of the injured to hospitals would be delayed, the arrival of skilled emergency relief workers would be stymied, urgently needed supplies would not reach the suffering. In short, all of the tragedy which always accompanies a disaster, might well be compounded again and again because of a lack of transportation at the scene.

I should like to stress that the size of a plant or industry is not important to participation in this program. In our extensive farming and nonindustrial areas, for example, it is conceivable that many owners of single trucks could cooperate with relief agencies to devise a workable plan which would result in the immediate availability of adequate transportation at disaster scenes. Although war-caused disasters are less likely in these nonindustrial areas, we cannot under present conditions consider any area immune for disaster and thus not in potential need of mobile emergency disaster relief units.

I shall not attempt to blueprint the makeup of mobile disaster units. The Ballantine plan which I described can be considered a model. Substantial variations would be warranted according to the geographical location of the unit base.. In areas where floods are a problem the units would differ from those used in areas likely to be the scene of great fires. The number of small cars in a unit would vary according to traffic conditions, since these vehicles are intended to facilitate traffic control.

The important point I wish to make is that this proposition deserves serious attention from the Government and from industry, everywhere, at this time. We are hearing a great deal about civilian defense at the community level. Here we have more than just talk and paper planning. We have a workable plan which is already in limited operation because of the civic-mindedness of one industrial leader. I have no doubt that industry throughout the Nation is eager to cooperate. With this cooperation our Nation will have taken a real step forward toward the goal of adequate preparedness for emergency which we must reach before it is too late.

Richard H. Balch, an Outstanding Citizen, Is Candidate for the Office of Lieutenant Governor of New York State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, it was my pleasure last week to be present at the New York State Democratic Convention in Rochester and see an outstanding citizen and friend of mine nominated for lieutenant governor of New York State. He is Richard H. Balch, of Utica.

Dick Balch is one of those rare Americans—a man whose energies are unbounded, and who has turned his talents into countless fields in his efforts to better the lives of his fellow citizens and those who work with him and for him.

He is president of the largest fishing tackle manufacturing company in the Nation—the Horrocks-Ibbotson Co.—and yet he is a stanch friend of labor. His company is successful and profitable, and at the same time, it is an outstanding example of good labor-management relations. It has contracts with the CIO textile workers and the AFL teamsters.

Dick Balch is highly regarded in business circles, being a member of the board of Devine Bros. Manufacturing Co., Utica Fire Insurance Co., and Frost & Co., of New York City. He has been a vice president of the Utica Chamber of Commerce, and was management representative on the area war manpower management-labor committee during World War II.

Always interested in civic affairs, Dick Balch has been a member of the board of education of Utica for several years. In addition he has been a member and chairman of the Utica Board of Water Supply since 1924. He has also been instrumental in the success of community chest campaigns and similar worthwhile drives.

Dick Balch, at 40, is the possessor of many enviable talents. He is in the prime of life, with characteristic vigor and imagination, and yet is a successful businessman and public servant. He has had over 25 years of experience in public and civic affairs and has many fine years of service to his fellow citizens ahead of him.

It is an honor for the people of my district to have a man like Dick Balch nominated on a major political party's State ticket.

Meat Inspection Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the attached resolution adopted by the Greater New Haven Industrial Union Council, September 11, 1950:

Whereas the Meat Inspection Service is a division of the Bureau of Animal Industry which was formed some 60 years ago by an act of Congress, and was later augmented due to public demand by the Meat Inspection Act of June 30, 1906, and is this year being further augmented to increase its duties and responsibilities due to public demand; and

Whereas the sole duty and responsibility of this service is to protect the public health and welfare by insuring a safe and wholesome meat supply to the consuming public, and by their own regulations the Armed Forces, Veterans' Administration, and all other Government services, and to all foreign countries who import our meat and meat food products; and

Whereas the cost to the American people for this service is insignificant in return for the protection received, being less than 10 cents per person per year; and

Whereas the Meat Inspection Division is faced with a disastrous cut in appropriations requested for the next fiscal year, which will necessitate the dismissal of 344 meat inspectors through the country from its presently undermanned force: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Greater New Haven CIO Council and its affiliates go on record as opposing this dangerous proposal; that it use every means at its disposal to bring this matter to the attention of the public through any means it may see fit, and that the public be urged to contact their Congressmen in opposition to this appropriation reduction; and be it further

Resolved, That steps be initiated to have Congress place the personnel of the Meat Inspection Division on the same level as personnel of the Armed Forces, Veterans' Administration, and medical personnel of the Public Health Service who were excluded in this amendment to the appropriation bill; namely the Byrd-Bridges amendment.

Railway Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to briefly supplement the remarks that I made recently in connection with the Railroad Retirement Act. It is my considered opinion that this act is in need of substantial amendment. Any amendment to a law affecting the welfare and even the livelihood of an important segment of our society should only be enacted after careful and painstaking study.

I therefore repeat my request that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce schedule public hearings as soon as practicable and thereafter bring to this floor appropriate amendments for the benefit of hundreds of thousands of railroad workers throughout the country. It is possible that with prompt and vigorous action on the part of the committee this much-needed legislation might be passed during November or December by this Congress. In any event such hearings and deliberation will enable the next Congress to work its will promptly and intelligently.

Mr. Speaker, by almost unanimous action this Congress recently raised the pension payments to those presently on the social-security retirement rolls. In some cases the benefits were actually doubled. I have no quarrel with that legislation. I was happy to support it. But I respectfully submit that the cost of living for the retired railroad worker is just as high as the cost for any other American citizen. The old railroaders who have devoted their productive years to the most essential of all American industries receive no special privilege or discount in the purchase of food, clothing or shelter.

The employees of the railroads have their own retirement fund with payments and benefits prescribed by Federal statute. They want to continue their separate and independent status. They have no desire to become a part of the broad social-security program and I do not so recommend. Nevertheless separate status should not make the men and women working for the railroads the victims of discrimination. Such discrimination does exist and only the Congress can correct it.

Today's newspapers are filled with the exploits and accomplishments of the United States Marines. Today all Americans are grateful to the Eightieth Congress which prevented the liquidation of the Marine Corps and its absorption by the Army. There is a definite parallel between the Marines and the railroad workers. Each group is justly proud of its separate entity and its history of accomplishment. Just as the Marines rightfully and vigorously resist absorption by the Army, so the railroaders resist absorption by social security.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider disability and retirement benefits the parallel which I have pointed out comes to an end. The Marines receive the same benefits as do all the other members of the armed services. The railroad workers, on the other hand, based on their own contributions, do not receive benefits commensurate to those of the 45,000,000 Americans now covered by the Social Security Act. Furthermore, the railroads themselves make proportionately larger payments than does industry in general.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is the time for action. We have had 4 years of experience under the Crosser amendments. We can no longer hide behind the old excuse, "Let's see how the present law works out." I earnestly hope that this Congress and the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will meet the responsibility to the American railroad worker who has contributed so much to this, our country.

Hon. John C. Davies, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, before the second session of the Eighty-first Congress adjourns, I would like to say a few words in praise of one of our colleagues from up-State New York, the Honorable JOHN C. DAVIES.

Congressman DAVIES came to us as the third youngest Member of the Eighty-first Congress, and a man who had never before held public office, but he has proven to be an outstanding freshman Member of the House of Representatives.

When voting on legislation, he supported almost all progressive measures for the betterment of our Nation and our people, but he did not hesitate to cross party lines on occasion in his vote on bills in which he could not believe. His votes were dictated by his conscience and the best interest of the people in his district, rather than by political expediency.

JACK DAVIES supported and voted for the working out of labor legislation which would be equitable to all sides. He has supported legislation which will improve the housing shortage and give the lower and middle income groups a chance to own homes. DAVIES supported the FEPC bill, the new social security law, the new minimum wage law, liberalized displaced persons legislation and the bills to give statehood to Alaska and Hawaii. He also favored those Hoover Commission recommendations which he believed would actually result in increased efficiency and economy.

In his effort to aid in bringing some bit of clarity in the muddle of farm legislation which now exists, he has constantly fought to protect the rights of the dairy farmers in his district. In addition, he has been instrumental in securing some Government contracts for firms in his district so that the employment situation could be improved.

DAVIES' wide range of interests can be seen by some of the bills he has introduced during this Congress. They include measures to provide more adequate provision for the health of school children, to regulate oleomargarine, to suspend certain import taxes on copper, to condemn the persecution of Cardinal Mindszenty, to abolish the poll tax by a constitutional amendment, to improve the harbor at Oswego, N. Y., to encourage construction of rental housing near military installations. He also introduced bills to aid in the development of Great Lakes shipping, and to aid poultry farmers by providing Government surplus feed to them at a lower cost.

It can be readily seen, Mr. Speaker, that JACK DAVIES is the kind of legislator of which we need more in this country—young, progressive, independent and active in his representation of his constituents. It has been a pleasure to have served with him in the Eighty-first Congress and the people of the Thirty-fifth District of New York should be glad that JOHN C. DAVIES was their Representative during that period.

Dried Eggs From Communist China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer and another from the Gloversville (N. Y.) Herald dealing with the silly performance of allowing dried eggs to be shipped into this country from Communist China at a time when our own Government warehouses are bulging with dried eggs resulting from domestic production.

The answer proposed by the editor of the Observer to the State Department's contention regarding the lowering of the tariff rate is, of course, unanswerable. This country has no treaty with Communist China, so that there is no necessity to consult with any other nation before advising the Communists that the import rate will be 27 cents a pound as fixed by the Tariff Commission rather than the present bargain rate of 17 cents. As the editor says:

You can't violate a treaty that does not exist.

The purchase of these dried eggs, of course, does nothing but bolster the Communist regime in China. Any money sent out there now certainly will not further the interest of our country and, indeed, may be used for the purchase of munitions and other material to be used against us. No possible need can be shown for dried eggs which already are in huge surplus in this country. Their importation ought to be prohibited altogether. If that cannot or will not be done, certainly our Government should insist on imposing the maximum duty of 27 cents a pound instead of the tariff of 17 cents established by the Geneva Trade Convention for nations signing the International Trade Agreement.

The above-mentioned editorials follow:

[From the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer of August 25, 1950]

YOU NAME THIS ONE

It seems that there is no end to the imbecilities of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Every day a new one crops up, and it is always a little sillier than the one we heard about yesterday.

It is no secret that the storage cost on the farm products that the CCC has taken off the market and hidden away in warehouses, oil tanks, idle ships, and caves amounts to $105,000,000 a year, or about $25,000 an hour. That, mind you, is just the storage cost.

Among the commodities in storage are dried eggs by the billions of dozens, which the CCC has bought up to keep the retail price high and has sequestered in a cave in Kansas.

Most of us knew about that cave of eggs. What we did not know, until Representative KEATING, of New York, told about it in a debate in the House, is that we are importing 800,000 pounds of dried eggs a month from—of all places—Communist China.

It came about this way:

In 1931 the Tariff Commission set the import duty on dried eggs at 27 cents a pound. At the Geneva trade convention in 1947 the State Department negotiated a treaty with all nations signing the International Trade Agreement reducing the tariff to 17 cents.

Last spring, when the Communist Government took over in China, it informed our State Department that it did not recognize our trade treaty with Nationalist China; so it would insist on selling its dried eggs to the United States, duty free.

The State Department says it can't do anything about it without consulting the other 58 nations that signed the treaty.

We think it could do one thing: It could just remind Peiping that there never was a treaty between the United States and Communist China; hence, as far as Communist China is concerned, the tariff will be 27 cents.

It is hard to see how the other 58 nations could object, because Communist China never signed the collective treaty. You can't violate a treaty that does not exist.

[From the Gloversville (N. Y.) Herald of August 29, 1950]

THE MORNING HERALD'S EYE OPENER—BUT WHO IS REALLY TO BLAME?

Representative KENNETH B. KEATING, New York, Republican, charged in the House the other day that the Government actually is encouraging Communist China to ship dried eggs into this country—while at the same time spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to buy up eggs here, in dried form, under the Federal price support program.

"During the very time that our Government has been buying up surplus eggs and hoarding dried eggs in caves and warehouses," the Congressman declared, "it has refused to take any action to bar the import of dried eggs from Communist China.

"In fact, the administration actually is encouraging these imports by granting bargain-basement, cut-rate import duties to a government we have not even recognized."

And it's perfectly true, too.

The Government is very much to blame in the matter; but someone else must shoulder at least a portion of the responsibility.

For the United States Government, itself, is not importing those Communist-Chinese dried eggs.

That is done by individual American commercial concerns, because it pays them to do so.

There need not be any delusions in the matter. There is nothing illegal about the transactions. The Chinese have dried eggs to sell. They can produce them at a relatively low price. It is cheaper for American firms which use dried eggs in the manufacture of various commodities to purchase consignments of those dried eggs from Communist China, and pay the import duties, than it would be to purchase dried eggs in this country.

And the American dollars that the Chinese Communists receive for these dried eggs will help the Chinese Communist government to equip its armies. They may even already be helping to equip the North Korean forces with whom American troops now are at grips.

Yes, there would be an easy way to put an end to the traffic—by raising the import duty so that it would not be profitable to import Chinese dried eggs.

But there would be an even easier way—for the American importers concerned to decline to utilize Chinese dried eggs in their business as a matter of sheer loyalty.

Then there would not be any need of augmented tariff duties.

The Korean Seductress Who Betrayed America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD W. HOFFMAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have today addressed letters to Congressmen CARL VINSON and DEWEY SHORT, of the Armed Services Committee, calling for attention to a critical situation that has had a tragic effect on the fortunes of our fighting men in Korea.

The Soviet aggressors have successfully used Korean women to obtain valuable information from American military personnel as well as to conduct a thriving underground operation in the Korean Republic. The deadly skill of these adventuresses, prior to the North Korean invasion, has undoubtedly had a great deal to do with the grave misfortune suffered by the brave defenders under the leadership of General MacArthur.

Because this situation is so vicious in its implications and so dangerous in its relationship to our occupation troops throughout the world, I am asking at this time for the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the following article that appears in Coronet Magazine for October 1950:

THE KOREAN SEDUCTRESS WHO BETRAYED AMERICA—HERE, TOLD FOR THE FIRST TIME, IS THE AMAZING STORY OF A COMMUNIST MATA HARI

(By Mary Van Rensselaer Thayer)

Although the name of Kim Suim, a beautiful oriental girl, failed to appear in communiques from the Korean front, it deserved a place there. For, when the alluring young temptress was shot as a spy a few hours before the Red troops crashed into Seoul, the event was comparable to the destruction of a column of Red tanks.

With her voluptuous charm and oriental seductiveness, Kim Suim, known to her compatriots as the "Doctor of Lovemaking," was a deadly weapon, shaped and set in motion by Russian hands. She and thousands of others like her—all chosen for their beauty and easy morals, indoctrinated with the Communist credo and turned loose to do as much damage as possible—were part of a vast plan.

These lethal ladies of the Soviet operation sex used their charms to protect Red underground terrorists, and to seduce the enemy—South Korea and America—into betraying its deepest secrets.

We know there was a large number of these Mata Haris in Korea, well trained and, in their coldly amorous fashion, highly effective in gathering vital information from unsuspecting American officers and GI's. Their far-flung sisters are a problem that will confront us again and again. Luckily we have a blueprint of their methods, for Kim Suim stood trial in a Korean court, where her machinations were glaringly exposed.

Her first exposure to communism took place in 1942, at a meeting of so-called patriots. There, she fell in love with the principal speaker of the evening a tall and handsome Korean named Lee Kung Kook, administrative director of the Communist National Front Federation.

Lee Kung was a fanatic, who never spent time on anything—even lovemaking—without a sound ideological reason. Even before submitting to Kim Suim's wiles, he looked into her background and evaluated her potential usefulness to the party.

An orphan, she had been educated at American Methodist schools and later had found a job as private secretary of the head of the dental school at Severance College. All this counted in her favor. But her greatest asset, from Lee Kung's point of view, was not her education but her looks—and the power they gave her over men.

She was a miniature Venus, perfectly proportioned, with the shiniest and longest black pigtails in all Korea, and with enormous black eyes, enhanced by extravagantly arched eyebrows. Nature obviously had endowed her to be a charmer, and it was at Severance College that she received her nickname, "Doctor of Lovemaking."

Lee Kung decided Kim Suim could be of great value both to him and to the Communist cause. So interspersing doctrine and embraces, he slowly bent her to his will. When the payoff arrived it exceeded his most optimistic dreams. Three years after that 1942 meeting of "patriots," all of Korea below the thirty-eighth parallel was taken over by United States occupation forces—and Kim Suim stepped forth confidently to meet them.

Missionary-trained and accomplished in English, she knew perfectly how to ingratiate herself. She was received with open arms. They made her the receptionist at the Banto Hotel, United States military headquarters in Korea. Kim Suim was touchingly grateful. She went out of her way to please, smiling and bowing all day long—and at night supplying her Korean lover with increasingly valuable information.

She discovered, well in advance, the impending withdrawal of United States forces and even the precise dates of their departure.

For a year she remained at the Banto, in a constant glitter of top brass. Then her fortune took a still more dizzy upturn. She was shifted to the United States Provost Marshal's office, part of the Counter Intelligence Division—which meant daily contact with high-security data. It was the sort of job spies dream of.

About this time, the private life of the "Doctor of Lovemaking" also underwent a change. She found a proper place to hang out her shingle, a luxurious house on Kind Jade Street, in Seoul's most fashionable district. Originally the establishment had belonged to a wealthy Japanese, who had surrendered it to the American military government, which, in turn, surrendered it to Kim Suim.

Why was it given to her? In seeking the answer in the records of her trial, one is impressed chiefly by the elaborate discretion of the Korean prosecutor. Others were less reticent. They named an American officer, the one, they added slyly, to whom she had borne a son.

Soon the house in Kind Jade Street was a busy and curious place. Above stairs, there were revelry, romance, and a continual coming and going of American dignitaries; downstairs, things were quite different. Kim Suim shuttled between the two levels, one minute rushing up to greet a couple of colonels, then hurrying down to speed a Communist fugitive on his way to safety beyond the thirty-eighth parallel. At night she would sing native songs to an appreciative uniformed audience, perform her amorous devoirs, and after that, dash away to count the profits of a brisk side line she was running in stolen jeeps, ammunition, and guns.

In her unassailable position, beyond suspicion, she master-minded a whole network of Communist intrigue and espionage. Bundles of Japanese currency, brought down from the Communist north, were secreted in her cellar. When they had been distributed among the Communists of the south, in came rice boxes filled with pilfered American arms. The munitions—as well as occasional refugees for whom Kind Jade Street served as a stop on the underground railroad—were loaded into American vehicles and driven to the thirty-eighth parallel, where all would promptly disappear into Red territory. The drivers were Korean employees of the American military government, whose passes permitted them to go anywhere unchallenged.

Then, one night in September 1946, as Kim Suim and her naive American protector were having tea, a servant whispered in her ear. Excusing herself, she hurried down to the cellar, where Lee Kung Kook was waiting. A disastrous thing had happened. The timid South Korean Government at last had issued a warrant for his arrest. She would have to help him escape.

It was an easy enough assignment, for, out of consideration for the Americans, the police were no more likely to invade the house on Kind Jade Street than they were the Banto Hotel. For 3 days Lee Kung remained in concealment, while his sweetheart made arrangements to smuggle him to the border.

Tearfully, she told her American friend that her "mother" lay dying in Kaesung, the nearest city to the Red border. As a dutiful daughter, the least she could do was rush a doctor to the scene. The American expedited the journey. Touched by her obvious grief, he showered her and the doctor—who happened to be Lee Kung Kook—with good wishes for the "mother's" recovery.

At her trial, this trip north and Lee Kung's escape were commented on, but the prosecutor discreetly refrained from mentioning the fact that the journey was made in an American jeep.

Lee's departure brought no decrease of underground activity in Kind Jade Street. It went on for nearly three more years, years of unmarred success during which Kim Suim became known as the best-dressed, best-informed, most powerful native woman in Seoul.

Then, at last, her luck ran out. She had predicted the event herself—and had been congratulated for doing so by her Communist masters. The American occupation troops left South Korea.

Kim Suim was desolate. She wept on her departing protector's shoulder and assured him of her undying devotion. Then, wiping her eyes, she sat down to await what life would bring her next.

What it brought her, eventually, was the long-suffering incredibly patient South Korean police, and once more the house on Kind Jade Street was filled with lamentations.

"But what have I done?" wailed its mistress, a picture of outraged virtue. The arresting officer regarded her stonily.

"Madame," he began, "we have known about your activities for years. We would have acted long before this, only—." He left the sentence unfinished, but its meaning was clear—somebody high up might have objected.

In June 1950, charged with 4 major and 26 lesser crimes against the State, Kim Suim stood trial. One of the chief defense witnesses was Yung Sook Mo, former classmate of the accused and Korea's foremost poetess. Speaking with the voice of befuddled liberals all over the world. Miss Mo discounted the prosecution's talk of communism and treason.

"The reason Miss Kim Suim committed this crime," her strange deposition read in part, "was love. She fell in love with this man, Lee Kung Kook, and though Mr. Kook was working against the Republic of Korea, all she could do was to cooperate fully."

This starry-eyed poetess' plea for sympathy was rejected by the court, the prosecutor calling it regretable. No doubt Miss Mo came to regret it herself some weeks later, for she was one of the first to be shot by North Korean Communists after they took Seoul.

While the Red troops still were in the outskirts of the city on June 28, Kim Suim, who had confessed and had been condemned to death, was removed from the military prison to Kimpo airport. In honor, perhaps, of her American friends, she had been used to going around in slacks with her hair done up in an American-style permanent. Now, for this ceremonial occasion, she was dressed conservatively in Korean garb, and her long black hair was bound tightly about her head.

When she had crossed the compound and taken her stand against the far wall, one of the soldiers, lined up in front of her, whispered to a companion, "How small she is. We must lower our sights."

A minute later there was the command, and the staccato bark of rifles. As the "Doctor of Lovemaking" sank to the ground, her Red comrades were swarming into Seoul, shooting off the American guns and ammunition which she had so adroitly smuggled in to them.

The New Social-Security Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, one of the outstanding achievements of this Eighty-first Congress is the enactment of a law expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This law extends security in their old age to 10,000,000 additional Americans as a matter of their earned right, not as a matter of charity or a public dole. It raises social-security benefits to conform with higher costs of living.

I believe that our social-security system should be extended even further, so as to cover all working men and women. But the new law passed by the Eighty-first Congress is a great step forward, and I was glad to cast my vote for it.

In view of the widespread interest in this law I think it will be helpful to set forth the changes in our social-security system which it brings about.

MAJOR CHANGES SUMMARIZED

Summarized in a few sentences, the major changes are:

First. Larger benefits. The people of Illinois now receiving social-security payments will find that in the checks to be mailed out October 3 their benefits will be, on the average, roughly, 75 percent greater than they have been. For those who will retire after June 1952 benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

Second. Broader coverage. On January 1, 1951, many Illinoisans who up to now have not been covered by social security, will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm, self-employed persons in business for themselves, such as grocery-store, retail-store, or gas-station owners, will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Third. Easier eligibility: In general, it will take less years of social-security coverage before you are eligible to draw benefits. Specifically, persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of social-security coverage can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker as well as survivors and dependents will be able to earn $50 a month as against the present limit of $15—without losing their benefit payments.

Here, in more detail, are the answers to questions I think will be of most general interest:

HOW MUCH LARGER BENEFITS?

First. How much larger will benefits be under the new law? Benefit increases will go to two main groups of people: (a) those who are currently receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952. These are called new starts. Let me explain more fully how the new bill affects each of these groups.

IMMEDIATE INCREASES AVERAGE SEVENTY-SEVEN AND ONE-HALF PERCENT

There are approximately 188,828 people in the State of Illinois who are now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October—their September payments—they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple:

INCREASES SENT AUTOMATICALLY

You do not have to apply for the increases; they will be sent to you automatically. If, for any reason, the increase fails to show up in your October check, it will show up very soon, in full. Recipients are asked not to start writing in for information because the more letters that have to be answered the slower the program will be in getting under way.

BENEFITS DOUBLED IN 1952

For anyone who retires after June 1952 a new formula may be used to compute benefits which will yield, roughly, twice the benefits now being received. You can begin to use this new formula just as soon as you have worked for six quarter years—or a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The following table shows, roughly, how much the benefits will be according to this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	86
$200	66	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $10 to $25 in most cases, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150. These changes are long overdue in bringing our social-security system into line with high living costs.

WHO WILL BE COVERED NOW?

Second. What new people will be covered under the new law? On January

1, 1951, nearly 10,000,000 people in the Nation as a whole will come under the social-security system for the first time.

THE NONFARM SELF-EMPLOYED

The largest and most important group to come under the system are the nonfarm self-employed. For the first time the druggist, the grocer, the gas station owner, and thousands of other persons who are in business for themselves can look forward to security in their later years as an earned right, to which they have contributed during their working lifetime.

Farmers are still not included under social security; nor are many professional people, such as doctors and lawyers.

ELIGIBLE FOR BENEFITS MUCH SOONER

At this point, I should emphasize, for the benefit of these businessmen, as well as all those who will come under the social-security system now, it will be much easier for you to become eligible for benefits under the new law. If you are 62 or over on January 1, 1951, and begin your social-security coverage on that date, you will need to work only a year and a half under the system in order to be fully insured and eligible for benefit payments upon retirement. That means that you will begin to draw benefits just as soon as you reach the retirement age of 65.

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Agricultural workers will come under the social-security program on January 1. This includes not only persons who regularly work on farms, but also the so-called borderline agricultural workers—those who work, say, in raising livestock or fur animals; or in processing or delivering crops to storage or to market; or those engaged in household work on a farm. Employees of commercial handlers of fruits and vegetables are included in this borderline group, as are employees of farmer cooperatives.

Those who regularly work on farms must work for one farm operator for 3 months before their social-security coverage even begins. After that, they must work for him for 60 full days and earn $50 in cash during each 3-month period. If they change employers, they must work regularly for 3 months before their work with the new employer begins to count for social security.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Domestic workers in nonfarm homes will join the system next January, provided they work 24 days for one employer and receive cash wages of at least $50 during each quarter year.

VOLUNTARY COVERAGE FOR STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

With regard to the inclusion of employees of the State, and of cities, towns, or counties, this is the situation: Sometime after January 1 the State of Illinois may, if it wishes, enter into an agreement with the Federal Government. That agreement will set forth specifically which groups of employees of the State, or of cities, towns, or counties, will be covered under social security. Any State or local employee who is covered by an existing retirement system cannot be included in such an agreement. In this way existing retirement systems will be fully protected. If any group of State or local employees is included in the agreement, then social-security covering for all members of the group will be automatic.

Employees of the Federal Government in Illinois who are not presently covered by a Federal retirement system will be included under social security.

EMPLOYEES OF NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Employees of nonprofit institutions—hospitals, churches, schools, and the like—will be covered only if the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution and if two-thirds or more of the employees favor social-security coverage.

Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

SALESMEN AND TRUCK DRIVERS INCLUDED

The new bill will also include all full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain full-time traveling salesmen—other than house-to-house—many delivery-truck drivers, and home industrial workers who satisfy certain conditions.

HOW LONG TO QUALIFY?

Third. How long will you have to work under social security before you can start drawing benefits?

One of the greatest advantages of the new social-security law is that although the retirement age is still 65, in the future you will not have to work under the social-security system nearly as long before you are fully insured and eligible to draw benefits upon reaching the retirement age of 65.

The following table shows how many quarter years of coverage under social security you will have to have under the new law, as compared with the present law. Simply look at the figure next to your age on January 1, 1951.

Quarter years of coverage required to be fully insured

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
76 or over	6	6
75	8	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
67	24	6
66	26	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
61	36	8
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
56	40	18
55	40	20
50	40	30
45 or under	40	40

All of the time you have worked under social security up to now still counts toward meeting your coverage requirement.

This change means three main things.

MANY AGED 65 CAN GET BENEFITS IMMEDIATELY

First, any insured worker who is now 65 or over, and who has had 6 quarter years—or a full year and a half—of social security coverage, can draw benefits immediately. He should apply for them at the nearest Social Security Administration field office.

Second, any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he only starts his social security coverage next year, will be eligible to begin drawing benefits just as soon as he reaches the retirement age of 65, or if he has had six quarter years—a year and a half—of coverage.

ELIGIBILITY MUCH EASIER FOR THE NEWLY COVERED

Third, and most important to the thousands who will become eligible to join the social security system next year, it will be possible for them to begin drawing benefits upon retirement—at age 65—with much less social security coverage than now. The table above shows the tremendous improvements brought about by this law.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

The fourth main question of general interest is: How much will dependents and survivors receive under the new law?

The primary benefit is the basic payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents. Generally speaking, dependents and survivors will receive the same part of the primary as at present. This means that their benefits will also be about 75 percent higher than at present, up until 1952, and double the present levels after that.

The major changes in dependents' and survivors' benefits are:

(a) A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits if she has a child in her care.

(b) The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—it has been one-half.

(c) Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly, these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

(d) Retired workers, survivors, or dependents may now earn $50 a month—as against $14.99 under the present law—without losing their benefit privileges.

Another major improvement is the provision allowing war veterans an arbitrary wage credit of $160 per month for all the time spent in the service. This provision will be of direct benefit to thousands of Illinois veterans.

The adoption of the Knowland amendment in this legislation was, in my opinion, uncalled for and unnecessary. It is also unfortunate that the provision contained in the original House bill for permanently or totally disabled persons was cut out by the Senate.

Further information and details will be supplied by the local offices of the Social Security Board throughout Illinois.

Pulpit Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. WILSON OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I call to the attention of the House and our great country, a timely and excellent article recently prepared for a religious magazine by the Honorable Josh Lee, formerly United States Senator from Oklahoma and now a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board. In these trying times as we give deep and serious consideration to our national defense, it is well to have before us the subject of Senator Lee's article which is as follows:

PULPIT PATRIOTISM
(By Josh Lee)

What should be the attitude of Christian leaders toward this war? Whose war is it? What are we fighting for? We are fighting for Christian principles and in defense of Christian ideals. Christians have more at stake than any other group in the free world. The heart and soul of the Christian religion is faith, and that faith is being challenged today by a diabolical doctrine of cynicism and atheism. The gage of battle is lying at our feet. Shall we pick it up or shall we pretend that we do not know it is there? We dare not ignore it. The very foundations of the Christian world are being shaken by communism; therefore, Christian leaders cannot afford even to appear to be indifferent toward this war in conducting their services. An aroused Christendom should be on the march with the battle cry, "I believe."

I believe that man has an immortal soul. He was given an intellect with which to reason and a heart capable of faith. This contradicts the materialistic philosophy that man is merely an animal whose only needs are physical. God breathed the breath of life into him and thereafter he became a living soul, not merely a living creature but a living soul endowed with immortality.

I believe that man is a free moral agent. He is fully able to bear the burden of freedom and fully capable of making the decisions required of a free agent. He is not merely a zombie for whom all decisions must be made by the Comintern. He is able to decide right from wrong and is capable of self-government without the use of iron curtains, barb-wire enclosures, paid informers, and secret police.

I believe in the dignity of man. He is more than an economic unit. The very posture of man belies the idea of slavery. He was not created to walk on four feet like a beast of burden but was created to walk upright on two feet in an attitude of dignity. The upright position is one which commands respect whereas the prone position is an indication of subservience. As punishment for his sins, Nebuchadnezzar was condemned to walk upon all fours and eat grass like the beasts of the field. The curse that was placed upon the serpent for deceiving man was that it should crawl upon its belly all of its days. But man was created in the image of God and, Godlike, he was made to stand and to walk in an upright position.

When the rubber lifeboat of the four brave Americans who had escaped from a wrecked bomber during the recent war in the South Pacific washed upon the beach of an island, the four men were so weak and exhausted from 34 days of famine and exposure that they could hardly stand, but with their last ounce of energy they forced themselves to their feet and walked upright, military file, because, as they said, "If there were Japs, we did not want to be crawling."

The Christian belief in the dignity of man, created as he was in the image of God, to walk upright and to kneel to no man is the very antithesis of the craven philosophy of communism with its slave labor. Man alone was given dominion over the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air and the fish of the sea. But no creature was given dominion over man. To God alone is man required to kneel. That is why the founding fathers wrote in the Declaration of Independence that man is created free and equal. Therefore, an ideology that would deprive man of that freedom and deny him that dignity is totally repugnant to the Christian concept and should be vigorously resisted by Christians everywhere.

Not only are we at war with communism spiritually and psychologically but we are at war with the Communists physically. Since the end of World War II, the Kremlin's ruthless agents have seized control in one country after another, until today 800,000,000 people are prisoners behind the iron curtain. The Communist leaders have the cunning of a demented mind. Part of their strategy is to exploit our love of peace and our cherished Christian beliefs by using our own preachers and teachers to soften up America for the kill. They know that our Government is no stronger than the public opinion which supports its policies. Therefore, if under the guise of advocating Christian ethics, the Communists can get enough of our people committed to the spineless policy of nonresistance or even an attitude of apathy toward the war effort, they will undermine our national security. Such a paralysis of our national strength would render us helpless before their endless battalions of armed fanatics.

Man for man, our soldiers have always been better than the soldiers of our enemies. Why? Because of a firm conviction on the part of our soldiers that they were fighting for a principle. In other words, "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just." Never was our cause more just than it is today, and never has Christianity been challenged by a more ruthless and more powerful foe than now. Therefore, it would be expected that every church service would include a patriotic rededication to the ideals for which men are giving their lives in Korea today.

But suppose a young man who is about to go to war should attend a church service somewhere in the United States and the business-as-usual manner with which the services were conducted gave him the impression that Christian people were indifferent toward stopping Communist aggression. Then suppose the preacher should deliver a splendid sermon on Christian living with no apparent interest in winning the war now being fought to keep the world a fit place in which to do that living. What conclusion would be forced upon that young man by such an apathetic attitude toward a war he is expected to fight? He would undoubtedly wonder if the cause was really a righteous one and if it was worth the sacrifice which he was being asked to make for it. Such a doubt in the justice of his cause would render him less able to do his duty as a soldier. Therefore, if we by our apathy shake the faith of our boys in what they are fighting for, we must accept the responsibility for the consequences.

Suppose another soldier boy should attend another church service somewhere in the United States and hear a sermon that left him with the impression that in the eyes of the Christian people it is wrong to bear arms and use force regardless of what the circumstances might be. The effect of such an impression upon his will to fight would be as deadening as a shot of cocaine to the muscles of his body.

How can any Christian say, "This is not my war. It is no concern of mine if other countries are invaded and their peoples enslaved. I am not my brother's keeper." No Christian can say that and make an accurate statement because it is inconsistent with Christian ideals. Hence, the churches cannot afford to support the Communist-inspired doctrine of nonresistance either by direct precept or by a significant absence of patriotism in their services.

When did God ever rebuke his people for defending their freedom and their homes and their lives? When was it ever wrong to fight for principle? Many of God's greatest leaders in the past have been mighty warriors, and the time has come again when His leaders must be strong fighting men. They must be able to rally His people not only to meet the spiritual challenge of communism but to prevent the powerful Communist armies from enslaving the world. If we are to enjoy the blessings of liberty, we must pay the price of that liberty ourselves and not expect non-Christians to pay it for us. I cannot believe that God expects His children to ride on the freedom train without paying their fares. I cannot believe that He expects them to shirk their duty when there is a war to be fought to prevent communism from enslaving the world.

The threat to freedom today is greater than it has ever been in our time. America has been called the land of the free and the home of the brave, but I would like to suggest that it is the land of the free because it is the home of the brave, and when it is no longer the home of the brave it will no longer be the land of the free. Freedom exists only where men are willing to defend it with their lives.

Everything that Christians hold dear is at stake in this war. Therefore, every Christian leader should be a firebrand for freedom and should rekindle the fires of patriotism on all of the sacred altars throughout the free world. It is not necessary to abandon evangelism in order to preach patriotism. We need spiritual guidance, but we also need some good red-blooded preaching which tells us what to do after we have turned both checks and had them smitten with hammer and sickle. We need evangelistic preaching more than ever before, but we also need some praise the Lord and pass the ammunition preaching, too. We need to hear the battle cry of Christian soldiers on the march.

Housing Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important bills passed during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress was S. 2446, the so-called middle income housing bill. Although many of its important and best provisions were stricken from the bill before its passage, notably the cooperative housing section, the measure showed the people of moderate means that their Government was interested in doing something to alleviate their plight.

There are millions of families in this Nation who are in the middle-income bracket, and who have largely missed out on housing programs in the past. In many cases, slum-clearance programs and lower income housing provisions have had restrictions barring their utilization by persons or families of this economic class. Their housing problem, however, is just as real as that of people who earn less.

It was this large group of citizens which the middle income housing bill was designed to help. It is regrettable that some of its best provisions were not retained, so that more people might have benefited.

Now that we are in a state of speeded-up war activity and with the accompanying danger of inflation, President Truman has placed restrictions on credit and building. This was, of course, the only thing he could do under the circumstances, even though it hindered many of the building programs now in effect. But let us hope that if our economic situation becomes stable once again, another and far-reaching housing bill is passed by Congress. We are still faced with a housing problem in this country. By the time our economy is completely stable once again we will surely have a far greater problem.

Let us earnestly hope that the Congress at that time will contain men who can and will grasp the situation and write adequate legislation to aid the millions who want and need better housing.

The Crusade for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Lynn Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass., Monday, September 18, 1950:

DRIVE DESERVES SUPPORT

Crusade for freedom drive officials in Massachusetts today made public the Declaration of Freedom which citizens throughout the State will be asked to sign when they enlist in the fight to stop the spread of Communist propaganda.

The declaration calls for a renewed pledge on the part of patriotic citizens in the "sacredness and dignity of the individual * * * the belief that all men derive the right to freedom equally from God * * * and to resist aggression and tyranny wherever they appear on earth."

The pledge appears on every freedom scroll to be placed in enrollment stations which will be established soon in all parts of the State. The scrolls, with the signatures on them, will be enshrined in the base of the giant, 10-ton bronze freedom bell, to be installed and dedicated behind the iron curtain in Berlin on United Nations Day, October 24.

Bell-ringing ceremonies throughout the free world will accompany the dedication of the freedom bell as a tribute to those who today are giving their lives in the struggle for human freedom. It will stand as a permanent symbol of the free world's determination to triumph over totalitarian aggression.

First to sign the freedom scroll in Massachusetts was Gov. Paul A. Dever. He also was first to contribute to the support of radio free Europe, a new radio station in Germany which brings to the people behind the iron curtain the truth of the democratic way of life. Funds also will help support a proposed network of freedom radio stations throughout Europe and Asia to combat the lies, big and little, being promulgated by Communists.

The following is the declaration for freedom pledge:

"I believe in the sacredness and dignity of the individual.

"I believe that all men derive the right to freedom equally from God.

"I pledge to resist aggression and tyranny wherever they appear on earth.

"I am proud to enlist in the crusade for freedom. I am proud to help make the freedom bell possible, to be a signer of this declaration of freedom, to have my name included as a permanent part of the freedom shrine in Berlin, and to join with the millions of men and women throughout the world who hold the cause of freedom sacred."

The crusade for freedom drive will continue for 6 weeks as an all-out effort is made to enlist the public in the drive.

This is a worth while drive and merits the support of all patriotic citizens.

Our Social-Security System Has Been Improved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is, indeed, gratifying to know that, despite all the bumps and unexpected turns which the legislative road has taken during this second session of the Eighty-first Congress, the new social-security bill was passed by both Houses and signed into law by the President.

The social-security idea was one of the most progressive steps ever taken by any government when it was passed in the midthirties. As is almost always the case with such revolutionary and far-reaching legislation, it was discovered in time to contain several inadequate points and not to contain some much-needed provisions.

It is, then, a pleasure to have supported the new social-security bill which improved many of the points which were found to be wanting in the original legislation.

Under the new law over 45,000,000 workers are covered—an increase of 10,000,000 over the number covered under the old law. In addition, benefit payments have been increased an average of 77 percent. In addition, the increased benefits will apply to those who have already retired, as well as those who retire in the future.

Under the old law a person must have been employed in a covered industry for half of the total working quarters from 1936 to his retirement. Under the new law a 62-year-old man who was covered for any six quarters in the past is fully eligible for benefits at age 65.

World War II veterans will get wage credits for each month of service financed from the old-age and survivors insurance fund. Another feature which I am glad was finally included in the new law is the exemption of State and local employees who already have a retirement plan. Many of my constituents were especially interested in this feature, since they were already covered by their own plans.

There are still many improvements to be made in the social-security plan. It is not yet perfect, but the passage of H. R. 6000 and its being signed into Public Law 734 is a great step forward and an accomplishment of which the Eighty-first Congress can be proud.

The Mighty "Mo's" Comeback

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, last January, at about the same time that a majority of one in the House of Representatives defeated an aid to Korea bill, a great many people were highly amused at the unfortunate grounding in Chesapeake Bay of the battleship Missouri. Today we know the great role played by the Missouri in the recently begun offensive of the United Nations' forces in Korea. All will acknowledge now that the Missouri has played her role in defense of freedom with greater effectiveness than those who described aid to Korea as operation rat hole.

Mr. Frank Tallman, of Kansas City, a distinguished veteran of World War II, who since the end of that war has actively participated in and worked hard for the defense forces of the United States, has called to my attention an excellent editorial which appeared in the Kansas City Star of Saturday, September 16, 1950. I include herewith the Mighty Mo's Comeback:

THE MIGHTY "MO'S" COMEBACK

Let every loyal son of Missouri hold his head high and his chest thrust forward. The proud battleship named for his State has redeemed herself.

It was a dark and perverse day last January 17 when the Big Mo found herself stuck in a Chesapeake Bay mud bank, as helpless as a fish beached by the tide. Before 14 little tugs could huff and puff the Missouri to floating safety, she had become a pathetic figure of ridicule, a national joke for all her gallant past.

Whereupon the Navy, in its embarrassment, relegated the grand lady warrior to the rocking chair status of a training ship. In an era when atomic weapons would be all-determining, the Missouri was supposed to be as obsolete as a wooden frigate.

So what happens? Along comes the Korean War and the admirals find a job made to order for their only active battlewagon. The Missouri hears the call to arms, glides out of semiretirement and heads for the scenes of conflict. While racing 11,000 miles she cuts through a hurricane, eludes a tropical storm and arrives off the Korean coast with a typhoon lashing its tail behind her. Then the queen of the seas stands near the Communist-occupied port of Samchok while her 16-inch guns soften defenses for United States marines and infantry landing there in the first big United Nations counterattack of the war.

It's the sweetest vindication possible for a fighting lady. And there can be no true Missourian so lacking in sentiment as not to be aboard his State's favorite vessel in spirit as she goes about her grim business of gaining new and greater glory.

Congressional Frank

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, the news services, under date of September 18, 1950, carried the story of the Buchanan Special House Committee Investigating Lobbying Activities report, charging that some Congressmen had permitted indiscriminate use of their franking privileges.

For example, I have been accused of mailing out 2,400,000 pieces of information at the taxpayers' expense during the last 6 years. That is an average of 400,000 pieces per year. Assuming these figures to be correct, yet the printing, paper, and envelopes for these speeches constitute the big expense and not the postage. It is obvious therefore, that few speeches and inserts of editorials and the like would be sent to the public unless paid for by the Congressmen or private persons. If the Congressmen can pay the bills themselves for printing and sending the material out, what's wrong if private organizations pay the bill and the Congressman sends it out under his frank? It must be assumed that the Congressmen will not use their frank unless they endorse their own material, or what they insert, as pertinent to legislation before the House.

Since there are 300,000 people in my district for example, it costs each of them about 1⅓ cents per year—postage costs only—to hear directly from their Representative in Congress and/or to provide wider dissemination of his report, speeches, or other messages. While the taxpayers of my district paid 1⅓ cents per year, I, or private persons or organizations, met the cost of all the paper and all the printing of the 2,400,000 pieces; and I, personally, paid for much of the research entering into statements prepared, inserted in the RECORD, and distributed under frank, by me.

Postmaster General Donaldson advised me in a letter dated June 22 that the cost of mailing out administration mail is about $75,000,000. Subsidies for air mail and other services bring the cost up to around $149,000,000 a year. Add to that the salaries and expenses of 45,000 writers of the material and the printing at a cost of about $100,000,000, according to Senator BYRD. This information and propaganda machine, costing the taxpayers about $250,000,000 is overlooked when appraising the effort that Congressmen make to present the opposition viewpoint, at their own expense and with the help of private persons, at a pitifully small franking—postage—cost of $1,200,000. It is too bad Congressmen send so little to their constituents.

Oddly enough, too, the administration mail goes first class, at a 3-cent rate, whereas the congressional frank generally carries congressional mail at a 1-cent postage rate, the slowest and cheapest method of handling.

But far more important than what I or any other individual Congressman has or has not done, with regard to dissemination of views he upholds through the use of his frank, is the fundamental reason for the establishment of the franking privilege.

This privilege and obligation was given to Congressmen without limitation because our founding fathers, like the members of the British Parliament, had fought for the right of representation. And they knew that they needed the fullest, freest communication between their representative and themselves. With overwhelming New Deal majorities, President Roosevelt attempted to destroy, by court-packing, the balance between the judicial, executive, and legislative departments. It was by the use of 15,000,000 pieces of franked mail, setting forth the constitutional issues, the Members of the Senate were able to carry the issue to the country and save the independence of our courts. This was a small price to pay for safeguarding our Constitution in a time of crisis and peril.

The use of the frank is the Congressman's most important, often his only means of communication with the people. By this method the people should get the facts from Congress as opposed to the propaganda of the administration. The taxpayers pay a little over $1,200,000 for this service from both parties in both the House and the Senate. On the other hand, they pay more than $250,000,000 for one-sided material put out by the administration, to say nothing of other costs and salaries of those who prepare and disseminate it.

But that is only part of the story. More than half the Members of Congress belong to the party in power and they make far more use of congressional committee reports and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the franking privilege than the minority party has yet learned to do.

Without the right to communicate with their constituents the Members of Congress soon cease to be an independent legislative body, fulfilling its duty under the Constitution to act as a check against usurpation by administrative power and to uphold minority views and rights.

The material I have distributed related to such matters as the dangers of Federal housing, Federal aid to and control of education, and the effect of centralized Government controls such as OPA throughout history. It favored the free economy against communism.

The men who are working night and day to change our form of government from a Republic to a Socialist autocracy under a ruling clique know well that they must destroy the ability of Congressmen to communicate with the people. They have put a congressional committee to work studying "lobbies," but that committee spends much time studying the communications of Congressmen with the citizens. It seems to find little time to investigate the vast propaganda network of the biggest and most dangerous lobby of all, the Government itself—the bureaucrats working under direction of the party in power.

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, in June 1878, in the course of a debate on the franking privilege, in which such Senators as Hannibal Hamlin, James G. Blaine, and Roscoe Conkling participated, said:

> The privilege (of franking) is one that belongs to the people and not to the representatives. The people never demanded the abolition of franking. Its object is to furnish the people with information and to allow them to receive from their representatives statistics, data, and information as to what is being done here by those who represent them in the different departments of the Government.

I can understand why our collectivists are trying to break down the communication between Congressmen and their constituents. I think the people should understand it, too.

Address by Hon. Herbert R. O'Conor, of Maryland, at 1950 Barry Day Celebration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, it was my privilege on Sunday, September 10, to address the 1950 Barry Day celebration of the Society of Commodore John Barry, United States Navy, one of the very outstanding patriotic organizations of the country. The ceremony, following the traditional parade, was held in Independence Square, Philadelphia, and was dedicated according to the custom of the society to the gallant members of the United States Navy of the present and of the past.

It was most gratifying to have the opportunity on that occasion to pay tribute to the "father of our Navy" and through him to the thousands of patriotic men and women who today are carrying on so nobly in the Naval Establishment. Likewise, it is a source of satisfaction to pay tribute also to the distinguished chairman of that splendid ceremony, Mr. Patrick J. McNelis, and to his loyal and efficient associates, among them the Honorable Michael J. Bradley, collector of the port of Philadelphia, and the Honorable Vincent A. Carroll, judge of the Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia.

In honoring one of the great heroes of our great Naval Establishment, it seemed pertinent to me to discuss the dangers presently facing the United States—those dangers against which the Navy would be most effective, as well as other dangers from within the country, to which every citizen should be alerted.

Because of the urgency of a more thorough understanding by all our people, to these threats to national security, I ask uanimous consent that the address be inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On this day dedicated to the memory of a great American who well deserves the title of "Father of our Navy", it is our immediate urge to pay deserved tribute to the gallant members of our present day Navy, and of its splendid "junior partner" in the Naval Establishment, the United States Marine Corps.

It is particularly gratifying that it was a native of our well-beloved Emerald Isle who was actively instrumental in the founding of the United States Navy. Commodore Barry, a seafarer from his early youth, realized, among the very first of the early Colonists, that freedom could never be won nor could the Colonies survive or progress as an independent nation, without an adequate Navy. Thoroughly fitting it is, therefore, to keep alive his memory, and his faith in the Navy, in this atomic era where there has not been evident a recognition of the Navy's part in future wars.

Korea has shown how desperately the military forces of the United States depend upon the Navy. The remarkable dispatch with which the Navy transported to Korea the men and armaments and supplies that alone could stop the Communist onslaught there is directly in keeping with the Navy's highest traditions.

While it was from Philadelphia, his adopted home, that Commodore Barry first demonstrated to the world of his day the exceptional understanding of and aptitude in naval affairs, it is understandable that your neighbors in my own State of Maryland, the home of the great United States Naval Academy, have particular affection for that branch which Commodore Barry did so much to establish and whose early and lasting prestige stemmed largely from his glorious achievements.

It might well be recalled, too, that Commodore Barry was one of the first, if not the first Navy man to join forces with the Army. His services at Trenton while he was temporarily "on the beach," during a period when his ship was unable to put to sea, were a fitting forerunner to the splendid services which members of the Navy and of the Marine Corps have given ashore in many sections of the world, particularly in the amphibious landings of World War II.

On a day devoted to honoring the Navy as a bulwark of our country, it seems appropriate to consider some phases of America's security which are uppermost in the minds of citizens today.

Many threats to national security have arisen since Commodore Barry first offered his services in the defense of his adopted country against the powerful attacks of foreign sea forces. But that there has never been, at any time, the danger to national security both from within and without that there is today is demonstrably clear.

On the world front a mighty dictatorship, ruling from Russia, and controlling one-third of the world's population, is seeking by force of arms, and by the most clever and unscrupulous methods of infiltration, to extend to other lands and other peoples its enslaving control. Within the borders of the United States, and just as immediately pressing, is the threat to our internal security, a threat likewise stemming from the Kremlin; devised, nurtured, and directed by the most accomplished group of propagandists, spies, and saboteurs ever unleashed upon the world.

One of the immutable laws of nature, experience teaches, is that everything must be in balance. The world is in balance with the universe which surrounds it. And in this world, for every advantage or benefit which is enjoyed, there usually is a corresponding disadvantage to be suffered. Consider our own great country, for instance. Nothing like it has ever been devised in world history. No other people ever enjoyed the freedoms, the opportunities, the advantages and benefits of citizenship possessed by all in the United States.

Yet those very freedoms which are praised so highly, and which are "Columbia's proud boast" to all the world, render the United States particularly susceptible to attacks from both without and within.

The dictator states, to the dismay of the whole free world, have proven their ability to wage war successfully and devastatingly. When a dictator decides that a certain thing needs to be done, he simply orders it done. Ruthlessly he brushes aside consideration of the rights or even of the lives of the people involved—his own subjects or those to be conquered. To the dictator there are no individual rights. To him individuals are expendable; they are mere chattels of the State.

In a nation of freedom such as ours, however, war cannot be carried out with anything like the brutal efficiency the dictators can employ. The liberties, which our citizens are guaranteed, must be zealously guarded. Their right to freedom of speech, to criticize, and even to oppose policies which the heads of our country consider necessary, must ever be upheld.

Recent events throughout the world have clearly outlined the pattern of aggression which is looming over the entire world. We see it unmistakably in Korea, where hundreds of thousands of non-Russians are being sacrificed in a needless, unjust war under the guise of Korean nationalism, but actually to further Communist imperialism.

In our own country there is clear and brazen evidence of an intent by a foreign power to undermine American institutions as has been done in nations in Europe and Asia. Foreign agents have come here in droves to spy, to propagandize, to mislead our people into the belief that they would be better off under the Communist form of government. So clear is the pattern of such aggression in Europe and Asia, so well defined are the subversive procedures, that one would be more than foolish not to appreciate that present Communist infiltration activities are intended simply as a prelude to the day when Communist forces hope and plan to take over and rule by force.

In such circumstances, therefore, it would seem that any prudent people would take the steps enabling them to combat successfully both the open and hidden aggression against us. Make no mistake about it, though, it is a difficult assignment that faces our Nation if it is adequately to prepare itself to withstand communism's assaults.

In all truth it must be admitted, however, costly as it is, and despite the mounting American casualty lists, the Communist-inspired Korean incident may well be a blessing in disguise.

Already it has shown up the inadequacies of United States Armed Forces in several respects. Already it has given our military leaders an insight into the type of aggression that they will be called upon to face in other sections of the world if and when the Moscow leadership decides that the time is ripe for an all-out bid for world domination.

Anyone conversant with the military situation in the United States would have to admit that, had Russia launched a full-scale offensive months ago in western Europe, the United States would have been hard put to find the manpower and the firepower to stop it. Korea has simply afforded a bit of a breathing space. It has shown up weaknesses and prompt steps are being taken to eradicate them.

For instance, Russian-made tanks in Korea have pointed up the undiminished importance of the tank in warfare, and the necessity of having tanks in being, in quantities, rather than on the drawing boards. The United States did not have them in readiness when the Korean attack struck, but thanks to American productive ingenuity they will be rolling off the assembly lines shortly and they will be far better tanks because of what Russia has shown us in Korea.

For the Navy, particularly, planning for the future has been drastically revised as a result of lessons learned in Korea. Where would the hard-pressed UN forces, tenaciously fighting to retain their foothold there, be without the support of Navy airpower from the carriers which responded so speedily to the alarm? Global warfare, it has been clearly shown, still reserves a vital sphere of action for carrier-based air power. And pilots of the United States Navy, it can be taken for granted, will, by their gallant exploits in the air, add new glory to the service which Commodore Barry served so well on the Seven Seas.

There is another side to this security picture, however, with which some of you may not be as thoroughly familiar as you are with Navy affairs. I have been living with it as a member of the Senate committee which considers matters of espionage, immigration, and other activities of aliens within our midst. For those alien activities, coupled with the military aggression which Russia is so busily preparing, comprise a double-barreled danger to American security.

From the intimate knowledge gained as to the activities being carried on by Communist agents and under Communist direction throughout the United States, it is my sincere conviction that America must strengthen its internal security to avoid following in the footsteps of Poland and Czechoslovakia and other countries which have succumbed to Soviet pressure and now are slaves of Communist masters.

Nevertheless, there are some who still insist, despite all that we know about Communist methods and activities here and abroad, that we must not "be too hard" upon these disloyal citizens or their alien instigators.

Many persons—and there is clear evidence that Communists are instigating and supporting such protests—have thrown up their hands in horror at the danger of "thought control" as a result of the proposed legislative measures. Let me say there will be no thought control in America as long as common sense rules our Nation; no thought control unless we fail to take proper measures and the Communists take over. Then we will have not only thought control, but we will have slavery and injustice worse than our forefathers knew it when they fled the countries of Europe to come here and found this new nation of freedom. But additional legislation must be passed containing real sanctions and with teeth to prevent and to punish subversive acts against our Nation—acts as deadly to freedom and liberty as an assault on the battle front.

As part and parcel of the Communist bid for world supremacy you will read and hear much, beginning next week, when the United Nations General Assembly convenes, of Russia's efforts to force seating of Communist China's representatives in the United Nations. I say to you that it would be a great tragedy for the world at this time if Russia were successful in these efforts.

What respect could the smaller nations of the world have for the United Nations if a powerful, aggressive nation like Russia could bring about the overthrow of an independent government, set up its own puppet government there, and then force the admission of that puppet government into the United Nations? Not only would the United Nations decline sharply in prestige but its power for good, its activities for establishing peace throughout the world, would be negated in that Russia would gain another supporter to bolster the efforts which she has pursued so consistently to prevent any just settlement of pending world affairs.

No doubt some of our people are struck with confusion sometimes as they try to figure out why dictators like Stalin and Hitler single our country out as the major target of their abuse and their attacks. Is it simply envy of America's material wealth? No; I believe not. They see the advantages our people enjoy and they know their subjects can never be kept completely under control as long as America stands as a beacon in the sky, a promise in the heavens to all the downtrodden peoples of the earth. As long as the torch of liberty burns in our land, dictators know that there will be light upon the earth, there will be hope for the oppressed, and with such hope there will be incentive to rise against the oppressor.

By our very nature, by the consecrated blood of our forefathers who established this land of freedom, we are the moral enemy of all tyranny. We are the moral opponents of any nation or any dictatorship which sets itself up as master of mankind.

For it is our national faith that men shall be free, and not be slaves; that they shall be equal before one another as they are equal in the sight of God, and not be subservient to false godheads of military might or political expediency.

We are the spiritual antagonists of racial hatreds and religious intolerance. And with these moral enmities come responsibilities which America has no right, or wish, to escape.

Even if we did wish it, America could not help being the symbol of world-wide hope. We have been just that for 300 years. It was to the New World that the victims of old oppressions began to look. It was to the North American colonies that experimenters in workable democracy first came and set up constitutional responsive governments.

It was on this continent that the first great and enduring union of free peoples was instituted. And it was to this country that the fugitives from aggressors migrated in search of what they could not obtain at home. Small wonder it is if the eyes of Europe still turn west—the people looking with longing, the dictators with loathing.

Having gathered into their hands almost incredible power, the enemies of civilization now confront us with defiant confidence while they predict, and do their best in subtle ways to bring about, the destruction of our liberties and our way of life. It is in the face of such dire contingencies that our people watch and wait, speeding with all their energies further preparations for defense while they wait.

As we stand today, therefore, in respectful and admiring tribute to one of the great naval heroes and geniuses of our history, let me emphasize once more America's pride in her Navy and in its men. In intelligence, in training, in courage, and morale the United States Navy is the equal, or superior, of any navy in the world today. While ominous clouds may darken the horizon, while despotism seeks unceasingly to undo the marvelous magic of government which our forefathers established in 1776, there is no cause for gloom, no reason for despair.

Free men will ever rise to sublime heights in defense of their homes and firesides. The future still belongs to valiant hearts and stanch arms. While the flame of liberty burns bright within our breasts, while freedoms and opportunities such as ours are the heritage of brave men and women, we will retain that legacy which our forefathers won and bequeathed to us.

We, of this generation, will keep faith with Commodore Barry and that gallant host of loyal Americans whose deeds have made our world the haven it is today. We will preserve the Nation they founded, and we will pass on to our descendants the same democratic form of government, and the same individual liberty and freedom which always have been and, God willing, always will be the heritage of the American people.

Legal Aid

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask that a short talk which I delivered this noon on the subject of legal aid, before the legal aid section of the American Bar Association, in session at the Mayflower Hotel, in Washington, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, we spend millions so that in Europe and the rest of the world the minds of men will be able to reason and think rationally. And will be able to appreciate the great ideas we believe in.

Let us never forget the ideas of communism know no iron curtain. Here in our beloved America they strike hard and often. We must see to it that the minds of America are immunized so that the isms of Russia cannot here get a foothold.

We have more wealth per capita in this country than was ever attained before in any nation of the earth. We have the highest standard of living ever attained by any nation on this globe. We have the greatest amount of personal freedom, and no nation ever before presented more opportunities for its citizens.

Does that mean that we have arrived, and that there is no more opportunity for development, for growth. Of course it does not.

As we measure history we know that we are only a few thousand years away from the caveman, and yet in that march of the centuries we on this continent have attained the highest standard of living, with more of the good things for the individual and for the race than ever before attained by man.

All this is due in large part because of the system in which we live. It is a system where liberty prevails, where man has the largest amount of real freedom. The system that we have arises out of three great facts—our religious concept under the Judaic-Christian religion, our political concept which is the result of our Constitution with its checks and balances, and our economic concept called the American way or the way of free enterprise.

All of these great ideas have been tremendous factors in pushing this people forward to the place of leadership where we are.

The millennium, however, is not here. We have problems due to the fact that individuals create these problems. The rule or the principle if followed, as outlined in these three great ideas, would do away with the problems, but we are constantly breaking these principles.

When the individual commits an offense against his Maker or against society, he is making himself less adequate and thus he contributes toward the creation of a problem, just the same as if one in seeking to get at the right result in mathematics were to multiply two times two and make seven, he would never get the right answer. Now, we don't try to abolish the principles of mathematics when someone makes a mistake; we try to correct the mistake by correcting the individual who makes it.

THE ANSWER TO SOCIALIZED LEGAL PROFESSION IS THE NEW JERSEY LEGAL AID PROGRAM

It has been said that nearly 8 persons out of every 1,000 in the United States are unable to pay for legal assistance which they need. In a good many of the States the bar association has carried on an active program of legal-aid promotion. In the larger cities the problem has been met by establishment of a community law office open to anyone who cannot pay a lawyer's fee. This office is taken care of by the local Community Chest. We feel this is needed because a man who believes he has suffered an injustice through inability to get a lawyer is an easy convert for the isms from abroad.

In other words, justice is not for the rich man only, justice is for all. The tools of justice must not be denied anyone.

The people who need to make contact between our system of justice and themselves are those who cannot pay for legal service; therefore, when they get this service, a new understanding of the lawyer, what he stands for and what he does comes into being, and, of course, when you have legal aid it creates an improvement in the public relations of the bar.

A legal-aid office in the city helps the businessman, the welfare worker, the retailer, the merchant; in fact, everybody.

The Chief Justice of the United States has said:

"Legal aid should not only exist in the cities; it should be extended to every part of this country to protect the rights of those who cannot protect themselves." Former Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes endorsed it as have countless others.

As a former practicing lawyer and as a member of the American bar, I know the importance to the individual who needs this aid; I know the importance of this matter to the community and of its importance to the legal profession—I refer to the sponsoring of legal aid as a private enterprise available to every needy citizen of the State.

Full Employment a Mockery—Copper Shortage Plagues Defense Efforts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is sad to note that failure of the United States Senate to suspend the import tax on copper is hampering the efforts of patriotic men and women to make a real contribution to the defense program of this Nation.

Action stemming from my bill, H. R. 7151, resulted in House passage of the tax suspension; unfortunately, the Senate Finance Committee completely disregarded the needs of our Nation by tabling this legislation.

With increased production in our brass and copper fabricating industries necessary for military reasons, cut-backs are now being made because of a copper shortage. Opponents of H. R. 7151 stated over and over again that there was a sufficient supply of domestic copper to meet our needs for both military and civilian requirements. Now we find that less than 3 months after reimposition of the tax a shortage already exists. Workers are being laid off and brass companies are curtailing production. This is a very real problem to communities like Waterbury, Ansonia, Bristol, Torrington, and Bridgeport in Connecticut, as many thousands of their citizens depend upon these industries for their livelihood. It is a very real problem also to our fighting men in Korea who depend upon an unbroken supply line to bring about an early victory.

The short-sighted legislators who brought about these conditions must answer to their consciences for the damage they have wrought.

The following editorials and news items from Connecticut newspapers portray vividly the effects of a continuing copper shortage:

[From the Waterbury (Conn.) Republican of September 16, 1950]

ABC CASTING SHOP'S WORKWEEK SLICED—ON 4 DAYS DUE TO COPPER SHORTAGE; SCOVILL, CHASE HIT

Approximately 150 employees in the casting shop of the American Brass Co. had their workweek reduced to 4 days this week because of a shortage of copper, the company disclosed yesterday.

A spokesman for the ABC said the 32-hour workweek schedule will remain in effect for the casting shop next week. He said the shortage of copper may mean shorter hours for other departments eventually,

Similar curtailments appeared to be in store at the Scovill Manufacturing Co. and the Chase Brass & Copper Co. All of the firms recently cut out overtime work because of the copper shortage, and curtailments below the normal workweek appeared likely.

At the Scovill Manufacturing Co., a spokesman said there was a possibility of a curtailment. He said no action had been taken as yet, but the hours in the casting shop may be curtailed in the very near future.

At the Chase Brass, stewards of the CIO Progressive Metalworkers Council said they had heard from company officials that 81 probationary employees will be dropped at the metal works plant and operations will be put on a 32-hour basis.

CHASE COMMENTS

Rodney Chase, vice president in charge of industrial relations for the Chase company, said he was unable to comment on the stewards' report, which was disclosed by PMC Chairman John J. Driscoll. He confirmed, however, that there may be lay-offs. "When we don't have enough, as we fear we won't, we simply won't have work," he commented.

Driscoll reported that the union has been advised by managements of the big three brass plants of pending manpower reductions. He said he has wired to Senator BRIEN MCMAHON and the National Security Resources Board, advising them of the serious effects on manpower here, caused by the copper shortage.

OTHER LAY-OFFS

ROME, N. Y., September 15.—Two copper processing plants today laid off workers and two others said labor curtailments could be expected unless a shortage of raw materials is cased.

General Cable Corp., said that about 500 of its 2,500 workers were furloughed today when copper stocks were depleted. Plant Manager F. Y. Kreimendahl said he hoped the employees could be recalled on Monday.

The Rome division of Revere Copper and Brass, Inc., said it laid off about 75 casting shop workers. The plant employs about 2,000.

Revere, on August 18, announced it was forced to cut its 6-day production schedule to 5 days due to the shortage.

Plant officials have blamed a growing shortage in the copper market on failure of the Senate to act on a bill continuing the suspension of a 2 cents a pound import tax. Customer demands have continued high, they add.

Rome Cable Corp. said it was "operating on the basis of what (stock) we have," according to A. D. Ross Fraser, president. The Spargo Wire Co. faces a "small cut-back" on Monday, James A. Spargo, president, said.

BRASS FIRMS FORCE TO CUT WORK WEEK

Work-week reductions from five to four days were ordered for 150 casting shop employees at the American Brass Co. plant this week, the company disclosed last night.

Curtailments were also reported by the Scovill Manufacturing Co. and the Chase Brass & Copper Co., which recently cut out overtime work because of the copper shortage.

A spokesman for the ABC said the 32-hour work-week schedule will remain in effect for the casting shop next week. He said the shortage of copper may mean shorter hours for other departments eventually.

At the Scovill Manufacturing Co., a spokesman said there was "a possibility" of a curtailment. He said no action had been taken as yet, but the hours in the casting shop may be curtailed in the very near future.

At the Chase Brass, stewards of the CIO Progressive Metalworkers Council said they had heard from company officials that 81 probationary employees will be dropped at the metal works plant and operations will be put on a 32-hour basis.

THE COPPER TARIFF

The Nation is at war but in brass industries in Conecticut, lay-offs are imminent.

There is a shortage of copper.

Goods manufactured in these industries are the sinews of war, and if the Nation is to arm itself to the extent outlined as necessary by President Truman, there will be still greater need for their products.

Yet, thanks to the obstinacy of Senators from our copper-producing States, a new suspension of the tariff on copper imports is blocked.

Men may be laid off because there isn't enough copper in the country. Our copper-producing States are producing copper, and there is no question but that they are getting a fair price for it at the mines. In these days when the Nation is arming for defense and already engaged in war in far off Asia, there is no defense for the 2-cent duty on foreign copper. In fact the sons of some of those who are fighting to keep that impost may find themselves lacking the proper implements of battle. The House has already voted repeal of the tariff. It is in the Senate that it is being held up. The President is on the record as favoring the lifting of the copper impost. It is high time for the Senators from the copper States to pry themselves loose from an unrealistic and myopic pattern that may seriously hamper America's effort to defend itself.

Of course, there are, perhaps, other factors, besides the copper tariff, involved. There may be some Government stockpiling that is making the supply short. Or there may be some hold-up, somewhere, for speculation, which should be looked into. But the fact remains that renewal of the copper import duty suspension would do much to end a sorry situation.

[From the Waterbury (Conn.) Republican of September 19, 1950]

HOARDING COPPER

Anybody who tries to corner the copper market can now be fined $10,000 or put in prison for a year—anybody, that is except United States Senators who promote the cornering of the copper market by voting to maintain a prohibitive import duty on copper.

The Commerce Department, under powers granted it by Congress, has put copper on the list of commodities that can't be hoarded. Hoarding copper can now be an offense punishable by a year in prison and a fine of $10,000. The Commerce Department has acted wisely.

Like steel, rubber, tin, cement, lumber, and a number of other commodities, copper is vital to security at this time because an unobstructed supply is essential for defense production.

Yet the same Congress that gave the Commerce Department the authority to put copper on the no-hoarding list has been doing everything possible to make it difficult for copper-using industries to get the supply they need.

As a result the casting shops in the Naugatuck Valley brass industries which ought to be working overtime have had to cut their workweek to 4 days in some cases.

This is because American mines don't produce enough copper for American industrial consumption and because Congress insists on blocking copper imports by maintaining a $40-a-ton import duty.

The Members of Congress who have been blocking copper imports must have felt pretty funny about giving the Commerce Department authority to ban the hoarding of copper. These Members of Congress which have been fighting to maintain the $40-a-ton tariff are really in favor of hoarding copper. They are trying to make it scarce. They want the price to go up, and they make no bones about saying so. They don't care whether their action adds hugely to the Nation's defense costs—which it most certainly will.

To be consistent at this point, Congress should either demand that copper be stricken from the list of critical commodities that shouldn't be hoarded or vote unanimously to remove the import tariff.

It isn't fair to make an ordinary individual punishable by a $10,000 fine for trying to corner the copper market when a United States Senator who is using his congressional position to help bring about just such a cornering of the market gets away scott free.

International Information and Educational Exchange Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement made by my colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], on the subject of the international information and educational exchange program.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT

I was greatly pleased when the Senate Appropriations Committee restored the cuts made by the House Appropriations Committee in the State Department's budget request for its international information and educational exchange program. I respectfully invite attention to the letter I wrote Chairman McKELLAR urging this restoration. Further, I invite attention to a brief analysis which I have prepared, a statement of facts, on the impact of the cuts in the budget as to which the conference committee largely upheld the House position instead of the Senate position. I deeply regret this action by the conference committee and I think this is an example of an instance where the Congress is pennywise and pound foolish. At the same time we are appropriating billions for armaments, we are cutting back on proposed activities which are a necessary adjunct to our military power.

INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAM

STATEMENT OF FACTS

In April of this year the President directed the Secretary of State to plan a stronger and more effective national effort to mobilize the power of truth in defense of peace and freedom.

To that end the President submitted a supplemental estimate in the total amount of $97,212,000 to provide for an intensification of the International Information and Educational Exchange Program in certain areas of the world where the threat of Communist aggression is of critical concern to the national interests of the United States. The President emphasized at that time that he regarded "such an expanded campaign of truth as vital to our national security," and that "we will never attain real security until people everywhere recognize that the free nations of the world are the true seekers of permanent peace." Of this total amount of $97,200,000, the Department of State estimated that approximately $15,200,000 could be expended from available ECA counterpart funds.

The House approved the entire amount of the supplemental estimate submitted by the Department for the radio-broadcasting program (the Voice of America) in the amount of $48,890,000, including the sum of $41,288,000 for the construction of new facilities. The Department's estimate for the press and publications activity was reduced in the amount of $25,894; and the estimate for the motion-pictures program was reduced from $11,017,833 to $10,000,000. Thus the total for information program activities, apart from overseas missions, domestic services, and administrative support, was reduced from $64,633,727 to $63,590,000, or about 1.6 percent.

The Department's estimate for educational exchange program activities was reduced from $18,834,664 to $5,000,000, or approximately 73.5 percent.

Specifically the supplemental estimate for information centers was reduced from $6,078,664 to $2,000,000, or approximately 69.1 percent. This activity, as planned by the Department of State, contemplated not only the operation and maintenance of United States libraries, but also the establishment in the Eastern Hemisphere of American centers similar to those which have been operated with singular success in the American Republics for the past decade. It was also proposed under this program to step up the translation into foreign languages of significant American books, and to provide also for expansion of the extension services of the libraries by which loan collections are made available to peoples in rural areas. In other words, it was the Department's intention to gear this activity into the world situation as an effective complement to the information program. There is ample evidence of the contribution which could be made by this type of activity to the foreign policy of the United States, provided it is conducted on a scale commensurate with demands of the present world situation.

The supplemental estimate for exchange of persons was reduced from $12,756,000 to $3,000,000, or approximately 76.5 percent. A significant part of the supplemental estimate was intended to bring to the United States foreign leaders of thought and opinion, and to provide additional dollar support to the Fulbright program in order to assure maximum utilization of foreign currencies available under Public Law 584, Seventy-ninth Congress.

The Senate Appropriations Committee, after hearing testimony by officers of the Department, recommended approval of the full amount of the budget estimate of $97,212,000, or an increase of $19,344,150 over the House bill, on the understanding that the Department may be able to use $19,600,000 in counterpart funds instead of the amount of $15,212,000 originally estimated. Thus the Senate committee has recommended a dollar appropriation of $77,612,000 and authority to use $19,600,000 in counterpart funds.

The conference committee recommended restoration of $1,000,000 over the House figure for exchange of persons and an additional $200,000 for the information centers activity, including libraries and related activities as outlined hereinabove. The action of the Senate, had it been sustained, would have resulted in an educational-exchange program calculated to make a truly significant contribution to the Department's foreign policy and to the containment of Communist aggression.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1950.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR McKELLAR: I very much appreciate the invitation from your committee to testify today on the proposed information program of the State Department. The pressures on the committee are very heavy, however, as Congress works toward adjournment, and instead of taking your time with personal testimony—particularly in view of the fact that my views on this subject are well known—I request that you insert this letter in the record. I write it only as a reminder to your committee that in my view it is imperative to provide the State Department with the funds it has requested for its so-called Voice of America program.

The truth is that I wish the State Department now felt itself staffed for an even more rapid expansion in this crucial area of our foreign policy. The Department's requests for funds which you are now considering were prepared before Korea. Before the Korean outbreak, the State Department had sought approval to submit a budget some 50 percent larger than the eighty-nine million request you are now considering. The House Appropriations Committee acted unwisely in cutting back a budget which was already inadequate.

I know I need not remind you that there are many experienced observers who feel that the question of war or peace in the next few months may depend upon our success in answering the Russian propaganda and in projecting to the people of the world the fact that we in the United States are deeply and genuinely interested in their welfare.

As you know, the House Appropriations Committee approved the requests for funds for radio but cut way back on what it deemed to be the longer range types of activities such as the exchange of persons and libraries. I do not accept the premise upon which this decision rests, and I hope your committee will also reject it. The broadcasting has had the publicity and it has the greatest allure, but it may take us 18 months to build the radio stations and years longer to develop highly successful programs and to teach people to listen to them. The exchange of persons, however, can operate almost at once. Further, it is a tried and true method. The same is true of the libraries which cost little. Further, as I learned while I was in the State Department, although the libraries aren't spectacular, they do a big job.

I urge upon your committee the restoration of the funds requested by the Department and cut by the House Appropriations Committee. There is no money requested for our present world-wide effort more important than this. The safety of the United States depends on our learning how to do the job in this field which must be done. I am only sorry that since the Korean outbreak the State Department has not developed even bolder plans on a far wider scale.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON,
United States Senate.

Address by Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson, Governor of the State of Illinois, Before the American Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excellent address delivered by Hon. Adlai E. Stevenson, Governor of the State of Illinois, at the annual meeting of the American Bar Association, section on criminal law, Washington, D. C., on September 19, 1950, preceded by the introductory remarks of Hon. Arthur J. Freund, of St. Louis, Mo.

There being no objection, the address and introduction were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF ARTHUR J. FREUND

We are here today to discuss one of the most important and one of the most perplexing problems which confronts our national interests—the menace of organized crime. For organized crime in our democratic government threatens the very existence of a free people. If subversive groups in powerful places weaken the foundations of our Republic; if they can corrupt the courts, defile our prosecutions, control our police departments and law enforcement agencies to their evil purposes, and thereby collapse our administration of justice, then there is small hope for the endurance of a system where all men are equal under law.

Organized crime has been defined by the California Crime Commission as follows:

"Simply stated, organized crime is what the term implies. It's the activity of a group of persons working together for the express purpose of more effectively accomplishing criminal acts against society. By organizing, criminals are able to secure greater immunity from the law, a wider field for operations, a monopolistic control over specific types of criminal activity, and, of course, greater profits. The emergence and development during the past 20 years of criminal syndicates extending throughout our entire country is recognized by criminologists (and, I might add, by our statesmen, our bench, bar, and law enforcement agencies) as the most threatening, and the least understood feature of our national crime problem."

Organized crime flourishes, in greater or less degrees, in all parts of our country. Syndicates and groups of criminals, often in silk shirts and nylon underwear, always in cooperation with hoodlums and gangster killers, conduct illegal operations in a large number of our States from northern New York, through Mississippi to the tip of Florida, through our Midwestern States of Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri, to Louisiana and spreading across our plains and mountains to the Pacific coast.

Organized crime cannot exist successfully where there is honest, fearless and intelligent State and local law enforcement. Gambling and rackets, which impose a cruel and illegal levy on various legitimate types of business, require for their continued existence some form of illegal liaison with those who have sworn to uphold the law.

I have seen, for instance, in my neighboring State of Illinois, a cesspool of crime and corruption for over a quarter of a century, existing under good Governors and bad ones. We now have with us one of the most able and forthright governors that State has ever had, Gov. Adlai E. Stevenson, but I suspect he will tell you that with all he has done, conditions are not satisfactory. I have seen it happen and I see it happening in my own State of Missouri—I have seen it happen in many other places in America.

But it is quite obvious that the problem is one of such national proportions and such national danger that some effective legislation must be enacted by the Congress. The mere passage of a law does not eliminate an evil, but there are measures which can be taken and I hope will be taken to deal with this subject and can do much to stifle this menace which confronts all of our people. We have the distinguished Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable J. Howard McGrath, to express his views and the Senator from Tennessee, the Honorable ESTES KEFAUVER, who more than any one man in our national life has focused national attention on this subject. This section of criminal law and the American Bar Association as a whole stands ready to give the full power of its support and effort to eliminate this horrifying evil of the menace of organized crime which confronts us.

ADDRESS OF GOV. ADLAI E. STEVENSON

A few months ago the Illinois State police, acting upon my orders, launched a program of raiding notorious gambling establishments throughout the State.

This action was widely heralded as a "crackdown" against commercialized gambling in Illinois. But it wasn't only a crackdown. It was a breakdown as well—the breakdown of local law enforcement, the breakdown of decency in government in many parts of the State, the triumph of greed, corruption, and, perhaps worst of all, cynicism.

In ordering these raids, I did not feel the joyful exhilaration of a knight in shining armor tilting with the forces of darkness. I felt more like a mourner at a wake. For something had died in Illinois—at least temporarily. And what has happened in Illinois is by no means unique. The positive leadership of Attorney General McGrath, the formation of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, under Senator KEFAUVER's able and effective leadership, as well as the fact that you have chosen this subject for your annual meeting, indicates that organized commercialized crime is in reality a menace throughout the country.

I was not, I repeat, happy about the State police raids in Illinois. They were a last resort. In Illinois, as in most States, the enforcement of the general criminal laws traditionally has been a local matter, with responsibility resting squarely upon local officials—the county sheriff and State's attorney, and the mayors and city police. That is as it should be. Government should be as small in scope and as local in character as possible. And, if all local officials in Illinois had done their sworn duty, as many of them have, there would have been no occasion to use the State police.

But almost from the moment I took office I was besieged by urgent requests from outraged citizens who complained that open gambling and other forms of vice were rampant in their communities, and that they could secure no action from local officials. I was reluctant to use the State police, despite insistent demands. For over a year prior to the first raids, Attorney General Elliott and I attempted to stop commercialized gambling by several methods. We found direct talks with local officials of offending counties and personal persuasion the most effective method. The local authorities cooperated with us in many cases. In others we were successful only temporarily, or in part, or not at all. On the whole, however, the results were reassuring, and commercialized gambling dried up in many counties.

But, even after these conferences, some local officers failed to act. Hence the raids by the State police. The evidence obtained by the police is turned over to local prosecuting authorities. They can no longer claim to be ignorant of the existence of organized gambling in their counties or that they have been unable to obtain evidence upon which to base a prosecution. The evidence is there. If these officers fail to do their duty now, they must answer to the people, and, if nothing happens, it is the people's own fault, because the people are stronger than the gamblers or any other criminal element.

Our campaign against commercialized gambling has resulted in what the St. Louis Post-Dispatch referred to the other day as a "new kind of payoff"—the payoff of success, of new and increased respect for law enforcement, the payoff of the satisfaction which every decent citizen can take in the fact that commercialized gambling, with all of its poisonous effects upon the quality of local government, is at its lowest ebb in Illinois. As evidence of this change, the collector of internal revenue for the central and southern Illinois counties reports that Federal tax stamps for gambling devices have declined 40 percent in 1 year.

Some people have urged that the State take over the enforcement of the criminal laws, and that the State police should make wholesale raids and arrests. Apart from any constitutional and legal considerations involved, I have three objections to this, at least so far as our situation in Illinois is concerned.

First, the State does not now have the resources to assume this responsibility. Our State police force has its hands full patrolling the highways, enforcing traffic laws, and cracking down on overweight trucks—in other words, in performing the functions for which it was primarily intended. Second, the use of State officers to enforce the general criminal law when local officers are already charged with that responsibility would mean that the public would be paying for law enforcement twice—and this at a time when both State and local governments need more revenue, and the public is demanding economy in government. The third and most fundamental objection is that such a move would be one more step in the abdication of local governmental responsibility, one more example of the growing and dangerous tendency to look to higher levels of government for the solution of problems that could and should be solved closer to home.

For the State to take over local police powers seems to me a dangerous acknowledgment of the failure of local government. But organized crime with its attendant corruption and corroding disrespect for law enforcement is even more dangerous, and, if local government cannot or will not meet the challenge, the people will demand and receive help from other levels of government, just as they have demanded and received other services which were not provided on the local level.

But, whatever our views as to who should enforce the laws, we are, I take it, all agreed that law enforcement can and must be improved. What are some of the obstacles to better law enforcement, and what are some of the things that can be done to improve it?

Securing better personnel is part of the answer, but only part. Crime and politics must be divorced.

Police forces, on whatever level of government, must be severed from partisan political control.

In Illinois one of the first things I asked from the legislature was the removal of the State police from politics—and we now have a force which functions under a merit system. The old system was intolerably expensive and inefficient. Every time the governor's office changed political complexion, virtually the whole police force of 500 was discharged and a new one of the proper political faith recruited and trained, only to go out when the State changed its politics again. And it is obvious that a man cannot be a good police officer and owe a greater measure of loyalty to his political sponsor than to his superior officer.

But safeguarding against political interference does not in itself guarantee a competent police force. And the fact that a man is honest doesn't necessarily make him a good policeman. Amateur crime detectors can't cope with the professional criminals of today. We need more police forces that are truly professional in the best sense of that term. Recruiting and training practices must be improved. We have made progress along these lines under our new merit system in Illinois, too, and hope to make more.

And our police must be paid adequate salaries—salaries that are not an invitation to graft and corruption. In many of our larger Illinois cities, policemen have not had a salary raise for several years, despite skyrocketing living costs. Here again, this salary problem is tied up with the pressing need of local governments for more revenue, thus emphasizing the interdependence of so many of our governmental problems.

Another thing we can do to improve the quality of law enforcement is to reexamine our entire law enforcement structure. Obsolescence and duplication present formidable obstacles to efficient law enforcement, and diffusion of authority makes it difficult to fix responsibility. Where responsibility cannot be fixed, public opinion has no chance to operate effectively, and the democratic process is weakened.

The basic pattern of our law enforcement structure is an inheritance from a bygone day. To this, some latter-day accretions have been added more or less haphazardly. In some instances, State, county, and municipal officers have overlapping or conflicting authority. The duties of the office of sheriff and constable, for example—to say nothing of the coroner—have been largely inherited from medieval England. Some law enforcement officers are so burdened with other unrelated duties that they can give only a fraction of their time to the apprehension or prosecution of criminals. They are, at best, only part-time law enforcement officers. Some elective offices have constitutional or statutory restrictions as to succession, making it impossible for them to be manned by professional career men. I do not say that all of these things are necessarily bad, but I do say that they need to be constantly reexamined in the light of present-day conditions.

Of course, this problem of obsolescence and duplication is not peculiar to our law-enforcement machinery. It is a problem of Government generally, and the Hoover Commission report, followed by the formation of "little Hoover" commissions in approximately one-half of our States, shows that the public is acutely aware of the general problem.

It seems to me that there should be similar studies with a view to improving our law-enforcement machinery. Of course, there have been studies like that in the past, and I am not unmindful of the invaluable work that the organized bar is constantly doing to improve the administration of criminal justice. But there is need for a larger, more comprehensive study, and the problem must somehow or other be dramatized for the public.

Among the questions to which answers should be sought are these:

What should be the respective roles of State and local governments in law enforcement? What controls, if any, should the State have over local law-enforcement officers? Should these controls be direct or indirect? In Illinois, for example, the State's attorney is a county officer, but he is charged with prosecuting violators of State laws, and he receives part of his salary from the State treasury. Yet no State officer exercises any control over him. In some States, although not in my own, the governor may remove any local law-enforcement officer who fails to do his duty; and this has proved to be a most potent instrument for improving local law enforcement. Given some such power, I have little doubt that commercial gambling could be quickly and inexpensively ended in Illinois for keeps.

There is another means for securing good law enforcement which appears to me to have been too little used—and that is the weapon of disbarment. In Illinois, for example, I should say that it represents as effective an instrument as we have for disciplining attorneys who hold law-enforcement positions. This is, of course, an area where the organized bar can be of the greatest help, and I was greatly interested in the action of the Illinois State Bar Association a few months ago in filing disbarment proceedings against the State's attorney of a county where organized gambling had been permitted to flourish under a cynical system of periodic fines. I know of no duty more clearly comprehended within our obligations as members of this profession than to live up to our oaths of office when we occupy public posts with law-enforcement responsibilities.

What Federal laws should be enacted in aid of State laws? Parenthetically, I am gratified that Congress seems disposed to close the channels of interstate commerce to slot machines and racing information.

To what extent should the functions of investigating and prosecuting be separated? In some States, the prosecuting attorney prosecutes only upon complaint. In other States he is expected to take the initiative in discovering violations of the law. And in many localities the public insists that he conduct investigations but refuses to allow his office to have any investigators. The result is that the average prosecuting attorney must rely for his evidence upon a police force over whose activities he has little, if any, direction.

Combining the functions of investigation and prosecution in one officer may possibly lead to abuses, but this division of authority makes it easy to escape responsibility and encourages "buck passing." We have some counties in Illinois, for example, where the bipartisan approach has been used with singularly devastating effect. The managers of the two parties, in collaboration with the gamblers, see to it that there is always a Republican sheriff and a Democratic State's attorney, or vice versa, with the result that the citizen who wants action is told by the one that it is the responsibility of the other, and is shunted back and forth between them to no purpose whatsoever.

These are only a few of the questions which are worth considering. But the things I've mentioned, however important, are in a sense secondary and superficial. For the greatest obstacles to effective law enforcement are public indifference and cynicism. The greatest menace of organized crime is not the crime itself nor the criminal. The greatest menace is that the public will come to accept organized crime as something inevitable, as a necessary part of our social system.

Cynicism toward law enforcement is as old as government itself. When Solon was writing the laws of Athens, he was told that laws were like spider's webs and would only entangle the poor and the weak, while the rich and powerful would easily break through them. This attitude toward law enforcement has persisted throughout the ages and unfortunately, has not always been without some justification.

But, in a democracy, there is no justification for such helpless cynicism. Nor is there any use to place the entire blame for crime and lax law enforcement upon a real or supposed alliance between criminals and politicians and to assume that the members of the public are helpless bystanders. Organized crime cannot thrive without the active support of many elements of the community, nor without the passive support of many more elements. The respectable businessman who falls for the myth that a wide-open town is good for business is just as effective an accomplice of the criminal as is the politician who seeks to win friends by influencing people. The solid citizen who thinks that illegal slot machines are just fine for his country club but bad for the corner saloon does not realize what difficulties he is making for the persons he has elected to enforce the laws.

Of the 2,700 gambling machines presently registered for Federal tax purposes in 76 Illinois counties, only 800—less than one-third—are in taverns and other public places. The other 1,900 are in the country clubs, the fraternal organizations, the veterans' clubs, the Army posts and other places with which we do not customarily associate law violation, organized or unorganized. I ask you to consider the effect on the public mind, and the vexatious problem of law enforcement through this wholesale violation of the law by the most responsible elements of our communities.

And while we are on the subject of organized crime, let me say that one of the most disheartening things that I have encountered is what might be termed "unorganized crime." One example of this which we have had to battle incessantly and expensively in Illinois is the persistent and flagrant violation of our very liberal laws regulating maximum truck weights on our highways. It appears, I can only conclude, that at least some otherwise reputable businessmen prefer to overload their trucks and pay the occasional and meager fines when they are caught because it pays.

To what point, I inquire, does violation of the laws have to go, or what character does it have to take, before it achieves the status of organized crime? I have a feeling that this category has been a little too exclusive.

This last prompts me to call your attention to something else which is too often lost sight of. The phrase "organized crime" has, in the ears of the average citizen, a horrendous ring and conjures up visions of masked men with tommy guns, bank robberies, murders, and similar high and unspeakable crimes. Our average citizen also feels, probably as a result of this lurid conception, that organized crime does not touch him very closely and is something that can safely be left to the FBI.

Senator KEFAUVER would, I am sure, be very quick to join me in my assurance to you that this is a highly mistaken concept. The most powerful and affluent in the world of organized crime operate in much more prosaic fields and in much less dramatic ways. They move where the money is, and this too often seems to be in such twilight zones as that of gambling where there are prohibitory laws on the books but no unanimity of moral conviction.

The happy hunting ground of organized crime is in the area where too many people are disposed to participate in the breaking of a law. What these people seem not to realize is that the law cannot be broken without the connivance of elected officials, and that open and long-continued violation inevitably means that there is corruption—a payoff in some form or another. And corruption is a cancer which cannot be confined—a public official who has gotten in on the take for one purpose has become a captive and his usefulness as a public servant is largely at an end.

I am new in politics, but I happen to believe in the value and importance of partisan political organization. I think that strong and healthy political parties are essential to our democracy, and I think also that a broader and more active participation in them by all good citizens is one of our greatest needs. But I can understand the discouragement and despair which assails those who find their own party machinery dominated by those who can fight with the aid of money supplied by the gamblers—who can, if you please, buy up all the billboards, bribe or bid highest for the services of election workers, and do all the other seemingly trivial but highly practical things which can snuff out the hopes of decent people in politics.

These are some of the facts of life about the menace of organized crime in a democracy. These are the reasons why the dropping of a 50-cent piece in a slot machine is too often not merely a matter between you and your own conscience or budget. This is why a double standard of law observance is no more feasible in the gambling field than it is in that of burglary.

Law enforcement doesn't exist in a vacuum, and it can't be considered in isolation. The crisis in law enforcement is but one aspect of the crisis of representative government. Good government is indivisible. You can't expect good government in other departments along with dishonest or ineffective law enforcement, and you can't have effective law enforcement without honest, efficient, responsible government all down the line. And I suspect the major problem of our age is whether or not we have enough citizens who are willing to labor unceasingly to achieve good government. Wherever law enforcement continues lax over an extended period of time, it is so only because a large segment of the population does not want effective law enforcement, at least not badly enough to labor for good government as diligently as those who want bad government labor for it.

We speak glibly of the necessity for ending the alliance between crime and politics. But so long as the support of the lawless element of the community is reckoned a more potent political asset than the support of the people who are willing to labor for effective law enforcement, this alliance will be a constant threat.

One of the most disheartening things that any conscientious official has to face is the lethargy and apathy on the part of most of the public. The malicious criticism that is leveled against us doesn't hurt so much. We have come to expect that. Every man in public life knows that his words and deeds will be twisted by knaves to make a snare for fools. The truly disheartening thing is that so many people—people who are neither knaves nor fools—just don't have enough interest, enough sense of civic responsibility, to take the trouble to make their government work better.

The ultimate answer to the menace of organized crime and to the problem of lax law enforcement is public opinion. And, above all, it must be continuously active. Too often public opinion is a sleeping giant. We have already had too many cycles of reform and relapse, too many moral crusades followed by business as usual. Just as our Nation can no longer withdraw into an isolationist shell until some Pearl Harbor stirs us to vigorous action, so we can no longer afford to postpone effective law enforcement until lawlessness becomes a national scandal.

Today there are signs that the public is awakening to the twin menaces of organized crime and corrupt law enforcement. Let us hope this time that it will not be another ephemeral crusade but a true rebirth of citizen responsibility.

Proclamation of Constitution Day by Governor Bowles, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article which appeared in the September 17 issue of the Sunday Herald, of Bridgeport, Conn., concerning the proclamation by Governor Bowles of September 17 as Constitution Day. My colleague notes that it is particularly fitting for our State of Connecticut to take notice of this occasion because it, among all States, had the first written constitution. He asked me to state his belief that our founding fathers planned well, for while the basic tenets of the Federal Constitution have come to be regarded with reverence, the application of its principles has been wisely adapted to the changing times.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSTITUTION DAY PROCLAIMED

Today, the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of the signing of the American Constitution, has been proclaimed Constitution Day by Governor Bowles.

In setting aside today for patriotic observances, Governor Bowles noted that "the Constitution of the United States remains as the one hope of freedom-loving people all over the world and stands as the most solid political guide the world has ever known."

Bowles urged all citizens to take part in appropriate programs to the end "that we, the people who benefit from the Constitution, shall have a better understanding and a greater respect for the gifts of liberty, equality, and justice granted us by the Constitution."

Courage Pays Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Courage Pays Off," published in the Washington Post of September 21, 1950. The editorial deals with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COURAGE PAYS OFF

There may be a most important moral for politicians in the outcome of this week's Maryland primaries. It appears that a regard for decency and courage is not dead among American voters. Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS, who exhibited these qualities conspicuously in his conduct as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee which investigated the McCarthy charges, was renominated by a landslide that gave him more than twice as many votes as the aggregate of his two opponents. Both of these opponents conducted campaigns based principally on criticism of the Senator for his part in what they persisted in calling a "whitewash." Marylanders evidently were not taken in by this tawdry attack.

We think Senator TYDINGS' experience deserves some reflection on the part of Members of Congress who seem to suppose that only the most extravagant vilification can pass for patriotism these days. They show small respect for the intelligence of the electorate; and it is by no means impossible that the sentiment will be reciprocated at the polls. Senator TYDINGS dealt with the McCarthy affair more conscientiously than opportunistically. He and his Democratic colleagues on the subcommittee called a hoax a hoax and forthrightly expressed the disgust which decent men generally felt over Senator MCCARTHY's abuse of his senatorial position. It is heartening to know that the American people can be counted on to save seats in the Senate for men like Senator TYDINGS who are not afraid to say what they think.

Students Warned by Deane Malott

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, the following news report in the Lawrence (Kans.) Journal-World, giving the high lights of an address by the chancelor of the University of Kansas, Deane Malott, so filled with sane, sound Americanism, is worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I include it herewith:

STUDENTS WARNED BY DEANE MALOTT—CHANCELOR LIKENS AMERICAN PATH TO THAT OF ANCIENT ROME—TALKS AT ASSEMBLY

Kansas University's Chancelor Deane W. Malott likened the path of today's American people to that so disastrously followed by the smug and ignorant citizens of ancient Rome in his speech to a convocation audience of about 2,800 in Hoch auditorium this morning.

The chancelor offered education not only in technical and scientific skills but training "in the art of how human beings can live together" as one of the favorable detours from the road we are traveling. The convocation officially opened the university's eighty-fifth year, and Lester McCoy, of Garden City, chairman of the State board of regents, was on hand to welcome the students on behalf of the board. Full-time classwork began at 8 this morning.

PROUDLY ON SEVEN HILLS

"Behind the human ramparts of the Roman legions Rome lived securely and proudly on her seven hills and received tribute from all the world," Chancelor Malott pointed out. "And then, as inexorable as darkness consumes the earth after sunset, the empire crumbled; and Rome fell to the barbarian hordes; Rome fell not because of the triumph of outside force; Rome collapsed spiritually, succumbing to the insidious poison of the idea that the government could do all things for its citizens.

"The long shadow of that fallen empire looms over free America, a greater threat than all the armaments that communism may ever muster," the tall administrator warned.

The chancelor stated that today too many are asking the Federal Government to do for us what our grandparents would have done for themselves, and that Government, under the guise of every major political party, reaches out like an octopus to wrap itself around more and ever more phases of our lives.

"It is the direction of ancient Rome; the implications are clear," Chancelor Malott said emphatically.

"I hope that the voices of the men and women of the University of Kansas may echo the imprint of their education here, saying always that this university has encouraged us to think and act like free men, and we do not propose to surrender the freedom which above all else makes life worth living.

SHOULD WEIGH VALUES

"I hope you will be students of the positive values of America; that you will understand and think about the widening discrepancy between what the theory of democracy requires of its citizens, and what the practice of democracy reveals."

The chancelor opened his talk by stating there is more uncertainty, more concern for the future, more responsibilities for the American people than in any day of the school's 85 years. More and more, education appears to be the main solution to the problems that lie ahead.

Chancelor Malott pointed to the many facilities that university offers to help a person obtain this education, but that those facilities in themselves assure no one of an education. That is up to the individual.

"You may, if you wish, I suspect, remain here during this year, skirting the dangerous academic reefs that lie just beyond the reach of the deans' probation lists, and be little affected by the educational facilities and the education process," the KU head said in an ironic tone.

NO PLACE FOR DRIFTERS

"The world, however, is too sober for academic drifters. The greatest undeveloped territory in the world today lies right under your own head of hair. If you are not interested in developing that territory, we shall not keep you for any great length of time," the speaker added.

The chancelor stated that no other form of government demands such high intelligence, public spirit, or virtue by its citizens as ours. But he quickly added that he feared we are hurrying along to social ends which taken one by one may be desirable as tending to increase human welfare and happiness, but which added together may have sad consequences for human freedom.

"In this troubled period of history no one can predict the future with scientific accuracy. But man's survival depends both upon his intelligence and his faith," the chancelor concluded.

Members of the KU faculty sat on the stage after moving into the auditorium during the processional. The Reverend Harold G. Barr, dean of the school of religion, opened the event with a responsive reading and prayer, and Dean Thomas Gorton of the school of fine arts led the group in a hymn.

Ingersoll's Words

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by E. R. Leigh, of Louisville, Ky.:

INGERSOLL'S WORD

Three-quarters of a century ago Robert G. Ingersoll, for years America's foremost orator, in nominating James G. Blaine for President, stated the qualifications for that office prescribed by Republicans of that day.

He said in part: "They demand a man who will sacredly preserve the financial honor of the United States, one who knows enough to know that the national debt must be paid through the prosperity of this people; one who knows enough to know that all the financial theories in the world cannot redeem a single dollar; one who knows enough to know that all the money must be made, not by law, but by labor; one who knows enough to know that the people of the United States have the industry to make the money and the honor to pay it over just as fast as they make it."

If the great Ingersoll was moved to such words 75 years ago when the Government was operated on a shoestring, what could he say today upon viewing the national debt and budget other than, "abandon hope, all ye who enter here"?

A copy of Ingersoll's words, quaint as they must seem now, should be placed on the desk of every Congressman every time a new budget is considered.

My Report to the Fifth District Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following report to my constituents:

With the completion of my first term in Congress in 1948, I reported to you upon my service; and I have the honor, at this time, to inform you of my activities as your Representative to the Eighty-first Congress, which convened in January of 1949, and whose Members will be succeeded by those elected in November of this year.

Under ordinary circumstances, we would now have adjourned, and it would be possible to report all action taken by this Congress. As this is written, however, we are engaged in a conflict in Korea as a member of the United Nations, and Congress will recess in order to be available for meeting as the need should arise.

I, of course, was a member of the majority in the Republican Congress of 1947–48. In January of 1949 I returned to sit as a minority member in the Democrat-controlled Eighty-first Congress. My assignment to the House Veterans' Affairs Committee continued through the first session. And in January 1950 I was appointed to fill a vacancy on the House Armed Services Committee. Assignment to the Armed Services Committee is much sought after, and I was pleased to have been honored by appointment to this—one of the most important committees of Congress. Later in this report I will discuss in more detail the legislative record of that committee.

On the domestic front, this Congress will be judged as much by what it left undone as it will by the action it took. Even though controlled by the party of the President, it was reluctant to enact many of his recommendations for social legislation—feeling that they were too far-reaching, and not in accordance with the wishes of the people.

In the labor field, Congress enacted a 75-cent minimum wage to replace the 40-cent minimum in effect since 1938; liberalized compensation benefits to Government employees injured or killed in line of duty; and provided pay increases and improved working conditions for post-office employees. I supported all these measures believing them to be necessary and worthy legislation. Congress refused to make changes in the Taft-Hartley labor law although some amendment seemed desirable. It was because of administration insistence that the law be totally repealed that no progress was made in this instance.

Governmental reorganization was the most talked-about and the least done-about reform before Congress. The Hoover Commission recommendations were ignored for the most part. Some reorganization plans submitted by the President were adopted. In some instances, they conformed to the Commission's recommendations; in the main, they were only piecemeal suggestions which neglected the elemental reorganization needs. I supported those plans which followed the Hoover Commission's recommendations and opposed those which did not.

This Congress enacted no legislation of any consequence in the field of civil rights. Some measures which had my support were adopted by the House but failed even to be considered in the Senate. Numbered among these were anti-poll-tax and fair employment practice bills.

Veterans of military service received almost no recognition from the Eighty-first Congress. The only measures of importance which were enacted granted increased payments to disabled veterans; fixed a 3-year presumptive period for arrested tuberculosis cases; and defined more clearly provisions of the educational privileges under the GI bill of rights. Two other bills were passed by Congress but vetoed by the President; these affected veterans in the postal service and provided automobiles for crippled veterans.

Many items of legislation concerning agriculture were adopted by this Congress. Notable among them was the new price-support bill, which has resulted in the tremendous surpluses with which we are all familiar—at a cost which imposes a tax burden upon our citizens. Crop-insurance programs were enacted; the Federal tax on oleomargarine was repealed; increased acreage was allotted, and price supports voted for cotton, tobacco, and peanuts.

Social legislation enacted included Federal housing programs for both low- and moderate-income families and a liberalized social-security system. In this category, also, was the extension of rent control.

Legislation on international affairs continued to be considered in a bipartisan manner. Most measures were enacted with the overwhelming support of members of both political parties. It should be explained, however, that bipartisanship existed only on legislative matters—our foreign policy is established and carried out by the administration in office. I cite this difference so that there may be no confusion as to my complete disagreement with our foreign policy in the Pacific. Bills continuing the European recovery program; financing aid to Greece and Turkey; extending reciprocal-trade agreements; granting military aid to both western Europe and eastern nations; and amending the Displaced Persons Act were approved without substantial opposition.

National defense measures occupy a prominent place in this report because of their very great importance now, and because of my assignment to the Armed Services Committee. I consider myself to be partially responsible for the excellent record of Congress in the field of military preparedness. Our failure to be fully prepared for the invasion of Korea lies with the Defense Department in that Congress approved every request for military spending. Both the Republican Eightieth and the Democratic Eighty-first Congresses authorized a 70-group Air Force, but in each instance the President refused to allocate the funds appropriated for this purpose. Radar and guided missile installations were provided for. The administration of the Central Intelligence Agency was improved, selective service was continued, a ship-construction program was authorized, continuance of the synthetic rubber program was voted as was the authority to search foreign vessels in United States waters. Induction of doctors and dentists into military service was approved. Late in the session Congress approved a measure providing for the registration and control of subversive elements. A supplemental appropriation for the Armed Forces in the amount of approximately $17,000,000,000 was voted to assure victory in Korea. Restrictions on the size of the military services were lifted to assure full support of our forces in Korea. On my recommendation the United States Marine Corps was increased from approximately 65,000 officers and men to 250,000. On the economic front there was enacted legislation giving the President authority to impose price, wage, and rationing controls when he deemed them necessary. An increase in taxes to cover additional military expenditures was also authorized.

The amount of money authorized to be spent in carrying out the functions of the Federal Government for a 2-year period approaches an astronomical figure. A total of about $45,000,000,000 was appropriated by the first session of this Congress, and close to $60,000,000,000 will have been appropriated before the end of the second session. In each instance it will be noted that expenditures exceeded the income of the Government in the collection of taxes from its citizens. Of interest to Connecticut residents is the fact that while you, as taxpayers, make the second highest per capita contribution to the Federal Government, our State ranks second from lowest in the amount returned as Federal benefits. The rate of return approximates 7 percent in contrast to that of some Southern States which reach 120 percent. Over $700,000,000 was paid in Federal taxes by Connecticut citizens last year. Much of your money was used to subsidize industry in the South, which results in a loss of earning power to Connecticut workers, paid for by their own tax payments. Your stake in reducing nonessential Federal expenditures is a large one.

During these 2 years I have personally sponsored legislative measures of interest to citizens of the fifth district. Suspension of the import tax on copper during 1949 was a result of legislation introduced by me. The House in 1950 has again recommended suspension of this tax. Failure of the Senate to act will impose hardships upon our people in the nature of shorter workweeks, higher prices for copper products, and a weakening of our military-preparedness program. Much veterans' legislation was sponsored by me, as was a bill to extend relief of mortgage payments for service personnel for a 12-month period after their release from active duty.

In addition to answering voluminous correspondence on legislative matters, my office has processed thousands of inquiries of a more personal nature relating to compensation claims; national service life insurance dividends; immigration cases; selective-service cases, and others of a varied nature. I have fought for the maintenance of New England's industries—realizing full well that a vast majority of our people depend upon them for their livelihood. I feel strongly that no justification can be made for encouraging our manufacturing facilities to move to the South from New England, and that there has been a complete disregard of our welfare in the excessive and inequitable imports from foreign slave-labor nations in competition with the products of our own workers.

I have reported continually through both the press and radio to you—and I now express my sincere gratitude for the opportunity you have granted me to serve as your representative in Congress.

Statements by Drew Pearson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, on or about February 25, 1950, in the newspaper column which is edited by one Drew Pearson, there appeared certain untruthful statements which have been used more or less by people who had little respect for the dissemination of the truth.

Without going into great detail, with respect to the general standing of Drew Pearson in the minds of the people of the United States, as those details have more or less been expressed by the Chief Executives of this country as well as by many individuals, including Members of the Congress, I wish to submit for the RECORD certain affidavits which completely disprove the slanderous, libelous, and absolutely false statements which were published by said Drew Pearson in the article referred to. I submit these affidavits for the enlightenment of those who have been misled by the untruthful statements made by Drew Pearson:

WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

On this, the 20th day of September A. D. 1950, there personally appeared before me Mrs. Paul O. Peters, of 5825 North Four Mile Drive, Arlington, Va., personally known to me, who deposes and says:

"That she is the mother of Ruth C. Peters, who is employed as secretary in the office of Representative FRED L. CRAWFORD, of the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan; that said daughter, Ruth C. Peters, resides with her at the above-stated address and has so resided since February 1946; and that prior thereto and for the period from January 1943 to February 1946 that the said Ruth C. Peters resided with her mother at 818 North Edgewood Street, Arlington, Va.; that on or about March 15, 1948, said Ruth C. Peters began working for said Representative CRAWFORD in the New House Office Building, Washington, D. C., and that to her certain knowledge at no time prior to March 15, 1948, or subsequent thereto has her daughter, Ruth C. Peters, ever been in the Territory of Alaska, or nearer to that Territory than San Francisco, Calif. Deponent further states that any and all persons who have made the statement that her daughter, Ruth C. Peters, visited Alaska, has, to deponent's certain knowledge misstated the truth; and that this affidavit is made to correct erroneous impressions that might have been gathered as a result of such untruthful statements having been made in the public press, over the radio, or otherwise."

On this, the twentieth day of September A. D. 1950, there personally appeared before me, Charles Apfelbeck, United States Park Police, who deposes and says:

"That my name is Charles Apfelbeck and my official capacity is sergeant in charge of the investigative unit; that I have been with the organization known as the United States Park Police for a period of about 19 years.

"There has been called to my attention a press release entitled, 'Washington Merry-Go-Round' by Drew Pearson, which carries the following language and which refers to 'two Negro boys' who rifled a purse owned by Miss Ruth C. Peters. The article goes on to say, 'The Congressman (referring to Rep. FRED L. CRAWFORD, of Michigan) gave chase, recovered the purse after $15 was stolen, but did not prefer charges. When asked to prefer charges by Sgt. Charles Apfelbeck, he said: "Hell, I can't do anything. You know what the situation is with me."'

"This affidavit is made for the purpose of branding as an absolute falsehood this quotation printed by one Drew Pearson in which he leads the reader to believe that I told said Drew Pearson that Representative CRAWFORD said to me, 'Hell, I can't do anything. You know what the situation is with me.' At no time did Representative CRAWFORD ever make such a statement to me. Mr. CRAWFORD performed his duty by apprehending the boys and placing the police call which brought myself and Porter M Beale into the case. In no way whatever, directly or indirectly, did he ever suggest to me any secrecy with respect to the handling of the case involving the theft of money from Miss Peters' purse. The records of the United States Park Police at Park Police Headquarters are public records and carry the facts of the case. The record shows that the robbery took place on or about 1 p. m. on July 15, 1949, on the driveway which serves Hains Point and directly alongside the public golf course and the picnic grounds on said point, populated at that time of the season by hundreds of people who seek relief from the heat. This affidavit is made to clear the record of the untruthful quotation submitted in said press release by Drew Pearson."

Flow of War Goods to Russia Must Stop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CALEB BOGGS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that I have directed attention to the vast amount of war material which Russia, Red China, and other Communist-controlled countries are receiving from the United States and numerous other non-Communist nations. Neither is it the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have commended the information provided and the action taken by members of labor unions to put an end to this dangerous and unjustifiable flow of warmaking materials to Russia and her satellites.

The President has already chided and criticized these members of organized labor for their actions and position they have taken with respect to the uninterrupted, unrestricted flow of trade with Russia and other Communist countries. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I commend them on the actions, position, and recommendations which they have taken.

Mr. Speaker, as long as American men are fighting and dying in Korea and being prepared to fight in other areas of the world against Communist aggression, I can find absolutely no justification for us knowingly to permit war material to be shipped to Russia and her satellites.

As a part of my remarks I wish to include the very excellent column on this subject by Mr. Victor Riesel entitled "Labor Chiefs Expose Trade With Reds," which appeared in the September 20, 1950, issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Mr. Riesel's article follows:

LABOR CHIEFS EXPOSE TRADE WITH REDS
(By Victor Riesel)

HOUSTON, TEX., September 19.—In a series of private lunches and hotel-room parleys eyewitnesses from across the world have reported that our own allies and even some of our own American merchants and shipowners are taking Soviet gold for a ghoulish profit on sales of rubber, tin, wool for uniforms, steel, steel rails, munitions-making machinery, chemicals, medicines, and cargo space to Russia, Red China, and North Korean agents.

These reports, brought here by global labor leaders, moved AFL Chief William Green to urge the federation's most powerful 700 leaders (gathered here for their sixty-ninth annual convention) to demand a world boycott of all Russian trade.

There can be no doubting this evidence. These men know, for example, that the Chinese Communists have asked the London steel merchants (dominated by the Government) for prices on 50,000 tons of steel rails for Peiping's Red lines along which, even now, Communist troops are being moved to the Korean frontier. And London is ready to sell those rails to the Chinese Stalinists.

But the Chinese need not wait that long for Allied steel. They're getting tens of thousands of tons of Japanese steel from Nyahata in Kyushu in exchange for coal from mines owned by British and Chinese. The British conceal the destinations of the metal—and our military authorities in Japan are now too concerned with Korea to police the delivery of this steel.

Other war materials are moving into Soviet ports by shuttle from Ceylon and Malaya. In that area, as well as Hong Kong, British merchants have openly boasted—and the Labor representatives here can prove it—that they will sell to anyone with gold and American dollars. The Soviets have plenty of both.

From these oriental areas the Soviets are getting at least 50 percent of the rubber supply for their automotive weapons and transport systems. Also tin. And the labor men here say American freighters are especially chartered for the run between these ports of our allies and Soviet docks.

And from big Tom Dougherty, leader of the Australian Workers Union, I have personal evidence that the Russians are buying millions of pounds worth of Australian wool from Aussie brokers. This wool is being woven and cut into millions of Soviet uniforms.

After listening to Bill Green's demand for a boycott of the Soviet similar to that slapped on the Japs and Nazis years ago, Dougherty came off the convention floor and told me he's returning to Australia to demand that his government halt all shipments to Russia and its satellites. If the government rebuffs him, Dougherty will call out on strike the 40,000 members of his huge union who ride the Australian range and process the wool.

Dougherty added that he and his New Zealand colleague, also with us at the moment, would try to influence the entire East to cripple all potential war shipments—and these include oil and aircraft parts to Red China via Hong Kong.

Only the British Labor delegates here seem oblivious to the bitter demand that they force their government to stop dealing with the Soviet. The English attitude is that they must sell machine tools to Russia because there are some things they must get from Russia—and machine tools are the only thing Russia wants in return from the British.

Expert metal workers here say London's claim that only nonstrategic tools are being sent is deceiving nonsense. No machine tool of any kind is without strategic value. I've just been informed by a Midwest industrialist.

And the Australian and New Zealand labor people are determined to put the heat on their British labor colleagues.

As for payment for all this material (except the tools) the Russians have ample dollars and gold, because we ourselves helped them get it.

The dollars come from American purchases of Soviet materials ranging from furs to timber—and these greenbacks are spread through Asia by such outfits as the Soviet controlled Czech Trade Commission which finances Stalinist activity in much of the Orient. The gold comes from Russian mines, now equipped with special digging and refining machinery supplied by us under wartime lend-lease. Nice dividends we're getting—especially for the kids on those Korean hills.

The Home Folks Speak

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a letter which is typical of one school of thought, of an appeal for help where the Congressman at the moment, can give none, reads as follows:

STEVENSVILLE, MICH., September 16, 1950.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: Again, another war is in progress and we are facing another great problem. My son got his papers today and to think they would take the last hand off the farm. I have a son 19 years old; they sure will take him but please spare one of them so we can live. My husband is 67 and I am 57 and a cripple, just released from St. Ann's Hospital in Chicago a month ago. I was there 17 weeks but my leg will never be good.

We have a large hospital and doctor bill; lots of peaches and grapes to harvest, a mortgage on our farm and how are we going to meet this? This boy is also registered but we even can't think of him going to a hospital—no funds.

Dear Mr. CLARE HOFFMAN, our dear Congressman, please do something for us. He has to report to Benton Harbor next week. But we sure need him: he is our sole support. As to our other boy working in the Stevensville lumber yard, if they were not supporting us, we could not make it.

So many peaches and you can't get anything for them. Buy your basket and pay for packing and go to the market and get $2.25 a bushel, but now you are lucky if you get $1.10—what profit.

Please do what you can for me.

Your friend,

Mrs. ANNA SIEROSLAWSKI.

Zaccheus, Come Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, Dr. George M. Docherty, minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church in our Nation's Capital, preached a soul-searching sermon last Sunday that is so universal in its application, and so challenging that I implored him to let me share it with the Congress as well as their friends—all over the Nation—who read the RECORD daily. Dr. Docherty's sermon follows:

ZACCHEUS, COME DOWN

Scripture lesson: St. Luke's Gospel, Chapter 19, verses 1 through 11.

Text: The Book of Joshua, chapter 24, verse 15: "And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom you will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

The story of Zaccheus is not simply the tale of the little Publican who climbed a sycamore tree to see the Lord Jesus pass by through Jericho. It is rather the spiritual history of any soul with an uneasy conscience, such as Zaccheus had, and might easily be the spiritual pilgrimage of any man attending church Sunday by Sunday.

Luke sums up Zaccheus in three devastating sentences. His name was Zaccheus. He was chief of the Publicans. He was very rich. Zaccheus! What a name to bear in such an occupation, for the word means "pure, sincere one." He was not merely a Publican, but he was chief among the Publicans, chief among that sect who bought territory from the Roman Government and then extorted their own price in taxes from the already tax-ridden people. And yet the objection to the Publicans was not so much their extortions in money, but rather that in the eyes of the people of Israel, they were fifth columnists, quislings, who had been bought by the occupying power and had turned their backs upon their own people, living on the gains from the overlords of Israel. He was very rich, is the obvious conclusion of such a syllogism. But what brought this little man to the forefront of the crowds that lined the streets of Jericho that day, is not easy to say. We know that he was elbowed out of the way by irate spectators who had no time for him and certainly were going to give him no room to watch the prophet of Nazareth. And so he climbed the sycamore tree, or rather the species of fig tree from whose overhanging branches and luscious leaves, he looked down to the street below as the Lord Jesus passed by. But He did not quite pass by, for standing there, looking up into the branches, He said, "Zaccheus, come down, for today I must abide in thy house."

It would be interesting to speculate why Jesus should have stopped, how it came that He knew Zaccheus' name, and why He chose to dine with him of all the people who would love to have shared their meal with Jesus that afternoon. Perhaps, Matthew, standing at the Master's side had said, "There he is, up there—Zaccheus. Remember, I told you about him back there in Capernaum." Or was it that Jesus, Who could read men's hearts as well as their faces, saw something behind the eyes of Zaccheus that delineated an agony of soul and torment of conscience through which the man was obviously passing. On the Gothic arch at the crossing of Iona Cathedral, built by Queen Margaret in the eleventh century, in Scotland, the monk architects have carved the face of a man, with sightless eyes and agonized lines, and an open mouth and swollen, parched tongue, giving all the appearance of mental anguish, and there it stands as a permanent reminder to the preacher in Iona Abbey that to this condition must he always preach, for this is what the world is like. Perhaps Jesus saw something of this agony written in the face of Zaccheus. At any rate, he beckons him to come down, and as the crowd stands back, aghast, agape and derisive, shouting at them as they walk away, "Some prophet this, to go and dine with such a person as he is," it is at that moment that Zaccheus makes his witness. "Behold, Lord, half my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore to him fourfold." And now watch the little fellow as he walks out into a new life with the new Master of his life, with the crowd hooting and jeering as they recede into the distance. This moment for Zaccheus is the moment that comes to every man when he must make his decision, whether, in the words of Joshua, we must serve the gods of our fathers, or the gods of the Amorites, and stand forth and say, "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

This experience of Zaccheus which is so common to so many of us has three phases, and the first phase is the most important for us.

The first phase can only be understood by a particular interpretation of verse 8. Verse 8, you will notice, states that Zaccheus says, "I give to the poor half my goods," "I restore fourfold to any man from whom I have taken by false accusation." These are two present indicatives. Dr. Weymouth and Father Ronald Knox, in their Modern Translation, state, "Here and now I give half my goods to the poor." Dr. Moffatt places it into the future by saying, "I will, at some future time, give * * * restore." But the exegesis I would follow this morning is to treat them as they are written in the Authorized Version as two present indicatives. What Zaccheus says, in effect, is, "It is my custom to give half my goods, half of my capital in the bank, to the poor. It is my custom to restore fourfold to men whom I have falsely accused, and this is something I've been doing for sometime now, although none of you knew anything about it." In other words, this man, troubled by the position that he was occupying, uneasy in his conscience about the evil he was committing, was trying in the only way that he could think to undo the evil he was doing, by making recompense to those whom he had falsely accused, and giving away half of his capital to the poor. Yet the extraordinary thing is that the man still had an uneasy conscience, and must somehow see the prophet of Nazareth, because He, and He alone, is the one who can salve this conscience and give him the peace that the world cannot give. And that's why it seems to me that Zaccheus speaks to every one of us, especially the good among us, particularly the Christians among us, and those who come to the church Sunday by Sunday. For the problem of this life is: not that evil people have uneasy consciences—only God knows that; but why it is that so many of us seeking to do good and the right and be just, find, in the end, we still have an uneasy conscience, still feel dissatisfied with life and unable to find the peace that it seems God alone can give. And what we do is what Zaccheus did. We write our check out to the benevolent fund, or to the Community Chest, or give a large donation to our church. We take our talent and we dedicate it to some good cause. We take our time and we use it for the furtherance of the good of man. We may even seek to take on some office of authority, indeed, as an act of patriotism, dedicate our lives to some noble cause, and even in the government of the land itself. Thus we occupy ourselves with these good works, and all the time deep down there is a dissatisfaction of knowing that we somehow have not achieved the best, that we have not been perfectly true to our true selves, and live our lives from day to day with our consciences stinging. The only escape is somehow to try to balance the evil that we do in secret with the good deeds that we do equally in secret. The surgeries of every psychiatrist are crowded with those people who would seek to live this kind of double life—by paying off in goods, and talents, and time, and gifts the kind of life that deep down they want to live. "And he who lives a hundred lives, a hundred lives must die," and he who lives a double life, a double life must live. In James M. Barrie's play "Dear Brutus," it is fascinating to see how the author brings out this sense of paying off our frustrations by good deeds. And so Jack, who thinks his marriage is a failure, as he has secret meetings with another woman, continually says to her that his knowing of her has made him kinder to his wife. "The first time we met, I went home and was kind to my wife. The first day you allowed me to hold your hand, I bought her a bouquet of flowers. The first day you allowed me to kiss you, I went home and bought her a ruby ring. Indeed, the more I meet you the more loving I am to my wife." Lifting the matter out of the realm of drama and the psychiatrists' surgeries to the level of experience that we know, the thing that stands between us and the fullest life in Christ is just this—that Christ comes to us asking not your money or your life, but your money and your life. Indeed, it's only when we dedicate our lives to Christ, that our money and our talents and our gifts and our time and our ability become significant and relevant. And pointing to you and me the challenge comes, "Today I must abide in thy house."

Now the second phase of Zaccheus' conversion is this: he made a public confession of his faith. It was a brave thing to do, for the people were mocking him and laughing him to scorn. And yet he did it proudly with his head raised. He plighted his troth beneath the shimmering heat of the sun to be the Lord's forever.

And the longer I live, the more I'm convinced of the necessity of this public act of dedication and commitment. There was a day when I regarded as a form of exhibitionism those testimonials so frequently seen in mission halls in which a man gives his heart to Jesus Christ on Saturday night and takes it back on Monday, to return it again on the following Saturday, or after the hangover was passed, or after the emotional urge was over, and some are. Yet nothing big takes place unless a man completely and finally and publicly dedicates his life to it. In any public office, a solemn oath is taken with hand upon the Bible. The Rotary Club, Kiwanis Club, Round Table, all have their commitments. I'm mindful of the alcoholic I know, who passing through the agony of realization that he was a drunkard and could do nothing about it, found release, not in the doctors' surgery (although they helped him greatly), but on that day when he battered at the door of Norman Vincent Peale's church in New York and found it closed, yet wrote his testimony upon an envelope and put it through the letter box and went on his way rejoicing. Until you and I have the courage to stand forth and say "I'm not ashamed to own my Lord, or to defend His cause," we will continue to have the uneasy conscience of uncommitted persons, and look upon the Gospels and the Christian faith much as a spectator looks at a lovely garden of flowers, beautiful to behold, but not yet experienced.

And the third phase of Zaccheus' pilgrimage is the realization of the fact that he did it now. He didn't wait to come down from that tree, but tearing his way down through the branches, he came breathlessly to the Master and stood there awaiting his commands. But suppose he had retorted by some such words as you or I might easily make—"Don't speak this way to me, Jesus, in the midst of these people. Don't you know it's rather embarrassing?" Or, "I've a rather heavy schedule on—I've got 3 weeks of meetings and interviews before me and can't have a moment to see you. I'll write to you someday and we can make an appointment." Or, suppose like some of these young fellows who pass through the colleges, they feel that life is so busy they haven't quite time to make up their minds. (But Zaccheus was young. It takes a young man to climb a tree, you know.) There's still plenty of time to make up his mind about religion when he's middle-aged and thinks of these serious things. If this had been his answer, then he had lost forevermore the possibility of his salvation. For Jesus Christ was passing through Jericho on His road to Jerusalem, and in Jerusalem was a court waiting to try Him, and a cross on which He was about to hang, a tomb in which He was to be laid, and never again was He to pass that way. Zaccheus took the chance that was given him now. A senior padre was once examining a young chaplain before going forth to the forces to serve in the fields of battle. "Suppose," said the senior chaplain, "you're in the battlefield. A man has got 60 seconds to live. What will you say to him?" The young man hesitated, trying to bring out of his subconscious mind the lectures at college he had received, trying to pick out the appropriate chapter of the Bible he might speak to, and the seconds ticked by, until finally, in desperation, he searched for his prayer book. "It's too late for that now," said the chaplain general quietly. Yes, it's too late for that now. Now is the time for decision. Suppose the Lord Jesus passes by and sees again the uneasy agony of soul that torments so many folks, unknown to their neighbor, and knows that the only remedy possible that you might have peace is to come down and be his guest and commit yourself publicly to the life that Christ would have you live, what is your answer—"Now is the acceptable year of the Lord"? Or, are you like the Hebrew slaves of old, who on the eve of their freedom after 7 years of servitude stand at the open doorway breathing into their lungs the fresh air of a new life: and then, this new found freedom frightening them, they halt at the doorstep and go back to their pots and pans in the kitchen, feeling that there, at least, is security. But their ears are pinned to the lintel of the door, symbolizing they remain forever afterward a slave. It is the choice that comes to every man, and time is running out. "Zaccheus, come down, for today I must abide in thy house." What is your answer?

Our Muddled Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, William Henry Chamberlain writing in the New Leader for September 16, 1950, points out our inconsistent and muddled policy in Formosa. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including said article:

American policy toward the island of Formosa has become an almost incredibly tangled web of reversals, contradictions, and inconsistencies. Some difficult issues of diplomacy and strategy are involved. But almost any clear-cut policy would be preferable to the official attitude to date, which has been consistent only in its wavering.

Consider first this logical absurdity: We still recognize the Nationalist regime of Chiang Kai-shek as the legitimate Government of China. We have steadily opposed the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Yet up to June 27 President Truman, under the influence of Secretary of State Acheson, had taken the stand that America would not lift a finger to prevent the Communists from taking the island.

Since June 27, it has been our declared policy to neutralize Formosa, to use our naval and air power to prevent a Communist invasion, while discouraging offensive operations by Chiang's forces against the mainland. The President has taken the position that Formosa, although today the sole remaining territorial base of the Chinese Government we recognize, is not really part of China at all, but territory taken from Japan by the victory of the Allied forces [whose] legal status cannot be fixed until there is international action to determine its future.

This is in clear contradiction with Secretary Acheson's position last January. At that time, the Secretary dismissed as a quibble the idea that Formosa was not part of China as a result of the Cairo declaration of November 1943, subscribed to by Roosevelt, Churchill, and Chiang, which stated that China would obtain Formosa after the defeat of Japan.

The President veered away from this assumption that Formosa was part of China in his declaration of June 27. He suggested that disposition of the island must await a peace treaty with Japan or United Nations action. But Mr. Truman has further confounded the confusion, if that be possible, by his recent announcement that the American fleet would be withdrawn from Formosan waters as soon as the war in Korea ended.

This looked like a reversion to last January's passive attitude toward the possibility of a Communist breach in the immensely important Pacific defense line. If Chinese Communist seizure of Formosa is an intolerable threat to American security while fighting is in progress in Korea, why should it be any less a threat when the fighting is over? The Chinese Communists are hardly likely to desist from carrying out their oft-announced threat to invade Formosa until the UN reaches a decision, or to respect such a decision unless it assigns Formosa to them.

General MacArthur, in a statement withdrawn by Presidential order but fortunately not suppressed, made a brilliant and altogether convincing military argument for keeping Formosa out of Communist hands. The core of his message is summarized in the following sentence:

"Formosa in the hands of a hostile power could be compared to an unsinkable aircraft carrier and submarine tender ideally located to accomplish offensive strategy and at the same time checkmate defensive or counter-offensive operations by friendly forces based on Okinawa and the Philippines."

MacArthur's statement was criticized—very unfairly, I think—as an expression of American imperialism. The United States, it so happens, is the most powerful member of a coalition of free nations trying to hold back aggressive Communist expansion in Asia as well as Europe. MacArthur emphasized in his message that more than American national interest and security are at stake. He referred to "our friends in the Philippines, our friends in Australia and New Zealand, our friends in Indonesia, our friends in Japan."

It is certainly a matter of grave doubt whether there is ever a serious moral case for turning a people over to Communist rule. But there is not the slightest valid argument for turning the Formosans over to Chinese Communist domination. For half a century, the island was dissociated from China; two generations of Formosans grew up entirely isolated from Chinese political and cultural influence.

Nor will American public opinion understand the logic of fighting a sanguinary war under disadvantageous logistical conditions to repel Communist aggression in Korea, and then acquiescing in similar aggression against strategically more important Formosa. A large majority of the Formosan people, if given the chance, would almost certainly vote for autonomy and eventual independence, not for absorption into Mao Tse-tung's Red Chinese empire. This question might properly be referred to a plebiscite under UN auspices. As for the idea that Mao Tse-tung would be appeased and satiated by the acquisition of Formosa, we tried that method with Stalin. The results, to put it mildly, were not happy.

Bosone Plan for Indians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, one of the most difficult problems before the country today is the future of the American Indian, and particularly Indians who are still wards of the Government.

For more than 100 years the United States has been acting in the capacity of guardian of the American Indian. Any number of investigations have been made to determine what should be done to help them become self-sustaining and take their place as citizens in this great country.

Legislation is now pending in the Congress. I refer to House bill 490. This bill has caused much public discussion. Lately former Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes addressed a column to the Washington Post on this subject, which was published Sunday, September 17.

Although I am not in full agreement with Mr. Ickes' position, yet there is merit in his comment on H. R. 490. I think it will be informative to Members of the Congress, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSONE PLAN FOR INDIANS

(By Harold Ickes)

ATTACK ON RIGHTS

The Bosone resolution (H. Res. 490), which has passed the House and has been favorably recommended to the Senate, by the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, is all the worse because of its sponsorship. I have high regard for Mrs. BOSONE. I believe that she has a real passion for justice and fair treatment of minority groups. I have no doubt as to her good faith in offering this resolution, but I am frank to say that no greater harm could be done to the Indians than its passage. For this reason, I hope that, if it does pass, it will be vetoed by President Truman.

This resolution does not, in express terms, direct that Indian rights be thrown into the ash can. As a matter of fact, no bill, the effect of which would be to despoil the Indians, has ever expressly said so. From times immemorial, bills to make the Indians an easy prey to white cupidity have all been defended in terms of "liberation," "assimilation into the general population," etc. If Mrs. BOSONE and those Representatives and Senators, who fell so easily into the trap into which the Indians themselves are expected later to fall, had studied prior Indian legislation, they would have been chary about letting someone else do their thinking for them and lending their support to a measure, which, if adopted, may turn out to be as notorious in its effects as the Bursum-Fall bill of two or more decades ago.

The Bosone bill would adopt a Federal policy to breach contracts, to terminate present Federal protections and services, and undo all that the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, passed with the keen approval of President Roosevelt, has made it possible for the Indians to accomplish for themselves. This bill is aimed at whole tribes, not merely at individual Indians. It is a mandate to the Secretary of the Interior to determine, as quickly as possible, that the Indian wards of the Government no longer need protection. It has been suggested that it can all be done within a year.

The effect on the Indians would not be dissimilar to the effect on members of trade unions, if the Congress should enact a law declaring that the members of a union might no longer have the protection that is theirs as the result of united effort and united action. Moreover, this bill contains a unique and particularly sadistic provision. Up to $250,000 are to be taken out of the already inadequate appropriations for the education, health, etc., of the Indians to finance the engine of their economic destruction. Could devilish and sardonic humor go further? Of course, $250,000 to be expended by the Office of Indian Affairs, at its own sweet will, would mean more jobs. Apparently, trained and experienced personnel from the Indian Bureau would not be employed, but outsiders, many of whom would probably lack interest in, or sympathy for, these first Americans. Money could even be spent to subsidize so-called welfare organizations and even religious and pseudo-scientific groups, to report as the Indian Bureau might wish them to report. I have had faith in Indian Commissioner Dillon Myer, but it has been somewhat shaken by the fact that he has supported this legislation. I hesitate to believe that he understands what could be done under this legislation.

These $250,000 should be devoted to health and education, for the benefit of the Indians themselves. Instead of being spent for the Indians, they are to be dissipated in paying for formulae that on their face would seem to justify the further exploitation of the Indians. By the terms of the resolution, the Secretary is required to specify, not later than January 3 next, "which tribes, bands, and groups of Indians are, in his opinion, qualified to be relieved by all supervision and control by the Federal Government in the management of their affairs." The resolution further imposes upon him the duty of reviewing "not later than the first day of the second regular session of the Eighty-second Congress * * * programs undertaken by the Department" to denude of Federal protection, the tribes that had been given the "bum's rush" on the preceding January 3.

Once the Bosone resolution becomes the law, its language, and not the benevolent intent expressed by Secretary Chapman in his letter to Chairman Peterson, will determine the fate of the Indians. Furthermore, Secretary Chapman's intent would in no way control his successor. His wishful thinking would in no way alter the fact that the Bosone resolution would open wide the gate, that now protects our Indian wards, to the two-legged predator who has traveled that familiar road in the past. Even Secretary Chapman seems to have forgotten the history of legislative efforts in the past, some of which have been all to successful, to denude the Indians of their property. His indorsement of the Bosone resolution is in contradistinction to his adverse report on S. 2726 which boldly and directly proposed to do what could be done just as easily, if less abruptly and more smoothly, under the Bosone resolution.

Title to Submerged Lands Beneath Navigable Waters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the State of Maryland consistently has taken the position, through its duly elected officials, that submerged lands beneath navigable waters within the boundaries of the several States belong to the States in question. Those officials have supported legislation which would confirm and establish the titles of the States to such lands.

At a hearing on the matter by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States Senate, a statement outlining the position of the National Association of Attorneys General on the matter was presented by Mr. Hall Hammond, attorney general of Maryland, and chairman of the submerged lands committee of the National Association of Attorneys General.

Because of the paramount interest of this controversy to the State of Maryland, and to the many other States of the country, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. TYDINGS] and myself, that the statement be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am Hall Hammond, attorney general of the State of Maryland, and I appear here in behalf of my State and as chairman of the submerged lands committee of the National Association of Attorneys General.

You are aware that we believe in and are committed to a program which would confirm and establish the titles of the States to lands beneath navigable waters within State boundaries, but as Senator O'MAHONEY has stated it seems to be quite impossible that any permanent legislation along these lines could be enacted at this session.

Therefore I confine my remarks to Senate Joint Resolution 195 relating to the interim operation and development of oil deposits in the submerged lands off the shores of the United States.

Senator O'MAHONEY, chairman of the committee, introducer of the measure, says "the resolution does not attempt to settle any controversial issue" and "failure to enact interim legislation of some kind would precipitate very serious confusion at a time when the country can ill afford it."

At the outset let me say that I would favor a bill for interim operations provided it did not give any of the parties an advantage and the status quo is maintained

Recently this committee has considered legislation giving statehood to Alaska and Hawaii and in your reports which recommend favorable action, we find the following (quotes taken from Rept. No. 1929):

In a letter dated May 5, 1950, written by President Harry S. Truman, he says in part:

"It should not be forgotten that most of our present States achieved statehood at a relatively early period of their development. The stimulus of being admitted as full partners in the Union, and the challenge of managing their own affairs were among the most significant factors contributing to their growth and progress. Very few of our existing States, at the time of their admission to the Union, possessed potential resources, both human and natural, superior to those of Alaska and Hawaii. I am confident that Alaska and Hawaii, like our present States, will grow with statehood and because of statehood" (p 9).

The Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson, in a letter to you said:

"You asked in your letter of March 30 as to whether from the point of view of national defense, it would be advantageous to extend statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, and you inquired specifically as to whether statehood would give greater strength to our military position in those areas than does the present territorial type of local government. It is obvious that the more stable a local government can be, the more successful would be the control and defense of the area in case of sudden attack. There can be no question but that in the event of an attack any State would be immensely aided in the initial stages of the emergency by the effective use of the State and local instrumentalities of law and order. By the same token it would seem to me that, as persons in a position to assist the Federal garrisons which might exist in Hawaii or Alaska, the locally elected governors, sheriffs, and the locally selected constabulary and civil defense units all would be of tremendous value in cases of sudden peril. Therefore, my answer to your question is that statehood for Alaska and Hawaii would undoubtedly give a considerable added measure of strength to the over-all defense of both areas in event of emergency" (p. 15).

The Secretary of the Interior, Oscar Chapman, in his appearance before the committee stated:

"The United States has spoken out loudly and firmly against colonialism in world councils, but surely to require a people qualified for the ultimate in self-government to continue in a dependent status is to foster colonialism" (p. 5).

He stated further:

"Statehood would permit Alaska to foster and protect the development of the natural riches. Most important of all, statehood would give Alaska's people their rightful voice in the Federal Government, as well as in the management of their own affairs" (pp. 14 and 15.)

The committee report in speaking of national resources has this to say:

"Economic development: In addition to the advantages to national security and the furtherance of America's leadership in world affairs, statehood for Alaska is desirable for America's peactime development and economic expansion. The region has the greatest reserves of untapped raw materials—minerals, forest and sea products—under the American flag. * * *

"Alaska's gold and furs have been glamorized by Jack London, Rudyard Kipling, Robert W. Service, and other writers, but the Territory has far more valuable resources in her iron ore, coal, copper, lead and zinc, and even tin. * * *

"All of the foregoing is merely a sketch of some of the high lights of Alaska's industrial and agricultural potentialities. If the historic patterns established in the admission of each of the 35 States is followed in Alaska—and the committee can perceive of no valid reason why it should not be—statehood for Alaska should supply the needed stimulus for enterprise and private capital to make that area of vast riches one of the strongest segments of the American economy of tomorrow" (pp. 5 and 6).

Do the foregoing expressions have any significance?

They speak of "the stimulus of being admitted as full partners in the Union, and the challenge of managing their own affairs, the growth because of statehood."

They say, "It is obvious that the more stable a local government can be, the more successful would be the control and defense of the area in case of sudden attack."

They say that "to require a people qualified for the ultimate in self-government to continue in a dependent status is to foster colonialism."

You speak of the "advantages of development of the natural resources by the people of the States."

And then what would you be saying to the people of the States who from the beginning have been in possession of and considered the owners of the lands involved, and who have developed the production of the natural resources therein, if you pass a measure embodying the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 195 in its present form?

You say to those people, "you are incompetent and no longer fit or qualified to manage your own affairs, and from the standpoint of a stable local government and in the interest of the national defense, it is necessary for us to appoint a guardian to protect you."

Anyone who believes in the Communist method of confiscating and nationalizing all natural resources might say that to the people of this country but I cannot believe that the members of this committee would take such a position.

I believe you recognize from the facts that have been presented to you that the appointment of the Secretary of the Interior as a so-called receiver, or should we say guardian, will cause more confusion and definitely retard the operation and development of the lands involved.

Let us repeat what the National Petroleum Council named by the Secretary of the Interior to formulate a national oil policy for the United States had to say in its report last year:

"The petroleum resources of the lands beneath the marginal seas extending to the outer edge of the Continental Shelf can best be explored and developed under State, rather than Federal, control."

I think an examination of the record will convince any unbiased person that oil production under State control has been far more successful than similar operations by the Federal Government.

You have been advised as to the method employed in California during the past 3 years where operations have continued smoothly and without interruption. In my opinion, such a plan will work with the greatest degree of efficiency, with the minimum of cost, confusion, and delay. I hope Senator O'MAHONEY and the other members of this committee will recognize the merit of the plan and amend Senate Joint Resolution 195 accordingly.

It seems to me that it is more important in the interest of the Nation and national defense to have a stable local government carrying on the operations in an efficient manner with the least of confusion and cost rather than attempt to satisfy the lust for power of some Federal officers who would manage these lands.

The National Federation of Independent Business Is Doing a Great Job for Small Business in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, small business in America is having a hard road these days. It is difficult for the average small-business man to compete with big business monopolies, trusts, and furthermore with Government regulations, red tape, bureaucratic delays, regimentation, and so forth.

Therefore, it is well that they have representing their interests and welfare several groups and organizations here in Washington. Many small-business men hold memberships in these groups and subscribe to their programs and, to a more or less degree, finance their activities.

One of the most active and most influential organizations carrying the banner and carrying on the struggle in behalf of small business is the National Federation of Independent Business. It has the largest individual membership of any organization in the United States. Their Washington office is in the Bond Building, Washington 5, D. C.

The organization has an advisory counsel which reports to the organization here in Washington, D. C., every month. This comprises 2,000 district chairmen reporting the opinions of the average small-business man on important issues and problems of the day. Through them, the organization keeps in touch with small business throughout the country. Then in turn, the organization officials can report the overall information to Members of Congress, Federal officials, public service organizations, educational groups and others.

Of interest to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the general public is the enclosed letter dated September 21 which I have just received from Mr. George J. Burger, vice president. The letter follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Burlingame, Calif., September 21, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD HAGEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: I believe that your suggestion, solely as a matter of information and guidance to Members of Congress, should be carried out by spreading on the RECORD what independent business leadership is striving for to protect the people they represent—independent business of this Nation.

Too often there is confusion in the minds of many Members of Congress as to "who is who" in independent business leadership. So there should be no difficulty in acquainting the Members of Congress on this score.

The National Federation of Independent Business, headed by Mr. C. Wilson Harder, founder and president, a nonprofit corporation whose head office is located in Burlingame, Calif., with division offices throughout the United States, including a public-relations office, in charge of Mr. Ed Wimmer, in Cincinnati, Ohio, from the very first instance has ruled that the policies of the federation must be by the majority vote of its Nation-wide membership. This is carried out by the registered vote of the membership through the official publication of the federation, "The Mandate." No group of officers, nor any selected group of members determines the policy of the federation. We believe this is the only democratic way, and the safest way for any trade association to operate.

When major economic questions are involved, before any position is taken by the federation, it's the Nation-wide membership majority vote which determines the position.

We have found from experience in our many appearances before congressional committees, due to our active interest, that too often among trade associations has the opinion of only a few of their membership been the position taken by that organization, and the position being unknown to all the members.

In my official position as vice president in charge of the Washington office of the federation, every so often we are visited here by heads of Government agencies or called upon by Members of Congress to answer the question "How can you protect independent business at the local level?" This question is readily answered, and not merely through "lip service" but by direct and positive action, that if independent business is to get relief at the local level it must come about through all-out sincere, vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws.

The federation's position was ably presented before the Joint Committee of the Economic Report July 14, 1947. Then again, before the House Small Business Committee November 17, 1948, and in its numerous appearances before Judiciary Committees of both the Senate and the House, holding to the original objective as the No. 1 objective—all-out vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws.

The position of the federation was also ably presented, through the splendid cooperation of the respective chairman of the Republican and Democratic Platform Committees in their conventions in Philadelphia in the summer of 1948. To their credit, both of these committees extended to the spokesman for the federation the fullest possible time in oral presentation of the objectives of the federation, and it must be said for the chairmen of both committees that special, careful attention was given to the remarks of the federation, and particularly on their recommendations for an antitrust program. I think it is well to list the small-business blank which the federation presented to both committees:

1. Antitrust program.

2. Small Business Committees in the Congress, with special emphasis on the creation of these committees as permanent standing small business committees of the Congress, and in this respect our objective was gained in the splendid action of the Senate on February 20, 1950, when they voted the creation of the standing Committee on Small Business. It will be found from the record that the federation was the only small business organization sponsor of this resolution, and the only organization in getting this recognition from the United States Senate.

3. Government competition with private enterprise.

4. Small independent business representation.

5. Labor practices.

6. Government regulation of business.

It is interesting to note, and I quote from the statement made before the committees:

"I urge your favorable attention to, and action on, all of these suggestions, with special emphasis on the first two—without which the last four would be only idle gestures."

This has been the consistent program of the federation, as ratified by its Nation-wide membership in each and every instance.

The federation, in its honest efforts to acquaint the public at large with all-out necessary information on the problems of independent business, has carried on an extensive Nation-wide weekly radio program for over 2 years, and at the moment we are sponsoring a small-business column in many thousand weekly newspapers, all tending to give the needed information to the public at large, and acquaint them with the need for a healthy, virile, efficient independent business segment to function in our economy.

We were very interested in a very necessary piece of legislation which you sponsored in the Eightieth Congress, which provided that exporters of rubber tires be given the same consideration on excise-tax exemption on tires and tubes that is permitted to tire producers. This legislation was very much in order as a protective measure for independent business in the export trade, and it is an unfortunate situation that Congress did not approve the legislation.

The independent tire retailing trade has the same problem. Their stocks are subject to excise taxes as soon as they are received, where the stocks of tire manufacturers operating in the retail field through their own retail stores are exempt from the tax until the tires and tubes are ultimately sold to users. This is a rank injustice and a severe penalty on independent tire retailing establishments. For nearly 10 years we have been attempting to get this injustice corrected, and we hope action will be taken on this and your important bill before very long.

Many Members of Congress are confused, and to their credit desire all-out information on independent business leadership, and the insertion of this material in the RECORD, with any appropriate remarks, we believe will be of great service to all within our economy.

With highest regards,

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE J. BURGER,
Vice President.

Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK P. GRAHAM

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three articles, entitled "Of Civil Rights—I," "Of Civil Rights—II," and "Of Civil Rights—III," written by John P. McKnight, and published in the Charlotte News of September 12, 1950, September 13, 1950, and September 14, 1950.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OF CIVIL RIGHTS—I

(By John P. McKnight)

"Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."—From the first amendment to the Constitution (art. I of the Bill of Rights).

Last month, in Durham, a man named William Evans, a 26-year-old former student at Davidson, the University of North Carolina, and Duke University, now an employee of a Durham soda shop, got himself arrested for seeking signatures to the so-called Stockholm petition for peace, a document which has Communist backing.

Deliberately, Evans approached three policemen and asked them to sign. They jailed him, on the specific charge of vagrancy. In so doing, they were merely following the instructions of Recorder's Court Judge A. R. Wilson, who several weeks ago directed Durham law enforcement officers to pick up as vagrants persons circulating the petition. The judge observed that persons having nothing better to do in the present emergency should be working on the roads.

Arraignment before Judge Wilson the day after his arrest, Evans pleaded innocent, demanded trial by jury, and posted bond of $200 for appearance at the Superior Court session opening in Durham early this month.

In a statement Evans issued after his release, he described himself as "an ardent pacifist" who firmly supported the Stockholm appeal "as well as other genuine efforts to remove the threat of atomic war." He asserted his purpose was to challenge the constitutionality of Judge Wilson's order. And he predicted that attempts would be made to "prejudice this case by dragging in the issue of communism."

Those are the salient facts of the affair. On the basis of them, it is easy enough to dismiss young Evans as a callow youth (although he has lived out a third of man's allotted span, and is a professed student of history). It is easy enough to brand him a publicity seeker, with perhaps a touch of martyr complex in him. Since he avers his personal support of the Stockholm petition, and since his father testifies to his onetime membership in Henry Wallace's Progressive Party, it is easy, all too easy, to damn him as a parlor pink if not a fellow traveler, an intellectual Communist if not a party card holder.

In the present state of the country's temper, that is sure to be the popular approach to the problem of William Evans.

Irate as Americans rightfully are over Communist aggression in Korea, uneasy as we justly are over Russia's intentions, fearful as most of us are that the horrors of world war III may be just around the corner, concerned as we are for national solidarity in this time of crisis, we are understandably disposed to give short shift to those who do not see eye to eye with the majority. A nation in peril, or one that believes itself in peril, ill brooks its dissenters. So most of us will call young Evans a Russia-loving Red, and say that whatever happens to him is too good for him.

Nevertheless, it is true that—as Evans himself insists—it is muddying the waters to drag communism into his case. He will not be tried for callowness and immaturity, for wrong-headedness, for publicity seeking, for desiring martyrdom, for pacifism, or for communism. All those labels may fix him; but whether they do or not is neither here nor there; none of them is, as of this writing, an offense under the law of the land, whatever the current popular opinion of them.

Nor is Evans accused of threatening public order, nor of imperiling the security of the Nation; and so he is prima facie innocent on those counts.

Nor, finally, will he be tried for the specific act that provoked his arrest, circulating the Stockholm petition.

At the direction of the Durham justice, he will be tried for vagrancy—that is, strictly, for having no means of support and so being likely to become a public burden.

Yet it is written in the record that the occasion of his arrest is his having sought signatures for the petition.

Thus the issue is quite clear: shall peace officers and courts at the lower level be permitted, by means of arbitrary redefinition of statutes, to vitiate the basic rights enshrined in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution?

You may or may not like young Evans and his political philosophy, and you may or may not approve of his decision deliberately to seek a legal test of Judge Wilson's order; but you cannot get away from the fact that he has posed a question to a democratic way of life.

And behind that question are others yet larger: How shall we win the hearts of men to practical democracy if panic fear of communism causes us to repudiate the very virtues that make ideal democracy dear to much of mankind, and what profits us victory in the cold or hot war with totalitarian communism if the price we pay for that victory is our grand birthright of freedom?

I shall return to these questions tomorrow, and the day after.

OF CIVIL RIGHTS—II

(By John P. McKnight)

"A little rebellion now and then * * * is a medicine necessary for the sound health of government."—Thomas Jefferson.

Although Soviet Russia notoriously tramples underfoot the liberties of the individual, the Kremlin requires of American Communists vociferous defense of our civil rights.

This seeming paradox is customarily resolved, or dismissed, with the allegation that the Communists crouch in safety behind the barricade of our constitutional guaranties the while they plot the destruction of our democratic institutions. And there is much truth in this. But it is by no means the whole story.

A moment's thought will suffice to disclose Moscow's subtler purpose in ordering this perfervid advocacy of our civil rights. It is to trade upon the truism that praise from the wrong quarter may be as damning as blame from the right. It is to make the cause of civil rights suspect in our own eyes, to make it "reprehensible by association." (Similarly, in Europe, Communist propaganda discredits the very word democracy by seizing upon it and affixing it to the various "fronts" that serve the Kremlin.)

For Moscow knows very well that democracy's most potent weapons in the global contest for men's hearts and minds are these same civil rights, these guaranties of personal freedom. And if the Communists' hypocritically ardent championship of them causes enough Americans to suspect these weapons, and so discard them, then Moscow will have won a greater victory than any it can achieve in Korea.

(Just how far this Communist tactic has succeeded, you may be able to measure by looking into your own mind. What is your first, instinctive reaction on reading that John Doe—about whom you know nothing—has gratuitously taken up the cudgels in defense of the right of assembly, or freedom of speech, or security against unlawful search? Do you not instinctively suspect him of Communist leanings? At the very least, do you not put his conduct down as quixotic?)

Now none of this is intended to suggest that young William Evans, the St. Paul's youth who last month deliberately sought arrest to challenge a Durham court's asserted invasion of the right of petition, is a Communist or a tool of communism, or even a sympathizer with communism.

Inevitably, many will so regard him. Those of us who detest and fear Russian totalitarianism and who believe that the Kremlin's cynical policies are leading straight to world war III—and it goes without saying that we are the vast majority in America—are likely to let Evans' political beliefs prejudice our judgment of the issue he has raised. We are likely to say that it serves him damn well right to be arrested for seeking signatures to the Stockholm (Communist-backed) peace petition, and let it go at that.

That is because Evans' professed political philosophy is tremendously unpopular—and perhaps deservedly so—in the United States just now.

So it may be regrettable that we have left it to the St. Paul's youth to cast himself in the role of champion in our North Carolina courts, of the constitutional right of petition. Another might have fared better at the bar of public opinion, if not in the courts.

Were Evans a, let us say, highly respected, elderly deacon of a reputable church seeking signatures to a petition to Congress against an allegedly discriminatory tax on church property, his arrest for vagrancy would have rocked the State to its foundations.

But, alas! he is not. Elderly deacons, lawyers, bankers, newspaper editors, if you like, are not given to seeking arrest so that they may do battle in court for their beliefs. Age is conservative; and, no matter how much oldsters may dislike the way things are going, they rarely rise in revolt. No graybeard would have written "common sense."

No. It is the young who rebel. And in our complacent middle age as a Nation, forgetful that we were born of rebellion, we tend to look down our noses at youthful rebels. We tend to ignore Jefferson's dictum that we need a little rebellion to test, and insure the continuing soundness, of our institutions.

But to the liabilities of our dislike of rebellion, and of his youth, Evans adds avowed pacifism, erstwhile support of Henry Wallace, sympathy with the Stockholm petition—all attitudes decidedly out of favor right now. That he has studied at Chapel Hill may further prejudice his case with the few who have heeded irresponsible talk about the political complexion of the university. And a Durham newspaper has grumpily consigned him to "Cranks' corner."

Yet none of those considerations is germane to his case, and so must not be allowed to obscure the fact that the issues he raises are real enough.

In yesterday's article I defined them: the propriety or impropriety of arbitrarily redefining statutes (i. e., that on vagrancy) to negate the Bill of Rights; the effect upon our cause if, in the stress of the current crisis, we abjure the basic guaranties of democracy; the worthwhileness of victory over communism if it costs us our freedoms.

A recent analysis purports to show that Moscow now controls—in body, if not in mind—some 700,000,000 of the world's people. Another 700,000,000, approximately, side ostensibly with the democracies, although among these are many whose faith is weak. All the rest sit on the fence. The side that captures their loyalties will possess preponderance of power in the world, and may confidently look forward to victory in a cold or a hot war.

As of today, Russia appears to be winning the battle of propaganda. There are many reasons for this.

To millions in the world, the message of communism is new and thrilling, while that of democracy is old and, since many of its promises have not been fulfilled, suspect. Too, Russia has had three decades of trial and error to perfect her propaganda techniques: we are Johnnies-come-lately, amateurs competing with professionals. Again, Russia is adept at capitalizing on our errors: our attempts to proscribe the Stockholm petition, domestically valid though the FBI's reason may be for condemning it, will yet be used abroad to convince unsuspecting millions that we are indeed dedicated to war. And as for Korea, the black and white of it, for much of the world, is that Americans are openly fighting there, while Russians are not: it is not to deny the inevitability of President Truman's decision to say that the resultant propaganda position is unfavorable to us.

Yet to offset our many disadvantages is this inestimable advantage: alone among existing systems of government, western democracy guaranties certain freedoms to the individual, and they are freedoms that strike deep response in the hearts of oppressed millions everywhere.

If to the underprivileged America—with all her sins of omission and commission—is still the promised land, it is these freedoms, as much as our wealth, that we have to thank.

So to allow Russia to maneuver us into setting these guaranties aside, or to let the exigencies of the current crisis impel us to lay them on the shelf for the duration, is to greatly, if not fatally, impair our chances of victory.

The Constitution is a great dike protecting us against the sea of oppression that lies always without. A tiny breach in it may grow enormously, with frightening speed, until we are all of us engulfed in a flood of tyranny. That is why we must all be alert to see that its guaranties are denied to none who deserve them. For, as the unknown who signed himself "Junius" observed in his epoch-marking letter of 1767 to the printer of London's Public Advertiser:

"When the constitution is openly invaded, when the first original right of the people, from which all laws derive their authority, is directly attacked, inferior grievances naturally lose their force, and are suffered to pass by without punishment or observation."

OF CIVIL RIGHTS—III

(By John P. McKnight)

"It has long been a grave question whether any government, not too strong for the liberties of its people, can be strong enough to maintain its existence in great emergencies."—Abraham Lincoln.

If it is true (as Thomas L. Stokes wrote recently) that our civil rights are "our buckler and our shield," and if it is true (as yesterday's article sought to demonstrate) that they are our greatest asset in the world ideological struggle with communism, then it is evidently very much in our interest to cherish and defend these rights as our lives.

But it is also true that no nation, in grave peril of disastrous attack from its enemies abroad, may permit its enemies at home—partisans and agents of its foreign enemies—to shelter behind the liberties it offers while they carry on their work of sapping its power to resist.

Yet how may our enemies within be restricted in their nefarious abuse of our liberties, without also restricting the loyal citizens of the land? Specifically, how limit the Communists in their use of freedom of speech, publication, assembly, and petition to subvert our Government, without muzzling the patriotic critic whose intent is simply to correct evils? How, in time of crisis, centralize authority to assure swift, effective action, without doing serious—perhaps irreparable—injury to the democratic processes?

In short, how do battle with totalitarianism without aping totalitarian methods?

That is the dire dilemma of democracy.

It is the problem so neatly posed by Abraham Lincoln, in the passage quoted at the head of this chapter. It is the problem that vexes every farsighted American today. It is the problem with which Congress wrestles as it seeks to close loopholes in our legislative structure hampering our effective control of subversive activities.

Our survival may very well depend upon our finding an adequate solution of it; for without the moral leadership of the world that our espousal of man's basic liberties confers we can have little hope of ultimate victory over the forces allied with Soviet Russia.

That is why three long articles have been dedicated to the issues raised by the recent arrest for vagrancy of William Evans, a young man of no particular importance except as his defiance of a Durham court's measures to stop circulation of the Stockholm peace petition suggests the necessity of reexamining the nature and uses of our liberties.

Now it goes without saying that the founding fathers, with all their wisdom, did not foresee the nature of modern warfare, in which entire peoples, rather than small professional armies, are engaged. No more did they foresee such absolute weapons as the atomic bomb, which of its very nature is directed primarily at technical noncombatants. Nor could they foresee the ideological struggle between communism and democracy, which makes geographical and national boundaries naught, so that no man may say with certainty who is friend and who foe.

Had they been granted foreknowledge of the future, the makers of our Constitution would doubtless have written into it provisions for dealing with the monstrous perils of today. But they did not. Thus we, who are justifiably diffident about our statecraft, are left to confront the ticklish problems that the fearsome advance of totalitarian communism imposes.

A few modern constitutions have had written into them the stipulation that rulers may set aside guarantees of civil liberties in domestic or foreign crisis. But with one or two notable exceptions, the end of that has been dictatorship. For love of power grows with the exercise of power; and few men, having enjoyed absolutism, willingly renounce it. As Solon observed, "dictatorship is a very fair spot, but there is no way down from it."

I do not propose to try to tell Congress, and the courts, how our difficulties may best be resolved (as, it may be said in passing, there is no intent to prejudge the case of William Evans). After all, no single, simple answer exists. We shall have to trust to trial and error, to the proved democratic system of checks and balances, and in the last analysis to the good sense of the American people to preserve our ancient liberties substantially unimpaired in this time of crisis.

Yet I believe that these considerations may, with propriety, be urged upon the Congress, and the courts, and law enforcement officers.

1. Beating up Communists in Georgia wins no victories in Korea, and may conceivably cost us friends elsewhere. To quote Lincoln again, "There is no grievance that is a fit object of redress by mob law." Besides, that way lies fascism.

2. Justice is ill served when statutes are stretched to cover actions that they do not in fact cover, even though those actions, in the opinion of one man of one hundred million, merit punishment; if enough of us so believe, the democratic method is to enact new laws embodying our judgment.

3. In writing new laws for control of subversive elements, Congress must take care that the present mood of the country does not stampede it into needless invasion of our freedoms of speech, press, assembly, and political activity. In our contrition over past errors, it is natural enough for us to long for the hair shirt, to rush to offer up our freedoms on an altar of atonement. But the pendulum will swing the other way, and that, no doubt, right soon.

4. Congress will convict itself of partisan politics at its worst if it fails to give proper weight to President Truman's specifications of the legislative equipment he needs to do the job, and votes restrictive laws far exceeding them. For the executive branch of the Government, which by definition executes, may be presumed to know what is required. When Truman warns that the provocations of the moment must not sweep Congress into broad, vague laws gravely infringing our freedoms, lest we forfeit our moral leadership in the world, he speaks in statesmanlike vein, and should be heeded.

5. Finally, Congress and the courts alike may find a sound yardstick in the late great Justice Holmes' dictum that our liberties ought to be denied only to those who so use or abuse them as to offer "a clear and present danger" to our security. It was this that formed the keystone of Judge Learned Hand's recent decision denying the appeal of the 11 convicted Communist leaders. On such a line of reasoning, Congress may well justify legislation enabling punitive action against active Communist Party members, since their adherence to a foreign, hostile power constitutes a demonstrable "present danger." But by the same token our Union Square orators, parlor pinks, petition circulators and such other harmless pathics will be left in peace.

We may indeed, in this unprecedented crisis, find it necessary temporarily to curtail some of our liberties, so as to preserve our larger freedom. But we must, all of us, heed the Biblical injunction to "let all things be done decently and in good order." We must take care that none of us, however unpopular his views, is deprived of his liberties without due—which is to say adequate, sufficient—process of law.

In so proceeding, we shall respect the spirit of our democracy, we shall confirm the rest of the world in its good opinion of us, we shall take up arms against our sea of troubles, and we may face the future in full confidence that we are not unworthy of our great past.

As "Junius" observed, in the letter quoted before:

"We owe it to our ancestors to preserve entire those rights, which they have delivered to our care: We owe it to our posterity, not to suffer their dearest inheritance to be destroyed."

My Report to the Post Office Department Personnel of the Ninth District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 1., 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, as the second ranking Republican on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I would like to make a report to all of the United States Post Office Department and service in my Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota.

My purpose is to explain to them the program of legislation presented in their behalf during the Eighty-first Congress and to point out to them the part that their own Representative played in introducing and guiding much of this legislation through the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee and the House of Representatives.

These postal workers are truly deserving of such a report. They are the people whose faithful service makes possible the incredible miracle of the mail—giving us a postal system that reaches across space in a never-ending chain to link man and his thoughts through the written word.

But before I list this legislation, I ask the postal workers to keep in mind the fact that during the Eightieth Congress—a Republican-controlled Congress in which I was on the majority side—the postal workers received the largest salary increase ever given by any Congress.

Furthermore, what is more important to many persons, a most liberal and comprehensive retirement program was approved by the same Congress.

But it has been a different story during the Eighty-first Congress. There are now 15 Democratic members on the House Post Office Committee and only 10 Republican members. As a result, the postal workers have not fared as well as they did during the previous Congress. For despite my efforts and those of the other Republican members of the committee and some of the Democrats in behalf of these deserving postal workers, the Democratic administration has blocked much of the beneficial legislative program. Some of the members in the majority have been all too willing to accept the dictates and wishes of the Democratic Postmaster General, the Democratic Budget Department, and the President.

Here is a list of the bills that I introduced during the Eighty-first Congress in behalf of the postal workers. They are listed in the order in which they were introduced, with the resolution number and a brief explanation of the purpose of the bill. The action that was taken on each bill is also mentioned.

And again I would remind the postal workers of Minnesota's Ninth District to note the many unfavorable reports handed down by the Democratic-controlled departments and agencies. It is very clear that the welfare of our postal workers was of no great concern to the present Democratic administration that otherwise has broken all previous records of public spending.

Here is the record of many of the bills introduced by your United States Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN in the Eighty-first Congress:

January 3, 1949: H. R. 397 (H. R. 926, 4181), providing an allowance for the purchase of uniforms for city and village delivery letter carriers. (One hundred dollars annually for the purchase of uniforms.) Both the Bureau of the Budget and the Post Office Department's later reports were unfavorable. (Passed House as a part of H. R. 4495 but removed in conference at Senate insistence.)

January 3, 1949: H. R. 398 (H. R. 6774), providing cash allowance for uniforms for employees of the United States Government. Bureau of the Budget and Civil Service Commission reported "favorable, if amended." The Post Office report was unfavorable.

January 19, 1949: H. R. 1217, to provide longevity pay for postmasters (5 percent or $100 for each year up to 10 years and for each 10 years of service up to 30 thereafter.) Civil Service Commission, Bureau of the Budget, and Post Office Department all reported unfavorably. (Adopted in part in Public, No. 428.)

January 13, 1949: H. R. 1362, to provide for the display of the American flag on every post office in the United States. The Post Office Department report was unfavorable.

January 18, 1949: H. R. 1646, to provide retirement annuities for retired fourth-class postmasters with 30 years of service. Post Office report, no recommendation. Civil Service Commission report, unfavorable.

February 2, 1949: H. R. 2178, to provide for the issuance of a special postage stamp in commemoration of the nine hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of America by Leif Erikson. Post Office Department report unfavorable.

February 9, 1949: H. R. 2569 (S. 1479) (this became Public Law 431), to convert village letter-carrier service at second-class post offices to city letter-carrier service. Legislation on this subject was first introduced by Mr. HAGEN in the Eightieth Congress and as H. R. 2569 in the Eighty-first Congress.

February 9, 1949: H. R. 2568 (H. R. 2771), to provide credit for salary purposes to carriers advanced from the status of village delivery. Post Office Department reported unfavorable on account of "cost."

February 15, 1949: H. R. 2739, to promote and maintain amicable relations between the Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General and the employees in the field service of the surface and air postal transport by the establishment of a board of arbitration. Post Office Department report opposed as too beneficial to employees.

March 15, 1949: H. R. 3556 (S. 1907), to amend the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1945 regarding personnel ceilings. Bureau of Budget report unfavorable while Post Office Department reported favorable.

March 15, 1949: H. R. 3557, air mail field railway postal clerks time allowance for service on lay-off periods. Post Office Department report unfavorable.

May 9, 1949: H. R. 4595 (H. R. 4495, 4395), this bill became Public Law 428 on October 28, 1949. Provides increase in the basic pay rates of employes in the field service of the Post Office Department by $120 per annum for all postmasters and employees paid on an annual basis, except fourth-class postmasters who receive an increase of 5 percent and employees paid on an hourly basis who receive an increase of 2½ cents per hour. Supervisors and postmasters are granted longevity pay increases of $100—5 percent for fourth-class postmasters—at the end of 13, 18, and 25 years of service, counting all years of service. Three longevity grades are provided for classes of employees not now receiving any, one longevity grade to those now receiving two so that all employees having automatic grades will also have a series of three longevity grades. All new appointees to regular positions will be appointed in grade 3, present appointments in regular positions in a grade lower than 3 will be placed in grade 3, and substitutes and temporary employees will be placed in grade 3 after 1 year of service. In determining longevity grades provided in this legislation and in Public Law 134, Seventy-ninth Congress, postal employees may be given credit for all years of service for which credit has not been received.

NOTE.—As the bill passed the House, it also contained provisions for 5 days additional annual leave and a uniform allowance. These provisions were taken out of the bill in conference at the insistence of Senate conferees.

August 5, 1949: H. R. 5905, grant certain peacetime veterans and their unmarried widows preference in employment where Federal funds are disbursed. Comptroller General and Civil Service reports unfavorable.

January 4, 1950: H. R. 6600 (H. R. 8143), automatic annual pay increases for postmasters. Comptroller General report unfavorable. Bill is still in subcommittee.

January 16, 1950: H. R. 6774 (H. R. 397, H. R. 398, H. R. 7305, H. R.7908), uniforms for employees of the United States Government Bureau of the Budget—defer consideration. Civil Service Commission—favorable. Post Office Department—unfavorable.

March 30, 1950: H. R. 7936 (H. R. 7909), providing a minimum daily automotive-equipment maintenance allowance to special-delivery messengers in post offices of the first class, and requiring the use of messengers' vehicles under certain circumstances. Comptroller General, Post Office Department, and Bureau of the Budget reports were unfavorable.

In addition to these measures which I introduced myself and sought favorable legislative action, I have supported the following bills of particular interest to you:

Public Law 381 (approved October 25, 1949), providing an increase of 1 cent a mile in equipment maintenance allowance for rural carriers.

Public Law 500 (approved May 3, 1950), designed to clarify the Comptroller General's decision on Public Law 428. In so doing, it permitted rural carriers, custodial employees, special delivery messengers and clerks in third-class post offices and motor-vehicle employees to count all of their time in the postal service toward their longevity grades.

Public Law 29 (approved March 29, 1949), eliminates necessity for reappointment in cases of postmasters whose post offices are advanced from fourth class to a higher class or where post offices of a higher class are relegated to fourth class.

Public Law 214 (approved August 8, 1949), clarifies laws relating to the compensation of postmasters by providing the Postmaster General with authority to retain fourth-class post offices in the salary grade and class to which they were advanced because of unusual conditions until the annual adjustment is made at end of fiscal year.

Public Law 257 (approved August 22, 1949), provides that automatic promotions for part-time employees in the Custodial Service of Post Office Department shall be based on a calendar year rather than on present procedure requiring 2,024 hours of service.

Public Law 288 (approved September 7, 1949), provided that with respect to the computation of night differential for employees in the field service of Post Office Department, night work shall be defined as any work performed between the hours of 6 p. m. and 6 a. m., and either standard or daylight saving time shall be used, depending upon whichever time is observed where such night work is performed.

Public Law 310 (approved September 30, 1949), provides for extending survivorship benefits to widowers of employees retiring under the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1930 (present law extends such benefits to widows), and changes the reduction factor in the annuities of the retiring employees from 10 to 5 percent on the first $1,500 per annum of such annuities and retains existing law of a 10 percent reduction factor on that portion of the annuities exceeding $1,500.

Public Law 552 (approved June 15, 1950), authorizes the Postmaster General to detail employees to postal units at armed services camps and to authorize allowances not exceeding $4 per day in lieu of actual expenses.

Public Law 577 (approved June 27, 1950), permits the Postmaster General to renew star route mail contracts for 4 years at the same rate as the original contract. Permits renewals with subcontractors who have performed satisfactory service for at least 1 year.

Public Law 601 (approved July 6, 1950), allows annuitants retired prior to April 1, 1948, to retain or accept an increased annuity (civil service retirement), and at the same time name his spouse as survivor annuitant.

H. R. 87, to grant a pro-rata credit for time spent in military service toward automatic promotions of veterans who entered the postal service following their military service. This bill has passed the House twice, the second time being passed over the President's veto. However, the Presidential veto was sustained in the Senate and the proposal is dead for this session of Congress.

H. R. 8195 (bill passed the House only), to restore postal service curtailments made by the recent order of the Postmaster General. This bill has passed the House and is pending on the Senate Calendar.

H. R. 8711 (bill pending before House), to provide that employees in the custodial service of the Post Office Department who were transferred by Executive order to the General Services Administration would continue to be paid under the provisions of Public Law 134, Seventy-ninth Congress, as amended, the Postal Employees Classification and Salary Act. Companion bill, S. 3812, passed Senate.

EXPRESSED APPRECIATION

I also take this opportunity to thank the editors of the official postal magazines and publications for the many fine articles they have printed about my work during the years I have been a member of the Post Office Committee. Let us bind the people of the world by a chain that can never be broken, and set about providing means for intercommunication so that common interest and common understanding may prevail.

Amendments to Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the Social Security Act passed by the Eighty-first Congress are now law. The new provisions extend a measure of security in their old age to 10,000,000 additional Americans. Social-security benefits are raised in recognition of today's higher cost of living. I am convinced that our social-security system should be extended even further, so as to cover all working men and women. But these amendments are an important step forward and I was glad to vote for them.

Because of the widespread interest in this matter, I include an excellent series of question and answers entitled "Your New Social Security" and prepared by the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance of the Federal Security Agency:

YOUR NEW SOCIAL SECURITY

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The President has signed the 1950 amendments to the Social Security Act. They are now part of the law.

The new law provides for increasing present old-age and survivors insurance benefit payments beginning with the payment for September 1950. Also beginning in September 1950, any person aged 65 or over may qualify for immediate payments if he has as much as six calendar quarters of work under social security.

The provisions of the new law extending social-security coverage for the first time to certain kinds of work will become effective on January 1, 1951.

Beginning January 1, 1951, Federal old-age and survivors insurance under the social-security law will affect nearly 8,000,000 additional workers and their families; it may also affect about 2,000,000 more workers, to whom coverage may be extended through special arrangements. This will bring the number of workers who may have social-security protection to about 45,000,000, representing three-fourths of the Nation's paid workers.

The purpose of this pamphlet is to anticipate and answer the more obvious questions that may be prompted by the new social-security law.

General

1. What is Federal old-age and survivors insurance?

It is a family insurance plan provided by the social-security law, and operated by the United States Government.

2. What is the purpose of this insurance?

To compensate, in some measure, for loss of earnings in old age, and to give some protection to the family if the insured wage earner should die.

3. How is this insurance financed?

Insurance payments to beneficiaries come from a fund made up of the social-security tax contributions of employees, employers, and the self-employed.

4. What kinds of insurance payments are made?

There are three kinds of payments:

(a) Monthly retirement payments to insured persons and their families.

(b) Monthly survivors payments to the families of insured workers who die.

(c) Lump-sum payments to an insured worker's widow or widower, or to the person who paid the worker's burial expenses. This lump sum will be paid even when there is a survivor who is immediately eligible for monthly insurance payments.

5. How do you earn these insurance payments?

By earning enough in wages or self-employment income over a sufficient length of time in work that comes under the law. These requirements are measured in quarters of coverage.

6. What is a quarter of coverage?

The calendar year is divided into four 3-month periods or quarters, ending March 31, June 30, September 30, and December 31. Each calendar quarter in which an employee is paid wages of $50 or more in covered employment is a quarter of coverage for determining his insurance status under social security.

For self-employed persons, a quarter of coverage is a calendar quarter in which he has been credited with at least $100 of self-employment income. Four quarters of coverage are credited for each year in which self-employment income is $400 or more.

7. What is meant by a covered job, or covered work?

Any kind of job, work, occupation or business in which the wages or the self-employment income count toward old-age and survivors insurance.

8. What changes were made in the kinds of work that count toward Federal old-age and survivors insurance?

Most jobs in private industry and commerce have counted toward social-security payments since January 1, 1937. Many of the kinds of work that formerly were not under the social-security law were brought under it by the 1950 amendments, effective January 1, 1951.

9. What kinds of work are newly covered by social security?

Among the kinds of work which will count toward social-security protection beginning January 1, 1951, are nonfarm self-employment, regular farm work, and household work in private homes. Under certain conditions, employees of religious, charitable educational, and other nonprofit organizations, and employees of State and local governments may come under the law beginning January 1, 1951.

10. What kinds of work do not count toward social-security payments?

The owner or operator of a farm does not get credit toward old-age and survivors insurance payments from his farm earnings. Income gained from self-employment as a physician, lawyer, dentist, professional engineer, and certain other professions is not counted toward social-security benefits.

NOTE.—In all of the above cases it is self-employment that does not count toward social security. The salary of a person employed as a lawyer, doctor, etc., will count toward old-age and survivors insurance protection.

The wages paid to a child under 21 by his father or mother, to a husband by his wife, to a wife by her husband, or to a parent by his son or daughter, do not count toward social security, nor do the wages paid to a minister or member of a religious order for performing the duties required by their religious orders.

Some kinds of employment by the Federal Government have been brought under the law, but Federal jobs covered by other retirement systems are excluded.

Employment by State and local governments and by certain nonprofit organizations is not covered by the law, but some of these jobs may be brought under the law at the option of the employing organization. In the case of the nonprofit organizations, the agreement of two-thirds of the employees is also necessary.

11. How do you qualify for retirement benefits?

Monthly retirement benefits are payable at age 65, if the worker is fully insured. Supplementary benefits are payable, when the worker qualifies for retirement benefits, to his dependent children under age 18 and to his wife. A husband may receive benefits at age 65 on his wife's social-security account if he is dependent on her for support and if she is currently insured as well as fully insured when she retires at or after age 65.

12. How do you qualify for survivors' benefits?

Monthly survivors' benefits are payable at death if the worker was either fully or currently insured. If a worker was fully insured, benefits may be paid to his dependent children under 18, to his widow (in some cases his divorced wife) if she is caring for the children, to his widow who is age 65 or over, and sometimes to his dependent aged parents. The dependent widower of a fully insured woman worker may qualify for a widower's benefit at 65 if his wife was also currently insured at her death. If the worker was only currently insured at death, no benefits are provided for survivors at age 65 but any of the other benefits may be paid.

A lump-sum death benefit is paid if the worker died either fully or currently insured.

13. How does a worker become fully insured?

He must have six quarters of coverage in every case and also either one quarter of coverage for each two calendar quarters after January 1, 1951; or one quarter of coverage for each two calendar quarters after he became 21 years old; or 40 quarters of coverage.

14. How does a worker become currently insured?

A worker is currently insured if he had at least six quarters of coverage within the 3 years just before his death or just before his entitlement to old-age insurance benefits.

15. Is it easier to become fully insured now than before the 1950 amendments?

Yes, many people, now 65 or over, may begin to have ipsurance payments immediately. Newly covered workers are enabled to qualify for benefits much more quickly than before. About 500,000 additional persons may be paid benefits in 1951.

16. Will any people be able to claim benefits now, although they did not qualify before the law was amended?

Yes. A person who is 65 or over on September 1, 1950, needs only 1½ years of employment to be eligible for benefits. He is immediately eligible if he has already had that much work under the law.

A wife under 65 may now receive benefits if she has in her care a child who is entitled to child insurance benefits on her husband's wage records.

The divorced former wife of a deceased insured worker may in some cases receive benefits on his record if she is caring for his children.

A child may qualify for monthly benefits on his mother's record more easily under the new law than before.

A dependent husband or widower of a fully and currently insured woman who is entitled to old-age and survivors insurance benefits or who died after August 1950 is now eligible for insurance payments when he becomes 65.

17. Suppose a worker died before the amendments were enacted and was not insured. Will his survivors be eligible for benefits under the amendments?

No. The old eligibility requirements remain in effect for persons who died before September 1, 1950.

18. Does the amount of the insurance payment depend on a worker's earnings?

Yes. The law in effect up to September 1950 also counted the number of years of employment and that law will continue to be used in many cases. Where the old system of figuring benefits is used, the benefit will be increased by a table given in the new law. Beginning in July 1952, the formula given in the new law will be used where it will result in a higher payment.

19. How much will benefits be under the new law?

When the benefit formula in the new law is used, the old-age benefit amount will be one-half of the average monthly wage for persons with an average monthly wage of $100 or less. For those whose wages average between $100 and $300, the benefit amount will be between one-half and one-quarter of the average monthly wage. A newly retired worker who is entitled to payment will get at least $20 even if his average monthly wage is less than $40.

20. What is the amount of the social security tax?

Until the end of 1953 the amount will be 1½ percent each for employer and employee. The rate will then be 2 percent from 1954 to 1959, 2½ percent from 1960 to 1964, 3 percent from 1965 to 1969, and 3¼ percent after 1969.

Only the first $3,000 of wages in a year is taxable through 1950. Beginning in 1951 the first $3,600 is taxed. (This question applies only to wage income. For tax rates on income from self-employment, see question 29.)

21. Are benefits paid automatically upon attainment of age 65 or death?

No. A claim must be filed before any insurance payments are made. It is very important to remember this because the law permits monthly payments to go back for only 6 months from the date on which the claim is filed. The lump sum can be paid only if a claim is filed within 2 years of the worker's death.

22. Where are benefit claims filed?

The place to make claims for insurance benefits under old-age and survivors insurance is the nearest social-security office. A person 65 or over, who has been employed in work covered by social security, should go to that office for advice about his insurance status, even though he has not yet retired.

23. Do those already receiving old-age and survivors insurance benefits have to file new claims to get the larger benefits?

No. The law provides that all benefits in effect at the time the law was changed will be raised under the special table of benefit increases. Beneficiaries will receive the larger amounts beginning with the September checks to be issued early in October 1950.

24. Does a person have to be in need before he can claim benefits?

No. This is an insurance program. A retired worker, his wife or widow, and minor children may qualify for benefits without regard to their financial resources, such as savings, property, or other insurance. Husbands, widowers, and parents, however, must establish that the worker on whose record they claim benefits had been furnishing at least half their support.

25. Can a person receive monthly insurance benefits if he has earnings from work?

Beneficiaries aged 75 and over may receive benefits regardless of the amount of their earnings. A beneficiary under that age will have his benefits suspended if he does more than a limited amount of work. If he works for wages in covered employment, he may earn as much as $50 in a month and still accept his social-security check for that month. If he engages in covered self-employment and his earnings are in excess of $600 during a taxable year, his benefits are not payable for those months in which he is so engaged.

When an individual works for wages which would cause a suspension of his benefits or is engaged in self-employment and expects to have net earnings from self-employment which may result in a suspension of benefits, he should report to the nearest social security field office immediately.

26. Can a person receive monthly insurance payments if he has income from any sources besides earnings from work?

Yes. Once a person has qualified for benefits, he may receive payments even though he has income from capital investment, such as annuities, rentals from real estate, dividends from stocks, or interest on bonds.

27. What kinds of self-employment are covered by the new social-security law?

In general, most kinds of trades, crafts, or businesses in which the owner or partner works for himself. The sole owner or partner operating a store, shop, garage, lunchroom, and so forth; the independent contractor; the artist and the writer may build up old-age and survivors insurance protection under this new part of the law.

Not included for social-security purposes is income from self-employment as a farm operator, physician, lawyer, dentist, osteopath, chiropractor, optometrist, naturopath, veterinarian, architect, certified, licensed, or full-time practicing accountant, Christian Science practitioner, professional engineer, or funeral director.

28. What amount of earnings must a self-employed person have to be covered by social security?

If self-employment net earnings amount to $400 or more in any 1 year, they will be credited toward old-age and survivors insurance payments.

29. What is the contribution rate for self-employed persons?

A self-employed person will contribute 2¼ percent of his income from self-employment in 1951. This rate will continue through 1953. Beginning in 1954 and through 1959 the rate will be 3 percent. It will be 3¾ percent through 1964, 4½ percent through 1969, and 4⅞ percent thereafter. Only the first $3,600 of total wage and self-employment income is taxable.

30. How will the self-employed person pay his social-security tax?

His contribution toward old-age and survivors insurance protection for himself and his family will be payable at the time he files his income-tax return. The self-employed person will make his first contribution in 1952 when he files his 1951 return. At that time, he will fill in a special schedule which he will find on his income-tax form. This will be his report on his self-employment income for 1951. This schedule will be detached from his income-tax report form by the collector of internal revenue, who will forward it to the Social Security Administration. This self-employment income will be credited to his social-security account.

31. How will prior "covered" employment affect the self-employed?

Any wages a self-employed person previously earned in a job covered by social security will still be listed on his social-security account. These previously earned wages will help to establish his insured status and will be considered in determining his wage for retirement or survivors insurance payments. His self-employment income will be credited to his social-security account in the same manner.

Household workers

32. Are all household workers covered?

Only regularly employed workers in a private home will be covered by social security. "Regularly" employed applies to a household employee who is paid $50 or more in wages by an employer for work in one calendar quarter, and who worked for that employer on at least 24 different days in the same calendar quarter or in the calendar quarter just before it.

33. Is a chauffeur considered a household worker?

Yes, if the automobile he drives is for family use only. Butlers, valets, grooms, footmen, as well as cooks, housemaids, nursemaids, housekeepers, etc., are considered to be household workers. Laundresses, gardeners, and furnacemen are regular household workers, too, if they meet the conditions described in the previous answer.

34. Are room and board considered a part of cash wage for a household worker?

No. Only wages paid in cash, not wages paid in kind. For instance, only carfare paid in cash (not in car checks or car tokens) can be counted as part of cash wages.

35. Do close relatives of a household employer get social-security credit for their work?

The employer's child under 21, spouse, or parent does not receive social-security credit for work done in that household. All other relatives are covered by the law, and may receive social-security credit for their wages if they meet the 24-day–$50 test.

36. How do you report your household workers?

On a simple and brief report form, furnished to household employers by the United States collector of internal revenue. The household employer fills in the name and social-security number of the worker and the amount of cash wages paid to the employee during that quarter. This report is sent quarterly to the collector of internal revenue together with the tax on the worker's wages. The tax is 3 percent—one-half to be deducted from the cash wages, one-half contributed by the household employer.

37. May household workers be reported with other employees?

Yes. If the household employer is already making social-security reports (Form 941) as sole owner of a business or professional practice, the houseworker may be reported on that form, together with his nonhousehold employees. If the husband of the household employer is the sole owner of a business or professional practice, the report on his wife's household worker may be included in the report on his business employees sent from his office.

38. If a household employee leaves before working on 24 different days in a calendar quarter, or 24 different days in the preceding quarter, what should the employer do about the tax?

If, by agreement with the worker, the tax has been withheld from her weekly cash wages up to the time of leaving, it should be refunded. It will not be necessary to send in a report on her wages.

Veterans of World War II and survivors of World War II servicemen

39. Are World War II servicemen's rights under social security affected by the new law?

Yes. The amended law provides wage credits of $160 for each month of active military or naval service in World War II. This applies to men and women who had 90 days or more of active military service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947, and were not dishonorably discharged. Those who died in service or were discharged because of service-connected disability are not required to have 90 days of service.

40. Will these wage credits be affected by Veterans' Administration pension or compensation?

No. Veterans' Administration payments will not affect social-security benefits under the new law. However, if other Federal retirement benefits are based on the veterans' military or naval service in World War II, these special wage credits will not be counted toward social-security benefits.

Farm workers

41. What farm workers are covered?

Only regular farm workers. A farm worker is "regular" if:

(a) He works continuously for one farm operator during an entire calendar quarter.

(b) He does farm work on at least 60 days for this same employer on a full-time basis in the succeeding calendar quarter and received $50 or more in cash wages for his work. He continues to be a regular farm worker for the same employer as long as he meets these requirements in each succeeding calendar quarter.

(c) He also is a regular worker if he is paid $50 or more cash wages in a calendar quarter and was a regular worker for the same employer in the preceding calendar quarter.

42. Is a cook or household worker on a farm covered?

Yes. A cook in the farm household or on the farm or ranch, and other household workers on a farm operated for profit are considered farm workers and subject to the same conditions as a regular farm employee.

43. Are room and board or house rent considered a part of cash wages for a regular farm worker?

No. Only wages paid in cash are counted. Room, board, house rent, farm products, firewood, etc., cannot be counted as wages.

44. How do you report these workers?

On a form (Form 941) furnished to the employer by the United States collector of internal revenue. The employer fills in the name and social security number of the employee and the amount of cash wages paid to the worker in that quarter. This report is sent quarterly to the collector of internal revenue together with the tax on the employee's wages. The tax through 1953 is 3 percent—one-half deducted by the employer from the worker's wages—one-half contributed by the employer.

45. Are any other agricultural workers covered?

Yes. Employees of farm cooperatives handling any agricultural commodity, employees of commercial handlers of fruits and vegetables who are getting these products ready for market, and employees of certain agricultural businesses not located on farms, such as poultry hatcheries, are covered. All of the work of these employees is now covered under social security, regardless of length of employment or amount of wages.

Nonprofit organizations

46. What is meant by a "nonprofit" organization?

For social security purposes this means any charity or any educational, religious, scientific or literary organization, no part of whose earnings go to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

47. How many employees of nonprofit organizations come under the new social-security program?

The employees will come under the new law only if the employing organization accepts social-security coverage and files with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a certificate to that effect. This certificate must be accompanied by a list containing the name, address, and social-security number of each employee who wishes to have social-security coverage. If at least two-thirds of the employees of that organization agree to the filing of the certificate, social-security coverage will be extended to employees of that organization.

48. Would all employees of the organization then come under social security?

No. Only the two-thirds or more employees who expressed by signature their wish to be covered, plus all new employees of that organization hired after the certificate is in effect.

State and local government employees

49. How can State and local government employees have social-security coverage?

If the State enters into an agreement with the Federal Government to accept coverage for any one or more groups of State employees, or employees of a political subdivision of the State.

50. Would all employees of those groups then have social-security coverage?

All employees of the groups specified in the agreement, except those employees in any of the groups who were covered by a State or local retirement system in effect at the time of the State-Federal agreement.

51. How about employees of State or local government-operated transportation systems?

Employees of some transportation systems operated by State or local governments are not subject to this State-Federal Government agreement. They will have social-security coverage, beginning January 1, 1951, if their system was taken over by the State or local government after 1936 and prior to 1951.

Supplementing this pamphlet is a series of leaflets giving more detailed information about the new social security law as it affects the several groups of workers, their families, or their survivors. These leaflets may be secured at your local social-security office.

Give the Sportsmen a Break

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, since my Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota is the center of activity for scores of sportsmen in "The Land of 10,000 Lakes," I desire at this time to make a report on my activities during the Eighty-first Congress in behalf of these sportsmen.

In making this report, I am following a policy which has been established for many years past and which recently was carried out by our President.

During the first session of this Congress, I introduced H. R. 2648, a bill to establish the Fish and Wildlife Advisory Board. This is how the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created in the Fish and Wildlife Service of the Department of the Interior a board to be known as the Fish and Wildlife Advisory Board. It shall be the duty of the Board to consult with and to advise the director of the Fish and Wildlife Service with respect to ways and means of improving the Fish and Wildlife Service. This would achieve increasingly effective cooperation between such service and similar State agencies. The Board shall meet at such times and places as the director of the Fish and Wildlife Service may direct.

SEC. 2. The governor of each State, Alaska, and Hawaii may, if he so desires, appoint one member of the Board. The term of office of members of the Board shall be for 2 years, and any vacancy occurring in the membership of the Board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The Board shall elect a chairman from among its members. Members of the Board shall receive no compensation for their services as such, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Board.

H. R. 2648 is a good bill. It would give an opportunity for members of sportsmen's groups throughout the country to have an exchange of views, ideas, and programs in regard to the meritorious matters that the various groups in different parts of the country have in mind. Opinions could be exchanged in connection with wildlife restoration programs or any other policy or program in connection with fish, wildlife, and game.

The Department of the Interior, however, was opposed to my bill. And that is logical. I find that the average bureaucrat—the average person in the administrative side of the Government—does not want public interference or advice. The bureaucrat does not want congressional interference or at least interest on the part of Congress or the general public in any policy or program.

I know that from my long experience with many Government departments and agencies that operate under the present administration in Washington. They oppose anything that might happen to represent a public interpretation of feelings throughout the country on any policy or program.

Statements by Representative ALVIN F. WEICHEL, of Ohio—taken from the official record of the committee hearing on my bill on March 16, 1950—elaborate further on this bureaucratic interference. Mr. WEICHEL is a member of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries which was holding the hearing on my bill.

Said Mr. WEICHEL:

> The Fish and Wildlife Service * * * want advice from nobody, which was evidenced before this committee on various occasions * * * they object to everything except their pay.

Mr. WEICHEL continued:

> I think the thought expressed in this proposed legislation is a very worthy one with reference to the sportsmen and recreation people of the country having an opportunity to make their views known. After all, it is the people we want to serve—not the Fish and Wildlife Service.

It was this bureaucracy that blocked my bill. As a result, the sportsmen of my area and other parts of the country are deprived of having a voice in matters that could have been considered by my proposed Fish and Wildlife Advisory Board.

A voice must be raised in behalf of the sportsmen against the obstructionist tactics of the gigantic bureaucracy in Washington.

Other measures that have come before the Congress that would benefit the sportsmen have received my full support. Among these measures that I backed was the Dingell bill which was recently enacted into law. This bill provides that the Federal excise taxes on fishing equipment be divided among the States for the purpose of fish propagation and other methods of improving fishing. Minnesota will receive approximately $200,000 annually under the law.

ROSEAU WILDLIFE REFUGE PROJECT

I am glad to report to the sportsmen of the Ninth District that construction on the Roseau Wildlife Refuge project will get under way early in 1951. The Roseau Wildlife Refuge project will serve two purposes:

First. It will take land of no productive value and make it a part of an area to hold water to provide a habitat for ducks, geese, and fur-bearing animals.

Second. It also will hold back waters coming into the area in a large reservoir and thereby help to prevent periodic flood conditions in the Roseau River.

I was glad to cooperate from the very beginning in the development and progress of this very fine wildlife project.

I have taken out fishing and hunting licenses—both large and small game—for each of the last 28 years, so naturally I have the interest of our sportsmen at heart. I have hunted and fished in all parts of the Ninth District so I know the area and its problems.

FISH APPLICATIONS

Sportsmen interested in stocking their favorite lake can secure a supply of fish from the Fish and Wildlife Service. I will be glad to supply application forms to anyone interested in getting supplies of these fish for stocking suitable fish waters.

In conclusion, I wish to remind the sportsmen of my Ninth District that if I am returned to Congress in January, I shall continue to fight for legislation and wildlife and hunting projects and programs that will be to their benefit and welfare and for our youngsters growing up.

Stockpiling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. KINGSLAND MACY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. MACY. Mr. Speaker, viewed in retrospect, it appears that immediately following World War II we deliberately embarked upon a program of self-destruction. Review of the policies which we have followed since that date makes this incredible situation stand out in bold relief.

I am not at this time referring to our over-all foreign policy but to the fundamental problem of self-defense. We stripped ourselves of our armor and at the same time made available to potential enemies resources vital to our national defense. Not only did we disarm while Russia armed, but we utterly failed to maintain the valuable war potential which we then possessed. Our present crying need for steel for the purposes of national defense would have been much less piercing had we had the foresight to encourage through proper methods the expansion of our steel-making facilities. This could have been readily accomplished by allowing accelerated depreciation schedules on new steel-making facilities.

The Government and the steel industry could also have cooperated in an iron and steel scrap importation program. This would have served the purpose of stabilizing the scrap market and at the same time provided an adequate stockpile of this important steel ingredient. Instead, we permitted millions of tons of scrap to remain in western Germany—scrap which we now desperately need—scrap which lies beyond our grasp but not beyond possible seizure by the Russian Communists.

More than 2 years ago, the Committee To Investigate Questionable Trade Practices, established by unanimous vote of the House and of which I had the honor of being chairman, recommended that both of these actions be taken. We also pointed out that necessary iron and steel scrap should be imported and stockpiled for national defense purposes. I felt then and I am even more satisfied now that these were wise recommendations, as additional evidence of which I wish to offer two articles running in the current press. On Sunday, September 17, there appeared in the New York Times the following article urging accelerated depreciation as a means of encouraging steel expansion. The article follows:

[From the New York Times of September 17, 1950]

WRITE-OFF BIG ITEM IN STEEL EXPANSION—UNITED STATES COULD SPUR PLANT BUILDING BY REVIVING 5-YEAR BASIS, INDUSTRY LEADERS SAY—TAX OUTLOOK DETERRENT—PRESENT PROJECTED CAPACITY HELD AMPLE FOR NEEDS BUT FINANCING IS PROBLEM

(By Thomas E. Mullaney)

The most constructive step the Government could take to encourage further steel expansion would be to reinstitute the World War II provision for 5-year amortization on essential new facilities instead of the 25-year rule under present tax laws, top steel executives said last week.

In response to an inquiry by the New York Times, officials of several leading steel companies declared they still believe that the long-range expansion program projected by the industry will permit a continuing high level of consumer production after all military needs are filled. They added, however, that they could expedite their programs and increase expansion goals if conditions require such steps, but to do this, they will need the accelerated depreciation allowance.

Before the start of the Korean war, the domestic steel industry laid plans for a 6,363,000-ton expansion of raw steel capacity by the end of 1952. Further expansions announced since then assure a greater increase, although one steel executive warned that recently approved higher corporate taxes and the promise of excess profits levies place some of the expansion program in jeopardy.

FINANCING A PROBLEM

"When this large program was prepared by the individual companies," he pointed out, "there was no indication of the imminence of these taxes. Since these programs were undertaken on the belief that taxes would not cut into profits to be used for paying for the facilities, there is a real question now whether the facilities can be financed on a sound basis."

This official advocated the 5-year amortization on a current basis to offset the lower profits available to the industry to pay for its new capacity, costing between $250 and $300 a ton.

The aggregate net profits of steel companies representing 91 percent of the industry's raw-steel output amounted to $1,700,000,000 for the 4 years 1946 to 1949. Of this total, according to the American Iron and Steel Institute, the companies used about $987,000,000 toward the $2,000,000,000 expansion program undertaken up to the close of last year. Borrowings and proceeds from the sale of stock issues supplied the balance.

This heavy drain on profits to pay for the new steel-making facilities installed has been necessary, the industry maintains, because of the inadequacy of depreciation allowances. Depreciation on the present 25-year basis is charged against original cost of each piece of equipment, but with prices of equipment in recent years at least double those of a decade ago, the purchasing power of each dollar in the depreciation charge has shrunk. This is another reason cited by the industry in support of accelerated depreciation if profits are to be skimmed by taxes.

The steel leaders were asked their views on the adequacy of present steel capacity and the expansions now planned following revived assertions earlier last week in Government and labor circles that the industry was not doing enough.

Replying to this, one prominent authority stated: "You don't need a ton of steel for every one who wants it. Steel consumers have gone crazy. We are now making more steel than can be sustained. For instance, we are now providing enough steel to make about 9,000,000 automobiles. That means that in little more than 4 years you will be producing a new automobile for every American family."

E. G. Grace, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corp., commented: "In my opinion, the steel industry will be able to care for military and defense needs in full as far as we can now anticipate for them and at the same time supply a strong domestic economy.

"We do not foresee acute shortages in any steel products for any extended period, assuming that steel is intelligently allocated to meet, first, military requirements, and then real domestic needs.

"The steel industry's current capacity of more than 100,000,000 tons, with 6,000,000 tons in prospect, should be ample.

"If more capacity is desired, the steel companies could hasten completion of their present program and undertake further extension of capacity. Accelerated depreciation should be provided for in the tax law to encourage future additions."

SEES AMPLE CAPACITY

A somewhat similar viewpoint was taken by C. M. White, president of the Republic Steel Corp., who stated: "There is ample capacity for all military and all necessary civilian steel requirements."

Asked if accelerated amortization would help further steel expansion, Mr. White replied: "Definitely."

W. W. Sebald, president of the Armco Steel Corp., remarked: "I don't think steel capacity is far right now from what we will need. Manpower shortages might be a bottleneck toward any further expansion, anyhow."

The Armco president also asserted that a 5-year amortization provision would be very important in the event the Government felt the steel industry should raise its expansion goals to cope with the present emergency. He pointed out that expansion will be difficult now that excess profits taxes are to be invoked.

On previous occasions, Irving S. Olds, chairman of the United States Steel Corp., and Ernest T. Weir, chairman of the National Steel Corp., have emphasized the industry's contention that steel companies are living up to their responsibilities to provide enough steel for the Nation's needs. For some time, also, they have been maintaining that depreciation allowances are not high enough. They have set aside extra, taxable charges in their corporations' financial statements to cover the additional cost of buying new equipment.

The steel industry generally seems to be agreed that capacity will be adequate, but it is ready to admit, as one executive pointed out, that it might be wrong. If such is the case, he said, the industry will need the benefit of accelerated amortization, or depreciation, to raise its expansion goals because the present objectives are the maximum the industry can undertake on a sound financial basis.

Last week, Tuesday, September 12, found in the Washington Daily News the following article pointing out our lack of wisdom in failing to secure unto ourselves the vast quantities of foreign scrap, which were so readily available earlier this year. The article follows:

UNITED STATES STEEL MEN MISCALCULATED—GERMANS PULL SCRAP FROM MARKET

(By James Daniel)

Some of the Nation's top steel executives now are regretting a miscalculation they made only a few months ago in the matter of importing scrap metal from Germany. They didn't buy it when they could get it and now it's withdrawn from the market.

Two years ago the steel industry was using scrap faster than the collectors could provide it. (A ton of steel contains roughly half a ton of scrap—50 percent obtained from the steel mills' own waste and 50 percent from the open market.)

The Commerce Department sponsored a plan whereby United States scrap dealers would form a corporation to buy scrap from the Germans, whose scrap yards were overflowing with war rubble and the civilian accumulation not needed after Germany's defeat.

But Justice Department lawyers pointed out that our antitrust laws permit such joint action only in exporting and the one-corporation plan was dropped.

NO TAKERS

Meanwhile, the steel companies themselves went ahead and during 1948 and early 1949 bought about a million tons of the estimated 10,000,000 tons of scrap which Germany had to sell. Subsequently, scrap prices here declined sharply and late last year the Germans were offering virtually unlimited quantities of scrap with no United States takers.

After the Korean war started, the steel industry took another look at its ore and scrap piles and decided that if World War II history was repeated, scrap prices would rise and force up the cost of steel.

Buyers were sent to Germany. Meanwhile, the West Germans had been given considerable leeway in making their own economic decisions. Their attitude now is that the Bonn government can use all the scrap it has for its own role in the rearmament of free Europe.

LOSS PARTLY OFFSET

Commerce officials here say the loss of this source of scrap is at least in part offset by the reduced foreign demand for our own steel output as a result of greater German production.

Here at home, Government and industry are keeping a close watch on scrap prices.

Scrap is the one element in the cost of steel over which the steel companies have little control. At one time last spring, scrap—No. 1 grade delivered at Pittsburgh, the bellwether grade—was selling around $20 a ton.

REBOUNDED TO $46

Then about May it bounded to $46. It dropped to about $41 or $42 just before the Korean outbreak. Thereafter it jumped back to $46.

At this point the scrap industry and the steel companies decided to forget their usual opposition. They are trying to stabilize the price of scrap at $44. During the past 10 days this has been the prevailing price, though the inflationary tendency has caused mills to pay higher prices for less desirable grades of scrap in "package deals" for grade 1.

Scrap dealers' representatives here say they're anxious to do everything possible to get out more scrap. Currently, they're delivering about 2,500,000 tons a month to the mills, or an annual rate of 29,000,000 tons, higher than in World War II and higher than in 1948, their most productive year.

PUBLIC SCRAP DRIVES?

Will public scrap metal drives be necessary?

Scrap dealers say they hope not. Though the steel mills may urge such drives, scrap dealers say their yards are still cluttered with useless bedsprings and garbage pails from the last war. Density and absence of other metals are prime requirements for good scrap iron and steel.

Mr. Speaker, the blame for our present predicament rests not only with the Government but with certain short-sighted individuals in both the steel and the scrap industry. In this connection, I wish to submit correspondence between myself and Mr. Edwin Barringer, vice president of the Scrap Iron and Steel Institute. You will note that Mr. Barringer took issue with me on the wisdom and necessity of importing scrap steel.

The above-mentioned correspondence follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1950.

Mr. EDWIN C. BARRINGER,
Executive Vice President, Institute of Scrap Iron and Steel, Inc., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BARRINGER: I have your letter of June 14, and wish to thank you for your courtesy in sending me, in advance, a copy of the press release relating to your speech in Columbus, Ohio, on June 15. Unfortunately, due to my absence from the city, I did not have an opportunity to reply sooner.

I appreciate receiving your views concerning my recent statements relative to our present scrap market, and I trust you will bear with me while I attempt to set out more fully in this letter my thoughts on the subject and I shall try to treat separately each of the main points you raise. Briefly, my position is this:

1. The increase of the price of scrap in the past few months of more than 100 percent has added approximately $5 a ton to the cost of making steel and is further inflating our economy.

2. The scrap market should be stabilized by curtailing exports of scrap and increasing imports.

3. By importing scrap (most of which would come from western Germany), we would not only be benefiting our economy and strengthening our national defense, but we would also be removing this vital steel ingredient from the possible grasp of Russia.

Since these points are more fully developed in recent statements I have made on the floor of the House, I am taking the liberty of enclosing copies of the same for your information.

You state that the export of scrap is so infinitesimal at this time that it has no bearing on the domestic situation. However, as you know, the difference between a stable and an unstable market can at times be very small and I believe you will agree that there is an unhealthy lack of stability in the current scrap market. In analyzing the latest figures which I have been able to obtain on the importing and exporting of scrap, it appears that a definite relationship exists between a favorable (or even potentially favorable) balance and prices on the domestic market. For instance, I note that in 1947 when our exports exceeded our imports by 141,101 tons, the price of scrap rose from $31 to $40 a ton. In 1948, when we had a favorable balance of 153,097 tons, the market was stabilized at an average price of $41.66 a ton. And, as you know, in 1949, when our imports exceeded our exports by 669,633 tons, the price of scrap dropped approximately $20 a ton.

The relationship between scrap imports-exports and domestic prices becomes even more evident when broken down on a monthly basis. Starting with September 1949 (the first month of sizable imports following World War II) and listing the plus or minus balances together with the domestic prices for the same periods, we see the following:

	Tonnage balance	Price
1948:
September	+60,961	$43 16
October	+58,417	43 16
November	+33,388	41 04
December	+60,204	43 00
1949
January	+156,477	41 30
February	+189,689	39 50
March	+226,982	36 75
April	+85,622	26 20
May	+74,761	22 25
June	+40,972	21 50
July	−131,693	20 00
August	+15,865	21 00
September	−16,835	27 00
October	−3,233	28 80
November	−5,583	30 75
December	+211	30 30

You will note that the composite price varied only 16 cents during the last 4 months of 1948, when the plus balance remained rather static. However, when imports were greatly increased beginning in January 1949, the price of scrap showed a corresponding decrease. Although the plus balance began to taper off after April of that year, the total imports for the first 4 months were sufficiently large to cause the price of scrap to continue to drop until the beginning of the third quarter. As you will note, the exports of scrap in July exceeded our imports by 131,693 tons and the fall in scrap prices was checked. Thereafter, except for the month of August, there was a minus balance and the price of scrap rose steadily.

I do not mean to imply that the balance between our imports and exports of scrap is the only factor controlling domestic prices, but I do say that when our mills are running at or near capacity production such a balance is a very important factor. And, if the Office of International Trade permits the export of 400,000 tons of scrap during this year, I maintain that it will serve to further disrupt our domestic economy.

Your statement that barring the war years foreign trade of scrap has not been so low in 25 years, has me somewhat puzzled. As I read the Department of Commerce's compilation of scrap exports for the past 25 years, our 1949 exports were only exceeded in 12 other years—and during 7 of those years our exports were unnaturally inflated by tremendous shipments of scrap to Japan, Italy, and Germany. I will not dwell on this except to suggest that it might be well for your industry to exclude this latter period from their calculation when attempting to arrive at what might be considered normal foreign trade.

You also state that no consumer is losing any production owing to the lack of scrap and that there is no shortage of scrap. Although the first part of that statement may be true as a general proposition, I strongly suspect that production is being adversely affected to some extent by our decreasing supply of top-grade scrap—the type which is so plentiful in the Ruhr area of Germany. As to the question of whether there is a shortage of scrap, I believe the answer could be supplied immediately by the pattern of the current prices. Surely the increase of more than 100 percent in the price of scrap during the last few months cannot be attributed entirely to the shrewd business acumen of the scrap dealers. I strongly suspect that the law of supply and demand played a major role much as it did in forcing the prices down during that period in 1949 when we were increasing our imports.

I have noted carefully your statement that the scrap industry feels that it has been discriminated against in the matter of exports since pig iron is not restricted in this respect, and although your statement does not say so, I believe it might give the uninitiated the impression that huge quantities of pig iron are therefore being exported. However, I doubt seriously if your industry would prefer to have scrap exports equalized with pig-iron exports. I say this because I find that in 1946 one and one-half times more scrap than pig was exported; in 1947, five times more scrap than pig was exported; and in 1948, 34½ times more scrap than pig was exported. Under the circumstances, I think you will agree that any discussion of discrimination would be purely academic.

Please do not think that I am unaware of the important position which your industry occupies in our national economy. As a matter of fact, it is this knowledge which has caused me to take the stand I have in an effort to bring stability to the scrap market. I believe that if this can be done the Nation as a whole will be directly benefited.

You have on occasions in the past been kind enough to give me the benefit of the knowledge which you have gained through years of work with the scrap industry, and if at any time you feel that my evaluation of any phase of this business is unsound, I would sincerely appreciate your bringing the matter to my attention. Although I feel that I should apologize for the length of this letter, nevertheless, I find that it is still too short to cover all of the aspects of the initial problem. However, should you so desire, I will be pleased to discuss these things with you in person at a mutually agreeable time.

With kind personal regards, I am

Faithfully yours.

INSTITUTE OF SCRAP IRON & STEEL, INC.,
Washington, D. C., June 14, 1950.

Hon. W. KINGSLAND MACY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am sorry to have to take issue with you but I felt that exports of scrap are so infinitesimal at this time that they have no bearing upon the domestic situation.

There is no shortage of scrap, and no consumer is losing any production owing to the lack of it.

In 1947 and 1948, as in the war years, our industry was pushed to the limit to get out enough scrap.

Then, in 1949, we were dropped like a hot potato and many of our dealers were hard pressed financially. The price of scrap as measured by the Iron Age composite dropped from $43 per ton in October 1948 to $19 in July 1949; in 10 months values were more than cut in half.

This spring when the steel situation showed more vigor than expected consumers flocked back in the market, raising the composite from the low of $19 to about $41 at this time. It takes a little time to get the collection of scrap rolling, it is now in a satisfactory state.

Reverting to exports, we feel we have been discriminated against. After all that has been said about the shortage of iron ore and the necessity for domestic steel mills reaching out to Venezuela, Labrador, and Liberia for iron ore with which to make pig iron, no restrictions whatever are placed on the exportation of pig iron. Nor are there any restrictions on the exportation of steel. There is much more logic in exporting scrap, because it is a recurring crop, than pig iron.

Surely the exportation of scrap to the extent of 1 percent of domestic use has no bearing on the domestic situation.

Cordially yours,

EDWIN C. BARRINGER,
Executive Vice President.

Mr. Barringer's release enclosed with above letter:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, June 15.—Speaking here tonight at a joint meeting of the Cincinnati and Northern Ohio chapters of the Institute of Scrap Iron & Steel, Edwin C. Barringer, executive vice president of the institute, answered criticism by Representative W. KINGSLAND MACY that exports of iron and steel scrap should be restricted and more scrap should have been imported from western Germany.

"In the first 4 months of this year exports of scrap have totaled 107,000 net tons, amounting to 1 percent of the 10,520,000 net tons consumed domestically," said Barringer.

"Foreign trade in scrap, always a factor in the national economy, has not been at so low an ebb in 25 years barring, of course, the war years. Practically every ton of scrap that leaves this country goes to Canada and Mexico, which traditionally rely on the United States for part of their supplies of scrap.

"As a matter of fact, it is a paradox that scrap for export is still under Government license whereas pig iron, a similar raw material, made from iron ore which is getting in such short supply that overseas sources of supply must be found, is an unlimited export basis."

Barringer, who was a member of the War Department European mission which recommended in 1945 that all Government scrap and potential scrap be returned to the United States, pointed out that since last fall German civilian scrap has been on an unrestricted basis so far as exports from Germany are concerned except for the prohibition against its being shipped behind the iron curtain.

"There is no shortage of scrap and no production of steel is being lost on account of it," stated Barringer. "During 1949 consumers went out of the market, permitting scrap to fall below OPA price levels in most districts. This spring consumers returned en masse, finding dealers' yards bare. Now the machinery of collection and preparation has been revived, and stable market conditions are returning.

Mr. Speaker, although the time is drawing short, I feel we still have the opportunity for remedying the situation in which we find ourselves—a situation which is due primarily to blundering or worse on the part of people who should have known better.

August Paulsen—An Emigrant Boy That Took Advantage of the Opportunities the West Affords and Made Good in Mining

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the history of the development of the great Hercules mine in the famous Coeur d'Alene mining district in Idaho and the sturdy pioneer that brought the mine into production reads like a romance.

The following biographical sketch is taken from the hearings of the Committee on Public Lands, House Resolution 66, inserted here for the information of the Members of the House:

RECORD OF A PIONEER MINING MAN OF THE COEUR D'ALENE MINING DISTRICT—AUGUST PAULSEN

August Paulsen was born July 29, 1871, in Denmark, living there until 19, when he came to America. He arrived in Chicago June 1, 1891, and followed farm work in Illinois until September 1892, when he came to Spokane.

WORKED AT $6 A MONTH

Shortly after arriving in Spokane he went to work for a dairy company just east of the city at $6 a month. The company later failed and Mr. Paulsen went to Wallace, Idaho, in 1894. There he again engaged in the dairy business with Sylvester Markwell. By 1896 Mr. Paulsen had saved some money, being economical and thrifty, and when given the opportunity he purchased a quarter interest in the Hercules mine for $850. He retained this interest until the time of his death.

The story of the development of the Hercules mine reads with all the flavor of a romance. It is a story of confidence of men in their own knowledge and ability, backed by judgment and the hardest kind of back-breaking labor. It is a story of denial and poverty, which in the end led to great wealth, not only to the men themselves but to the country in which they lived and helped to develop.

Until December 1901, Mr. Paulsen worked in the mine during the summer and handled the dairy business during the winter.

WAS POOR MAN'S MINE

The Hercules mine was essentially a poor man's mine. Associated with Mr. Paulsen were the Day brothers, Harry L., a mill man and bookkeeper; Eugene, a storekeeper at Kellogg; and Jerome, at school; C. H. (Dad) Reeves, a barber, now living in Spokane; L. W. Hutton, Spokane, then a locomotive engineer; Frank M. Rothrock, Spokane, then a provision dealer; Damion Cardoner, storekeeper; and the dairymen, the Markwells. Attorney H. F. Samuels later became interested, but sold out soon afterwards.

These men put all their earnings into the development of the mine, never losing faith. The "wise" ones laughed at them and called them fools for spending their money over such a fruitless proposition.

In June 1901 their dream began to materialize and the ore body was struck. It produced at one time 6 percent of the lead in the United States, and although it was shut down early in 1925 it will long remain as one of the happiest memories of the Coeur d'Alenes. That it was developed at at all by a group of men with virtually no capital and that these same men held onto it until the end was in a great measure due to August Paulsen.

HARD, HAND DRILLING

To reach the first ore the men had to drill a tunnel 1,500 feet through solid rock by hand. Sometimes there would be five men working, sometimes two, or even one. The owners worked out their assessments and persevered. When the ore body was struck it proved to be the best in the district, being a high grade of carbonate and galena carrying good values in silver.

The working of the mine called for hard manual labor upon the part of the partners. Mr. Paulsen put all his wages into the property, as did the other partners. The men were too poor to pay for the hauling in of the necessary timbers and at times one or two of them would go out and cut the timbers and haul them to the mine by hand.

Mr. Paulsen often related how they carried their supplies on their backs to the mine and one time in particular when he had taken a wheelbarrow and a few other things 1,500 feet up the mountain side on his back when the snow was soft and deep. He stated that he had traveled most of the way on his hands and knees.

PRODUCED $100,000,000

Since that time the mine has produced $100,000,000 and has paid dividends of approximately $18,000,000. After the closing down of the Hercules mine proper the partners incorporated the Hercules Mining Co. to work several other claims. During its remarkable career it had been operated on a partnership.

The mine itself was one of the wonders of the mining world. At one time the ore body was 53 feet wide and the east face on the 400-foot level contained streaks of high-grade ore 6 to 8 feet in width so rich that it was propelled out in wheelbarrows on a narrow plank for a long time.

In 1901 the mine produced 362 tons of ore and paid a dividend of $8,000. In 1902 it produced 5,003 tons with dividends of $94,200; 1903, 10,043 tons, $257,000; while in 1914 it produced 60,560 tons with dividends amounting to $2,176,000. Up until 1916 it paid out dividends to the partners nearly $10,000,000. From 1916 until 1925 it paid them $8,000,000 more.

BUILT OFFICE STRUCTURE

Since the mine was developed, Mr. Paulsen had been actively engaged in work in Spokane. In 1911 he completed the 11-story building at Riverside and Stevens which bears his name. The office building is thoroughly modern and one of the first strictly office buildings in the city.

Statehood for Hawaii and Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK P. GRAHAM
OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement prepared by me on the subject of statehood for Hawaii and Alaska.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK P. GRAHAM, OF NORTH CAROLINA, IN FAVOR OF THE ADMISSION OF HAWAII AND ALASKA INTO THE UNION

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII

The admission of Hawaii and Alaska into the American Union of States would have significant meaning for the people of these two Territories, for the people of the United States, and for the free peoples of the world. Hawaii has been a possession of the United States for 52 years; Alaska for 83 years. Both have served probationary periods as Territories longer than the average period served by the American States admitted since 1789. Both have most strategic geographic, commercial, and defense positions in relation to the Pacific-Asiatic world. Statehood would strengthen the Hawaiian and Alaskan position against communism. Now is a most strategic time for the admission of both as timely expressions of the self-determination of peoples and for the defense of freedom in the world.

Hawaii is composed of seven main islands which are the tops of volcanic mountains, some of which rise from the ocean bed to a height beyond the height which any other mountains in the world have risen from a land base. The original people were Polynesians and are related to the fine stock of Indonesian and Southeastern Asiatic peoples who came in their big boats with masterful seamanship across the great waters in the dim past of the dispersion of these remarkable people. The great explorer, Capt. James H. Cook, of the British Navy, discovered these islands in 1778.

American influence on the island began with the coming of 17 missionaries from New England in 1820. Under President Franklin Pierce, Secretary of State William L. Marcy's treaty for annexation of the islands failed because it provided for immediate admission as a State into the Union. Hawaii, by the special invitation of the Hawaiian Legislature, was annexed to the United States as a joint resolution of Congress in 1898, and was made a Territory in 1900.

Polynesian, American, Asiatic, and European peoples contribute to the robust variety of the civilization on islands which have become a proving ground of the values of a composite culture and the voluntary, harmonious relation of the races. In 1948 the population of Hawaii numbered 533,000, and is larger than the population of most of our States at the time of their admission. These people proved their loyalty to America in a crucial time. The heroic record of the Japanese-Hawaiian soldiers in World War II is almost unparalleled in American history.

The resources in sugar, pineapples, coffee, vegetables, fisheries, and shipping provide an economically self-sustaining basis for a prosperous and enlightened commonwealth. In production of pineapples Hawaii leads the world. The commerce between the mainland of the United States and Hawaii was surpassed in 1940 only by Great Britain, Canada, France, Japan, and Germany. The death rate of the Hawaiian people is lower than that of any State.

In education and the arts the people are well advanced. Their agricultural research agencies of Hawaii, the School of Tropical Agriculture, the Oriental Institute, the Art Museum, the School of Drama give expression to their advanced culture. They are an industrious, self-respecting people and have had 50 years of experience with an elected legislature.

Hawaii is 2,000 miles from San Francisco, most strategic as a way station for ships and planes en route to Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia, the Philippines, the mainland of Asia and Japan. It is an outpost and a stronghold of national defense in the Pacific Ocean. The admission of Alaska will tie these loyal Americans to the United States with even stronger bonds of freedom and democracy at a critical time. Hawaii is a meeting place for the synthesis of eastern and western civilizations. Not only is the position of Hawaii in maritime and aerial transportation and commerce important, but the admission of Hawaii now would be most strategic in time as an offset to false Communist propaganda.

The Hawaiian Legislature has petitioned for admission 14 times. The bill for its admission as a State was passed by the House of Representatives in 1947 and in 1949 by a vote of 262 to 110. When the liberties and self-determination of little nations are being crushed by ruthless dictators in the East and the West, the inclusion of Hawaii in the Union of States would be a signal to the whole world that we sincerely believe in the self-determination of the Hawaiian people and that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

No less significant would be the admission of Alaska. Secretary of State William H. Seward once observed: "The Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and vast regions beyond, will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter." The purchase of Alaska, called Seward's folly, has become, because of the values within Alaska and because of its present position in the world, one of the most farsighted acts of an American statesman. Alaska has become what the name means, "the great land."

After the acquisition of the American Pacific Northwest and of California, Americans on the Pacific coast had a special interest in the fisheries and furs of the Alaskan region. Baron de Stoeckl made a visit to St. Petersburg and soon after his return visited Secretary Seward in his home on the evening of March 29, 1867, and informed him that he had been authorized by the Emperor to negotiate for the transfer of Russian-America to the United States. Upon the Baron's suggestion that they meet next day for that purpose, Secretary Seward seized the night hour for immediate negotiations. At 4 a. m. in the morning of March 30, 1867, the Baron and the Secretary signed the treaty of purchase for $7,200,000.

Despite shortsighted and stubborn opposition, the Senate ratified the treaty May 28, and President Andrew Johnson proclaimed the treaty June 20. The actual transfer was made with solemn ceremonies at Sitka, October 18, 1867, since historic as Alaska Day. Civil administration was granted to the District of Alaska by the Congress in 1884. Alaska was made the Territory of Alaska by the act of Congress in 1912. Both major political parties have declared for the admission of Alaska. The last three Alaskan Legislatures have petitioned for statehood. A referendum of the people favored statehood. The House of Representatives voted to grant statehood to Alaska by the vote of 186 to 146.

The Territory has 586,400 square miles, three-fourths of which are in the north temperate zone. It is twice as large as the State of Texas, one-fifth the size of continental United States and is larger than Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Finland combined. Its population of around 130,000 people, approximately the population of Nevada, is larger than the population of 12 States when they were admitted into the Union.

Alaska is a picturesque region of Indians, Eskimos, Aleuts, and Caucasian peoples, of warm waters to the south and Arctic ice packs in the north, of majestic mountains, torrential waterfalls, and primeval forests, of temperatures ranging from 90° above and 70° below zero, of reindeer and dog trains, railroads, bus lines, and airways. A great future beckons.

The present rich resources in fisheries, minerals, and furs provide the economic base of the Territory. Gold, silver, lead, tungsten, platinum, copper, and coal are the main minerals. Minerals to the value of $1,000,000,000 have been mined since 1867. Salmon, halibut, cod, and herring are the chief fish indigenous to Alaskan waters. The salmon pack is the largest in the world. Dairying and beef cattle are also important. Vast potential resources in forests, oil, and arable land are as yet undeveloped. The forest resources could annually provide 1,000,000 tons of newsprint.

The schools are a credit to the people, the churches and the civil administration of Alaska. The University of Alaska has the foundations for a distinguished State university. Agricultural experiment stations carry on important research at Fairbanks, Petersburg, and Palmer.

The admission of Alaska would give a new impulse to the enterprises and hopes of the peoples of Alaska and a new meaning to its position in our national defense. If there be any defect in this bill then let us correct the bill and not reject Alaska.

Alaska is the American outpost nearest Asia, with only the Bering Straits between. It is the bastion of defense from whose air bases planes could fly over the Arctic ice by the shortest airways to Asia and Europe. Just as the admission of Hawaii would recognize before all the world at a critical time that the Americans sincerely believe in the democratic principle of self-determination of the loyal people of the various western and eastern races on the Pacific islands, so the admission of Alaska would be both a just and timely act in the global war of ideas by the grant of self-determination to these loyal Americans in this our last and strategically important frontier at a strategic time in the history of America and in the cause of freedom and peace in the world.

The admission of Hawaii and Alaska into the American Union of States would have the effect of dropping the highest potential moral bombs on the propaganda line of Communist imperialism in Asia and the Pacific with democratic reverberations in both hemispheres for strengthening the American leadership of the free peoples of the world.

Sex Perverts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a news item from the Washington Post of September 20, 1950.

Mr. Speaker, the news item indicates that there are still individuals in the State Department who must be classified as sex perverts. The man arrested this month was no minor official; he was acting official in charge of the Caribbean Affairs at the State Department.

The morals squad of the District of Columbia in their testimony before the Senate committee indicated they had the names and addresses of nearly 4,000 sex perverts in the District of Columbia. They indicated more than 3,000 were employed in Government. Mr. Speaker, it is high time that these homosexuals and sex perverts be taken off the payroll of the Federal Government. They are dangerous individuals and can be a menace to our security.

The news item follows:

DIPLOMAT, 34, ARRESTED ON SEX CHARGE

Eugene Desvernine, 34, acting officer-in-charge of Caribbean Affairs at the State Department, has been arrested and charged with an assault or attempted assault on a minor, it was disclosed yesterday.

The State Department said the official was immediately suspended without pay pending an investigation.

Desvernine, who lives at 2220 Washington Avenue, Silver Spring, was arrested at 10:30 p. m. last Thursday in East Potomac Park after he had picked up a 13-year-old boy who was hitchhiking, an Interior Department official disclosed.

Booked on a charge of violation of the Miller Act--the so-called Sex Psychopath Act—he was arraigned Friday in municipal court. Judge George D. Neilson set bond at $2,000 and continued the case until October 3.

Milwaukee's Interest in the 1950 Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of the interest of the people of Milwaukee—Wisconsin's largest city—in the November 7, 1950, campaign.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this statement be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

MILWAUKEEANS SPEAK—THEIR LETTERS TO SENATOR WILEY EXPRESS THEIR SUPPORT OF REPUBLICAN PARTY

"We are sick and tired of the Democratic War Party. We are sick and tired of being blundered by the Democrats into war three times in 33 years. We have sent our sons into war in 1917, in 1941, and then again in 1950. * * *

"We want Republican leadership in Washington. Leadership which will enable us to achieve peace and remain at peace. * * *

Another Milwaukeean says:

"We don't want the socialistic ideas of the Democrats. * * *

"The Democrats seem to offer nothing but more taxes, more spending, more nuisance restrictions and regulations, more orders, more burdens on the average man. They want to tax and tax, spend and spend, elect and elect. * * *

"They have had 17 years in office and all that they do is suggest more tough powers for the Federal Government, more unlimited spending in war and in peace. We want to give the Republicans a chance. Seventeen years is far too long for any one party to remain in power in Washington. * * *

"The Republican Party will help assure decent pay envelopes for America rather than Democratic depressions and strife."

REPUBLICANS ARE FRIENDS OF MIDWEST

Those are voices from Milwaukee. These are sentiments which have been expressed to me by the average man in the street in Milwaukee--in his letters, phone calls, his visits.

The people of Milwaukee know that the Republican Party has been and is the friend of the Midwest, the friend of the Great Lakes region.

It is the Republican Party which has for so long battled for the passage of the Wiley bill to complete the Great Lakes seaway—the bill which would mean so much in creating jobs throughout Great Lakes ports and, in particular, in Milwaukee.

Just the other night in the Senate it was my pleasure to participate, too, in our final Senate passage of the Great Lakes package-freight bill, of which I am a cosponsor. This measure is designed to restore this type of package shipping to Milwaukee and other Lake ports—shipping which has been lost since World War II.

During my 12 years in the Senate I have fought to assure jobs for Wisconsin to secure a fair break for the little fellow, to assure business prosperity, to ease the tax load on the average man. In this Congress I have introduced over 80 bills for those objectives.

MILWAUKEEANS REMEMBER HOW REDS FOMENTED VIOLENCE

Over 9 years ago I sponsored an anti-Communist bill designed to identify the wretched literature sent by the Reds through the mails. Now, at long last, in 1950, the Democrats have gotten around to adopting that original Wiley proposal. It is a part of the over-all anti-Red bill which has just been passed by the Senate and sent to the President for signature or veto.

For years I have been pointing out how the Reds have infiltrated into every type of organization, creating strife, unrest, trouble.

We of Milwaukee recall the terrible and costly strikes which Communist leadership brought about in our factories—the Red beatings, the violence. We are disgusted with the Red menace, and we know that it is the Republican Party which has been spearheading the fight against it. Leaders like JOE MCCARTHY have aroused our country to the danger it faces.

POLISH-AMERICANS WILL NEVER FORGET DEMOCRATIC TREACHERY

Milwaukee with its great tradition of religious devotion knows what communism has done to lands across the seas from which our forefathers came.

No Milwaukeean, no Wisconsinite, no American of Polish descent will ever forget or forgive the disgraceful Democratic Party sell-out of free, religious Poland—the sell-out at Yalta, the terrible treachery done to our faithful Polish ally which was the first to fight for freedom. No Milwaukeean of Polish descent will forgive nor forget that Democratic Party betrayal. That is why they, like their fellow citizens of all descents, will vote Republican on Tuesday, November 7.

The Republican Party in our State has a splendid strong ticket which has been endorsed at the State convention and/or in the primary on Tuesday, September 19.

VOTERS WILL SUPPORT BROPHY AND KERSTEN

Two former Republican Congressmen, outstanding leaders, will be representing Milwaukee in the next Congress, provided our people give to them the full support which they so well merit. I know that they are going to get that support. They are, of course, the Honorable John Brophy, in the fourth district, and the Honorable Charles Kersten, in the fifth district. The fine record which John Brophy and Charlie Kersten accomplished in the Congress speaks for itself, and shows how well justified is their return to public office.

In Milwaukee County we have a fighting Republican organization, well organized in the wards and precincts. Its aim is to bring out the vote and it has been doing a great job. It needs more helpers, however, more volunteers, to make phone calls, deliver literature, write letters, to help stimulate the thinking of the citizens of Milwaukee to vote for good government.

According to the latest census report, Milwaukee County has over 863,000 people—an increase of 12.7 percent since 1940. Milwaukee City itself has over 632,000 of that number—a jump of 7.7 percent. West Allis City has over 42,000, Cudahy City over 12,000, Wauwatosa City over 33,000, Whitefish Bay Village over 14,000, Shorewood Village over 16,000, South Milwaukee over 12,000. These and other suburbs around Milwaukee have been increasing in population and in economic strength. It is the aim of our Republican leadership to assure continued prosperity for Milwaukee County and all of its components. We can do this by such legislation as the St. Lawrence seaway, by getting defense jobs for Milwaukee.

GOP TICKET MERITS YOUR SUPPORT

The Wisconsin Republican ticket well merits your approval. It is a pleasure and a privilege to have these running mates on our ticket.

For Governor, the Honorable Walter Kohler, Jr., a distinguished son of an honored Governor—Kohler, a great name in a great State.

For Lieutenant Governor, the Honorable George Smith.

For State treasurer, the Honorable Warren Smith.

For secretary of state, the Honorable Fred Zimmerman.

For attorney general, the Honorable Vernon Thompson.

SENATOR WILEY'S 12 YEARS OF EXPERIENCE

During my 12 years in the Senate, I feel that I personally have gained the experience to help Milwaukee in its problems. All types of Milwaukee organizations and individuals have appealed to me during those years for various requests and it has been a pleasure to act on those appeals and in many instances to succeed in fulfilling them. I'd like to list now a few of the gracious quotations from letters of various Milwaukeeans—letters that were the spontaneous, unsolicited expressions of their hearts:

LETTERS FROM APPRECIATIVE CONSTITUENTS

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: What shall I say to thank you for the wonderful help you have given me in connection with the case for my nephew.

"A miracle has happened. After my nephew was once refused a visa, the Senator wrote him again and the consul changed his mind and granted my nephew the visa. It seems so incredible.

"My heart is full of gratitude to you, Senator."

From an immigrant:

"Once again, Senator, I take the liberty to write to you; this time to thank you with all my heart for all your kindness and great help.

"Because of your kind assistance and influence today I'm finally a permanent resident of this wonderful country, and soon I will be able to become an American citizen, something that I regard as a great privilege.

"Thank you again, Honorable Senator WILEY. Please be sure that I will be grateful to you forever and I will never forget how kind you have been with me. God bless your days."

From another Wisconsinite:

"It is this kind of consideration and cooperation that makes your constituents doubly conscious of the excellent job that you have always done in Washington."

From another Wisconsinite:

"DEAR SENATOR: I want to express the appreciation of my wife and myself for your kindness recently by interceding on our behalf for permission to file a joint internal revenue tax return.

"After many delays, the Commissioner finally granted the permission, in line with the spirit of the act of Congress, and we are filing accordingly.

"This is the second time you have come to my assistance and proved that we of Wisconsin are fortunate in having a real representative in the United States Senate."

As everyone knows, it takes experience to be able to handle an assignment. If we need a doctor when a member of the family is ill, we want an experienced physician to treat our dear one—not a novice in his first year in medical school. So, too, we need men of experience in Washington and in Madison.

SENATOR WILEY SERVES ON ANTICRIME COMMITTEE

It is my pleasure to serve as the highest ranking active Republican member on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; the highest-ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee; and a member of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee.

Milwaukee has always been famed throughout the Nation for its standards of clean government. We recall the days, however, when the Chicago mobsters tried to muscle in on Milwaukee—bringing their filth and vice into Wisconsin's largest city. That is why I have been busy on the Senate Crime Committee to try to keep Milwaukee as clean from the influence of these dirty racketeers as we can possibly make it.

SAMPLE LETTERS FROM MILWAUKEE ENDORSING SENATOR WILEY

Now, friends, each week I receive over 2,000 letters from Wisconsin. Hundreds upon hundreds of these letters come from Milwaukee. I am happy to receive these letters and lots more. I should like now to quote from some other letters which have recently come to me. I want to express my appreciation to each of the individuals who kindly sent these letters. I am humbly grateful for their expression of support of my policies here in Washington.

I try to do the very best I can—for our people as a whole. We may not agree 100 percent of the time, but we agree most of the time. That is what really counts.

A letter from city comptroller's office of Milwaukee:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I have (because I fully believe that our Senators and Representatives want to know exactly what their constituents are thinking) recently introduced for the consideration of the Milwaukee Common Council several resolutions pertaining to bills now before the Congress. In each case, the resolutions were adopted by the council and then forwarded to you.

"Upon receipt of our resolutions, you made them a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the most opportune time. I have received a letter from the assistant director of the American Municipal Association saying that our resolution on the Highway Aid Act formally appeared just when it would have the maximum effect.

"It is indeed gratifying to know that our actions are carefully watched, respected, and carried to the fullest fruition by our spokesman in Congress."

"MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I'm just a little old lady here in Milwaukee, but I want to congratulate you first, on your votes cast against the Kerr bill (which would have increased natural-gas rates in Milwaukee), and the (rat hole) Arizona project; second, on your coming out so fine in backing Senator MCCARTHY in his efforts to rid the State Department of subversives. You are on the right track—in fact, have always voted as a true representative of the people in old Wisconsin."

"Received your card a few weeks ago stating your views on happenings that are going on in our Federal Government. Keep up the good work and you will be reelected for another term. We will be hoping and praying that you come home a winner."

From a physician: "The newspapers report that you are a candidate again for reelection. I am glad of it and I hope you will be successful, and that many other Republicans will win, and that we will soon have a Republican administration. If there will be no change this time, I am afraid our country will face bankruptcy."

"Am fully in accord with your past actions on all legislative matters sponsored by yourself or your constituents, as I feel you have taken the interest of the American people to heart."

Letter from another Milwaukeean: "It is with considerable interest that I have noticed in the papers that you have been singled out for defeat by both President Truman and the A. F. of L. That, Mr. WILEY, is sufficent indication to me and to a good many other voters that you are doing a good job and should be returned to office. You have my admiration for your successful efforts to prevent repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and I certainly cannot be classified as a capitalist."

"DEAR SENATOR: We wonder how you manage all the many details when being a United States Senator is such a very full-time job. We and our families are life-long Republicans and have followed your splendid work with a great deal of pride and satisfaction."

From West Allis:

"In conclusion I want to do all I can for you in West Allis. Can you suggest any additional service I may render (and I don't want a thing from you or government). I'd like to see you reelected with such a thumping majority that will convince Boss Truman he cannot dictate to us whom shall represent us."

From an attorney in Milwaukee:

"Many thanks for the pamphlet sent to this office. I certainly appreciate the same. I am satisfied that you are doing a good job as our Senator, and I want to extend my sincere and best wishes for your reelection."

Another constituent writes:

"I have watched your record in Congress, the way you have voted on various issues, etc., very closely and have been pleased with your stand. I trust you will continue this splendid record."

PLEASE GO TO THE POLLS NOVEMBER 7

I need the help of you, the citizens of Milwaukee, in order to continue policies aimed to protect your freedom. So, folks, please go to the pools on Tuesday, November 7. Vote for the free enterprise system against socialism. Vote for fair taxes against outrageous taxes that confiscate all of your earnings. Vote for the Republican Party of peace rather than for the Democratic Party which has blundered us into three wars in 33 years.

Vote for the Republican Party which is against secret deals, secret appeasement of the Reds, which is against the terrible treachery which sold free Poland down the river.

Vote for Walter Kohler and our other fine Republican teammates, for our Republican congressional candidates, assembly and State senate candidates.

Vote for the Republican Party which believes in a frank, open foreign policy—in a united democratic Germany, a Germany which will take her place in the free family of western nations rather than a Germany controlled by the Communist terror.

Vote for the Republicans who have fought against the coddling of the Reds—the Hisses, the Coplons, the Pressmans.

Yes, folks, vote for peace, freedom, and prosperity, for full pay envelopes, fair taxes economical government.

CONCLUSION

For your own sake, for the interest of your family and your dear ones, for the sake of a strong, prosperous, free, clean Milwaukee, vote Republican on Tuesday, November 7.

Thanks a million, friends. See you at the polls election day.

How the FBI Trapped Hiss

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. NIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the American Weekly:

HOW THE FBI TRAPPED HISS

(By Win Brooks)

High officials of this Nation he betrayed testified Alger Hiss bore an excellent reputation for loyalty, integrity, and veracity.

A little Negro maid proved him a liar to clinch his conviction for perjury committed in denial of a traitorous act.

If Edith Gland Murray had testified at the first Hiss trial there probably would have been no jury disagreement.

The Government was aware of her existence and of her possible great importance but she could not be found. The FBI, racing the clock in the search for her, fine-combing Baltimore for her whereabouts, following time-dimmed leads to dead ends across the Nation, didn't even know her name and knew only vaguely what she looked like 14 years before. And Edith Murray had no idea she was sought.

How the FBI found her on the very eve of Hiss' second trial after a solid year of tracking and back-tracking is a fascinating story. How she justified the effort and how her memory of a simple truth baited the trap into which Hiss thrust his neck complete a drama that matches the finding of stolen State Department papers in a pumpkin on the Maryland farm of Hiss' accuser, Whittaker Chambers.

I heard from J. Edgar Hoover in Washington an outline of the story of search for Edith Murray. He described it as "one of the finest examples of FBI investigative procedure." I asked if I might have it in detail for the American Weekly and he agreed.

The considerable research necessary to correlate the reports of all FBI agents engaged in the hunt recently was completed and a 14-page condensation made available. With this account I visited Assistant United States Attorney Thomas F. Murphy, prosecutor at both trials, to build up the climax from his records. These he produced and helped screen to stress the importance of Edith Murray to the final conviction.

Here, then, is the complete, official story.

From the beginning it was obvious that either Hiss or Chambers was a terrific, accomplished liar. It was the word of Chambers, $30,000-a-year Time Magazine editor, ex-agent for the Communist underground espionage, against the word of Hiss, trusted State Department brilliant, patrician-nosed Harvard law protege of Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter.

It was the word of solid, stolid Esther Chambers against the word of poised and pretty Priscilla Hiss. Chambers swore that in 1938 he received from Hiss the State Department papers he later produced in microfilm from his pumpkin. Chambers and his wife swore they had been on terms of intimate friendship with Mr. and Mrs. Hiss over a period of years.

Hiss swore he never gave the papers to Chambers and that Chambers had been, under another name, only a casual acquaintance.

One fact was mutually agreed: Chambers had the documents and they weren't grown in a pumpkin. The Hiss defense at both trials suggested that Chambers received these papers from any one of many others who had access to them and that his accusation of Hiss was the unexplainable act of a psychopathic liar.

The material evidence was that some of the documents were in Hiss' handwriting and others had been typed on an old typewriter Hiss once owned and which the FBI had located. The defense against this evidence was (1) that the papers were stolen after Hiss had copied some in the line of duty; (2) that the identified typewriter had been given away by Hiss before it was used to copy the other papers.

Hiss was indicted and tried on two counts of perjury before the Federal grand jury where he testified he did not give the papers to Chambers and that he had not seen Chambers after January 1, 1937. The statute of limitations barred any charge but perjury, and perjury under Federal law is difficult to prove because the lie under oath must be established by two independent witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating facts.

The great need of the Government was for a corroborating witness to prove Hiss a liar. Trap him in even a small lie that would be apparent to the jury—trap him with a solid witness whose obvious honesty would convince the jury—and a conviction seemed assured. The task was to find that witness, and a particular type needed was one who could disprove the claim of Alger and Priscilla Hiss that they were not on terms of close friendship with Whittaker and Esther Chambers. The importance of Edith, the maid, is early established in the FBI account:

"During late 1948 and early 1949, FBI agents sat for many weeks with Chambers while he related in detail incidents in his life tending to corroborate the allegations with respect to Hiss.

"Chambers related that in August 1934, during his Communist espionage activities, he and his wife and their infant daughter, Ellen, moved to Baltimore where they occupied an apartment at 903 St. Paul Street. Here they remained until spring of 1935, living under the name of Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Cantwell. Chambers identified the landlady of this apartment.

"In the spring of 1935 the Chambers family moved to a Washington, D. C., apartment formerly occupied by Alger and Priscilla Hiss. They remained there several months and then took up residence during the summer in Pennsylvania.

"In October 1935, Chambers recalled, he and his family returned to Baltimore and on this occasion rented an apartment in Eutaw Place between Wilson and McMechen Streets. Again Chambers used the alias Lloyd Cantwell.

"Both Mr. and Mrs. Chambers were certain Alger and Priscilla Hiss visited them at the Eutaw Place apartment on several occasions. Mrs. Chambers recalled that Hiss actually brought to the new Chambers' apartment several pieces of furniture for which he had no need.

"Chambers mentioned to FBI agents that his wife employed a maid in the Eutaw Place apartment. Mrs. Chambers was of the opinion this maid also worked for them a short while at 903 St. Paul Street.

"The best description Mr. and Mrs. Chambers could give of the maid was that her name was Edith. They had a vague recollection her surname might have been Brown, Brun, or Brenner. They were quite certain her husband's name was Ellwood and that he had been employed as a mechanic in the vicinity of the 2500 block of Greenmount Avenue, Baltimore. They believed Edith had met the Hisses in the Chambers home."

So the hunt began and day after day the questioning of the Chamberses always returned to the subject of the maid, a prodding for any little elusive detail that would aid the search.

From the FBI account:

"Mr. and Mrs. Chambers furnished the physical descriptions of Edith and Ellwood. They remembered Edith gave the nickname Peachie to the Chambers' baby. They remembered that Edith and Ellwood were a devoted couple with no children, very quiet, sober, well settled. They thought Edith and her husband might have lived somewhere on Eutaw Street, in a second or third floor apartment. Edith didn't live with the Chambers; she was a day worker arriving in the morning, leaving in the early evening."

Not all of this at one sitting. A little at a time over the days and weeks as the questioning continued and the search was pressed.

"Both Mr. and Mrs. Chambers were quite certain that Edith, at one time during her employment, saw the Hisses in the Chambers' apartment. Specifically, they said, Edith saw Priscilla Hiss when the latter took care of Mrs. Chambers' baby while the mother went to New York overnight for a physical checkup."

Stop there and repeat. Baby-sitting for a friend. There, surely, the intimacy denied by the Hisses could be established. If a maid named Edith could be found. And if, having been found, she could remember. Check the Browns in Baltimore, all of them. Check the Bruns in every large city through every FBI district office. Check the Brenners, too. Here's a description of what she looked like 14 years ago. Sift the haystack.

From the FBI account:

"The several facets of the investigation were simultaneously checked. Efforts were made to find the landlady described by Chambers. It was learned she had moved from Baltimore. Her whereabouts were traced to a town in northern Maryland near the Pennsylvania border. Inquiry there developed she had left for Florida. When finally located she could not recall the tenancy of Chambers (Cantwell) nor could she identify photographs of the parties involved."

Dead end. Back-track.

"Inquiry was conducted in the vicinity of 903 Paul Street after checking old city and business directories in an effort to locate former neighbors residing there during the period of Chambers' tenancy. Several former neighbors were finally located but they had no recollection of Chambers or Hiss or their wives or the maid.

"Efforts were made to find the garage where Ellwood worked. Only one garage is located in the neighborhood of the 2500 block of Greenmount Avenue. Records there revealed nothing concerning an Ellwood Brown, Brun, or Brenner—nothing of any Ellwood. The manager stated, however, that approximately 13 or 14 years ago a garage had been located at East Twenty-fifth Street, just off Greenmount Avenue. It had since gone out of business. A search was made for former owners and a former manager was located in Baltimore. This man stated all firm records had been destroyed and he had no recollection of anyone named Ellwood."

Dead end. Back-track.

"Investigation determined that the Eutaw Place apartment was actually located at 1617 Eutaw Place. The 1936 Baltimore city directory listed a Lloyd Cantwell residing in apartment C at this address. Names of four other occupants of the building at the time were secured. All had moved away."

Find those four other occupants. They may remember the Chambers' maid, may even remember Hiss. Investigative leads were run down in several directions. All four former families were found and interviewed by the FBI.

From the FBI account:

"Two of the tenants recalled Cantwell's (Chambers') tenancy and remembered the maid Edith but could furnish no information as to her identity or whereabouts. Photographs of the Hisses were displayed to them without effecting identification."

Dead end again. But for the first time here was proof that the maid existed other than in the minds of Whittaker and Esther Chambers.

"Records were checked as to the ownership of the Eutaw Place apartment building. The former owner had died. His son was located and produced records showing Cantwell (Chambers) lived there from October 2, 1935, to June 27, 1936. The son could not recall Chambers or his wife nor was he able to identify photographs of the Hisses. He suggested that the janitor employed by his father from 1927 to 1944 might recall them. He furnished the name of the janitor, address unknown."

Time was working at both ends for Alger Hiss. His first trial was under way in New York. The lapse of 14 years had dulled a lot of memories. Where were you 14 years ago? Who did you know? Ever hear of a maid named Edith? Might have been Edith Brown. Or Brun. Or Brenner. The FBI found the former janitor, still in Baltimore. From the account:

"The janitor recalled a family named Cantwell had resided in apartment C for about 10 months in 1935 or 1936. He could not recall a maid employed by them and when shown photographs of Mr. and Mrs. Hiss he said he had never seen them. He did identify photographs of the Chambers as the Cantwells."

In New York Alger and Priscilla Hiss were denying from the witness stand they were ever intimate with the Chambers, ever saw them in Baltimore. Testifying about a casual meeting in Washington with Mrs. Chambers during the year before Chambers moved to Baltimore, Priscilla Hiss said: "I don't think I ever saw her again at all."

The end of the trial in disagreement brought into sharper relief the Government's need of a corroborative witness. Every needed resource of the FBI was in the search for Edith. Find her before the second trial. She may remember.

Here was a short breathing spell affording the Bureau opportunity to go over still again with the Chamberses their recollections of the maid. Question, question, question. One question may bring a memory that will be helpful. From the report:

"Interviews with Mr. and Mrs. Chambers were continuing in an effort to glean further facts, however trivial. Mr. and Mrs. Chambers and FBI agents spent many more days carefully recounting events in an attempt to unearth additional facts. During one such interview Mrs. Chambers recalled that during the period of her Baltimore residence she had been interested in art and had made several oil paintings.

Were some of these portraits? Yes, some were. Whom did she paint?

It was the jackpot question. Esther Chambers came up with the jackpot answer.

The FBI report relates it in this prosaic fashion:

"She vaguely remembered actually painting a portrait of the maid, Edith, and thought she had given it to the maid."

Was she sure? She was not. Not sure she gave it to Edith. It was in the dim background of her mind. It hadn't been of consequence. So she thought.

If she did paint Edith and didn't give her the portrait, where might the painting be now?

If and if and if—well, in the attic of the Maryland farm there were some old canvases.

With Mrs. Chambers, FBI agents searched the attic. There, amid the dust, the castoffs, the laid-asides, the keep-me-alwayses—there against the caves where cobwebs hung among a group of discarded finished and unfinished paintings, an oil portrait of a colored girl was found. A pleasant face.

"That's it," Mrs. Chambers said. "That's Edith."

That dusty, forgotten portrait of Whittaker Chambers' ex-maid, Edith, was to bring Alger Hiss to justice but beyond its mere discovery lay many more weeks of FBI investigation.

How good was this clue? How good was the likeness of the sought maid?

A fair likeness, Mrs. Chambers thought.

A fair likeness of a woman 14 years before. How much do you resemble your picture of 14 years ago?

Nevertheless, here was something new, something a little more tangible than a dim verbal description. Seize it. Make the most of it.

From the FBI account:

"Photographs of the oil painting of Edith were produced. They were distributed throughout Baltimore at employment agencies and other places where Edith might be known."

Do you know anyone who resembles this picture? Someone may come in who looks like this. If she does, phone the FBI. Store to store, house to house. Have you ever seen this woman? If you do, contact the FBI.

From the FBI account:

"Preparations were under way for retrial of Hiss. Investigation to locate Edith was intensified, especially in view of the testimony of Hiss at the first trial denying he ever visited Chambers' home in Baltimore.

"A special squad of FBI agents carefully studied all the facts heretofore developed with respect to the maid. At daily conferences agents reviewed results of the previous day's investigation and new leads became apparent.

"Mr. and Mrs. Chambers stated that on further thought they were now of the opinion Edith and her husband probably had lived on Madison Avenue, Baltimore, somewhere in the 900 to 1200 blocks, rather than on the parallel blocks of Eutaw Street.

"They also remembered Edith had a friend named Missouri. This was her correct name, not a nickname, but they could not recall the last name. They said Missouri substituted for Edith on occasion and did housework for Mrs. Chambers at the Eutaw Place apartment."

Find a maid named Edith. Here's a "fairly good likeness" of her 14 years ago. Find another maid with the intriguing name, Missouri. Find one or the other and you may have the corroborative witness needed. If she remembers.

From the FBI account:

"Every conceivable possible source of information was contacted in vain. A search of city and phone directories over 14 years revealed nothing of assistance. Every employment agency in Baltimore was contacted. Managers of these agencies were interviewed and their records thoroughly reviewed for the name Edith Brown, Edith Brun or Edith Brenner. Every maid whose first name was Edith was checked.

"The hundreds of leads developed entailed tracing person after person from residence to residence, some in distant places. In each instance a dead end was the answer. Edith could not be located by these methods."

No grocery proprietor remembered an Edith who bought staples for her employers. No pharmacist recalled a maid named Edith who had prescriptions filled. No laundry man, no milkman, no iceman, no restaurant operator could help. Have you ever seen this woman or one who resembles her? We'll leave a picture; she might come in. If she does, notify the FBI.

Nobody notified the FBI.

Mid-September, 1949, with the retrial of Hiss set for November, brought no trace of Edith or of Missouri. A complete review of the search convinced the special squad of agents there was something wrong. Edith existed, unless she had died a young woman. No clue had been overlooked, no error in procedure had been made. The search should have found her. There was something wrong because there was no more logical ground to cover. Back-track. Go back. Go back. Go over all of it again because the answer has to be there.

From the FBI account:

"It was decided to reinterview persons who had lived or worked in the vicinity of 1617 Eutaw Place during the period of Chambers' tenancy. Despite the fact these people had been previously contacted and had been unable to supply information, it was thought that during the intervening months they had had opportunity to give further thought to the inquiry. Perhaps now they could recall additional facts concerning Edith."

Back to former tenants, neighbors, service people, went the FBI. Back to every house and store in that area. Dead end. No luck. Back to the former janitor who hadn't remembered any maid at all.

And there it was.

Since the FBI's first interview with him he had seen one of the reproductions of the portrait of Edith, and he had seen Edith in a Baltimore streetcar. He had remembered her as the maid. He had asked Edith her name and address without telling her anything of the search.

What is her name? Edith Murray. (A far cry, no matter how you say it, from Brown or Brun or Brenner.)

What's her address? She said she lived at 342 Bloom Street, Baltimore. (A long leap, no matter how you jump it, from the 900 to 1200 blocks of Madison or Eutaw.)

Why didn't you notify us—come forward with this information? The janitor said he did not want to become involved.

Okay, take it easy. That's enough here. Report back. Conference. Contact with headquarters. Orders from the boss; Blind approach, no suggestion, let her volunteer any information, don't mention the names Cantwell, Chambers, or Hiss.

A knock on the door of 342 Bloom Street. A pleasant-faced Negro woman answered. One agent of all the hundreds who had been seeking her stood on the porch. He had a little picture in his hand—a small reproduction of Esther Chambers' portrait of her maid.

"Do you know who this is?"

"Why sure," with a flash of smile, "that's me."

A year of search was at an end. From the FBI account:

"She said she worked for a family named Cantwell in Eutaw Place and volunteered the information they had a little girl named Ellen who she called Peegee, sounding like Peachie, but actually standing for the initials of Pretty Girl. Her husband's name? Ellwood. He had been employed, she said, as a gasoline station attendant in Baltimore at the time she worked for the Cantwells.

"She was shown the photographs of Mr. and Mrs. Chambers. She said their names were Mr. and Mrs. Cantwell. She had no idea they had any other name.

"She was asked to tell what she remembered of them. She related that in the fall of 1934 she first met Mr. and Mrs. Cantwell, then living at 903 St. Paul Street. She was referred to them, she said, by their former maid, Missouri Diggs."

Hail, Missouri!

"Edith said she worked for Mrs. Cantwell until the spring of 1935 when the family left Baltimore. Then in the fall of 1935 she accidentally met Mrs. Cantwell on the street in front of Edith's then home, 1113 Madison Avenue, Baltimore, and at this meeting Mrs. Cantwell rehired her to work at the 1617 Eutaw Place apartment."

From the interview it was obvious that Edith knew nothing about the Cantwells being the Chambers, nothing at all about the Chambers-Hiss case, nothing about any Communist connections of her ex-employer.

From the FBI account:

"Edith was asked about visitors at the apartment. She volunteered she recalled 'a lady from Washington,' a lady who came to visit the home on at least two or three occasions. She said the 'lady from Washington' had a son 12 to 14 years old. This she gathered from her conversation with her.

"She recalled specifically that the 'lady from Washington' sometime in April or May 1936, came to the Cantwell (Chambers) apartment where she remained all day and all one night until noon the following day while Mrs. Cantwell went to New York. This lady did not leave the apartment until Mrs. Cantwell returned from New York. Edith said Mrs. Cantwell had gone to New York for a medical examination.

"Not having seen a photograph of Priscilla Hiss, Edith then described the physical characteristics of 'the lady from Washington.' This description fitted perfectly that of Priscilla Hiss. Edith recalled one evening this woman from Washington came to the Cantwell apartment accompanied by her husband. Her description of this man generally coincided with that of Alger Hiss.

"She was then shown photographs of Alger and Priscilla Hiss. Edith was quite certain the photograph of Priscilla Hiss was 'the lady from Washington.' She was of the opinion Alger Hiss' photograph was that of the lady's husband. Seeing these people in person, she thought, would enable her to make a definite statement."

She first was taken to the Chambers' farm near Westminster, Md. There she greeted Chambers and his wife as Mr. and Mrs. Cantwell and recognition was mutual. Identification of Edith Murray as the long-sought Edith was established beyond doubt. Her value as a witness still remained to be proved.

On the day Alger Hiss went on trial for the second time in the United States Courthouse on Foley Square, New York City, Edith Murray was sent to New York with an FBI employee who did not know Alger or Priscilla Hiss by sight. The FBI was still leaning away over backward to guarantee Hiss his fair trial.

With the FBI man, Edith Murray rode to the 13th floor of the courthouse as trial was about to begin in a courtroom there. She was simply instructed to say whether she recognized anyone. The corridor was filled with men and women, scores of veniremen called to fill the jury. Six elevators continually fed the crowd.

From the FBI account:

"Within a short time Alger and Priscilla Hiss, together with a crowd of other people, emerged from an elevator. Edith grasped the arm of the FBI man with her and said, 'That is the lady from Washington and her husband.'"

Then the United States knew the value of its witness and her story went into the hands of Assistant United States Attorney Murphy and Murphy planned to bait the trap that would ensnare Alger Hiss in his lie—not too big a lie, not too small—but one which Murphy effectively argued later to the jury was in a pattern of lies he began and didn't know where to end.

Nearly all of the evidence of the trial went in while Edith Murray waited back in Baltimore, unaware of what went on, not knowing she was guarded. And Murphy back in New York baited the trap.

The trap:

(Cross examination of Hiss by Murphy:)

"Question. Didn't you go to Baltimore with your wife—over to see them (the Chambers) in Baltimore?

"Answer. Never. Never, Mr. Murphy.

"Question. You never went to Baltimore?

"Answer. Never went to Baltimore to see them.

"Question. And Mrs. Hiss either?

"Answer. Never.

"Question. Any place in Baltimore to see the Chambers?

"Answer. No, sir.

"Question. At any time?

"Answer. Never.

"Question. 1935, 1936, 1937?

"Answer. No time. Never."

So there he was, and under oath again.

The trap:

(Cross-examination of Priscilla Hiss by Murphy:)

"Question. Did you see her (Mrs. Chambers) in Baltimore?

"Answer. I have never seen here in Baltimore.

"Question. Did you know she lived in Baltimore?

"Answer. I didn't know she lived in Baltimore.

"Question. Did you know there was a time she was living in Baltimore at Eutaw Place?

"Answer. I didn't know it then. I have learned it since.

"Question. I am talking now about the 1930's. Did you know it then?

"Answer. I did not know it then.

"Question. And I take it that you did not know she was living in Eutaw Place under the name of Cantwell, Lloyd Cantwell, Mrs. Lloyd Cantwell?

"Answer. I did not know anything about her, Mr. Murphy.

"Question. All right. So I can say, and drop it, that on your oath before this jury you didn't see her in Baltimore in any shape or form at any address or under any name?

"Answer. That is exactly right.

So Murphy got it in the record, thinking of that little woman in Baltimore who had something different to say. He was saving her for rebuttal.

So here at last comes Edith Murray (not Brown, not Brun, not Brenner) found by the FBI at the end of a year's search, to testify as one of the last of the trial's witnesses.

The trap is sprung.

(Direct examination of Edith Murray by Murphy:)

"Question. Did they (the Chambers) have any visitors?

"Answer. They didn't have many visitors, only two visitors that I know of.

"Question. Did these visitors tell you where they lived?

"Answer. The lady did. She said she lived in Washington.

"Question. Do you see her here in court?

"Answer. Yes, sir. There is the lady right there with the black hat with the thing on the side (pointing to Priscilla Hiss).

"Question. Where did you see that lady?

"Answer. Well, she visited Mrs. Cantwell in Eutaw Place.

"Question. Did she tell you anything about her family at all?

"Answer. Well, she came there and stayed overnight when Mrs. Cantwell had to come here in New York to see the doctor. She was pregnant at the time so she had to come to New York to see the doctor. So she came over and she (Mrs. Hiss) stayed overnight and so while we were in the bathroom with the baby—I attended the baby's bath—I asked her did she have any children and she said yes, she had one little boy. That is the only conversation we had.

"Question. Who else do you remember?

"Answer. Well, she came there one night with her husband just as I was getting ready to leave and the bell rang and I went to the door and then her and her husband came in.

"Question. Would you be able to identify her husband?

"Answer. Yes, I couldn't help but remember him (standing and pointing to Hiss).

"Question. What did you call the lady and gentleman if you remember?

"Answer. Well, I didn't call him anything.

"Question. What did you call this lady?

"Answer. I called her Miss Priscilla."

Her complete examination by Murphy is recorded in only eight pages of official transcript—a few minutes of appearance against a full year's search—but as she testified all the good character Alger Hiss had assumed in the light of big-name witnesses during two trials fell away from him like a canvas unveiling a new and ugly statue

It fell away regardless of what Supreme Court Justices Frankfurter and Reed had heard about his integrity, what United States Circuit Judge Magruder heard of his character, what United States Judge Wyzanski said of his loyalty—what all the others of name and fame had testified regarding Alger Hiss in his plight.

Here was an honest woman with a good memory who knew a simple truth and told it convincingly. The jury hung on her every word.

The Hiss defense took Edith Murray under a cross-examination that fills 45 pages of official transcript. She couldn't be shaken. When she was excused, the fate of Alger Hiss was sealed.

Edith Murray went home to Baltimore. The portrait Mrs. Chambers neglected to give her 14 years ago now hangs in Edith Murray's living room.

Cutting at Roots of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of September 17, 1950:

CUTTING AT ROOTS OF COMMUNISM

A citation is due the Veterans of Foreign Wars for conspicuous common sense.

The national commander, Charles C. Ralls, has announced that the VFW is opening a campaign against communism here at home by trying to reduce the poverty, hunger and misery on which communism breeds. This large and influential veterans' organization, says Commander Ralls, will do its "utmost to see that there are no hungry children or impoverished families in this Nation." It will offer awards to VFW posts and auxiliary groups with the best programs of "positive action against communism" along this line.

Negative resistance is never going to check communism of Communists completely. Positive action is necessary to eradicate the conditions that nurture communism, that make desperate and hopeless fellow Americans susceptible to the lures of communism when they bitterly decide that American democracy and free enterprise have failed them.

The VFW has wisely determined to do its share in fostering such positive action against communism, right here in America, where it is within our own power to do something effective.

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Congress Could Strike Real Blow for Loyalty—Pass Statehood Bills," written by Lowell Mellett and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS COULD STRIKE REAL BLOW FOR LOYALTY—PASS STATEHOOD BILLS

(By Lowell Mellett)

One way to promote loyalty to the United States and its institutions is to scare the daylight out of anybody disposed to question our present state of perfection. Congress has sought to do this by enacting a new internal security law that gravely disturbs many patriotic believers in freedom of thought and expression. The latter fear the law will not accomplish its purpose; that, indeed, it will do more harm than good.

Another method of achieving the desired results is to do the things that arouse a positive feeling of loyalty, an active urge to serve and protect the national welfare. Congress, in the session now ending, has demonstrated again how laggard it can be in this respect. It has failed to grant full citizenship to two important groups of Americans, the people of Alaska and Hawaii. This, notwithstanding that now, as never before, we need the complete loyalty of these people, situated in outposts of our national defense.

CONGRESS CONVINCED

Session after session they have asked for the dignity of statehood. Gradually over the years they have succeeded in convincing Congress that they are ready for it. That is to say, they have convinced a majority of the Members of Congress. But they have failed to overcome the obstructions thrown up by a minority. During the past summer the House passed the bills authorizing admission of both Territories as States. The Senate committee to which these bills were referred has reported overwhelming in their favor. Action by the Senate itself, however, has been held up through fear of a prolonged battle by the obstructionists—possibly a filibuster—at a time when the Senators want to go home.

In the case of Alaska the opposition has two principal elements. There are the commercial interests, such as the salmon canners, mostly nonresidents of Alaska, who expect to pay a higher price for the privilege of exploiting the region's resources if the Territory becomes a self-governing State. And then there are the bitter-end opponents of civil rights legislation. They frankly say that admission of Alaska might mean two more votes in the Senate for civil rights.

In the case of Hawaii the commercial interests, mostly long resident in the islands, are strongly in favor of statehood. The important opposition comes from southern Senators. If civil rights are to be deplored, there is real reason for this opposition. A cosmopolitan mixture of native islanders, Japanese, Chinese and others form three-quarters of the Hawaiian population and the Senators representing them certainly would not draw the race line in the matter of civil liberties.

LOYALTY UNQUESTIONED

There is no reason to question the loyalty of the Alaskans and the Hawaiians as matters now stand. A full American casualty list out of the war to date in Korea, it is said, would reveal Hawaiian names out of all proportion to the Hawaiian population. This results from an accident of circumstances, the fact that well-trained Army units from the islands were among the first thrown into battle. That, however, does not explain the magnificent record made by the Japanese-Americans from Hawaii in World War II, those who fought in Italy, for example, described by Gen. Mark W. Clark as the most decorated unit in the entire history of the United States.

The real explanation is that these Hawaiians have the stuff from which real Americans are made, the stuff that entitles them to first-class citizenship. Our country has their loyalty and should appreciate and encourage it. Especially now that loyalty has been made the subject of such great national concern.

Report to the People of the Tenth Congressional District of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDNA F. KELLY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mrs. KELLY of New York. Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to fulfill my obligations to the people of the Tenth Congressional District whom I have the privilege to represent, I deem it appropriate to report briefly to them on the major legislative actions of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

This report must, of necessity, be a realistic one in order to stress the hard and unpleasant facts which wishful thinkers are reluctant to face.

Our goal is set—peace. Every act must be viewed in the light of its contribution to that goal. Remember, one nation—only one nation, Russia—is blocking the achievement of a world at peace. She represents the Godless. She fosters the materialistic. Her ideological poison is known as communism. We first learned of communism as an economic principle; later, as a theory of government; then, a philosophy; and now as an ideology. Call it what you will and disguise it as they can, but it remains a powerful force with tentacles so strong we can scarcely recognize the stranglehold this octopus has on our world. Communism is opposed to all religion—Protestantism, Judaism, Catholicism, and Mohammedanism.

We hear this referred to as the atomic age. There is no crystal-clear answer to the great issues facing us. The solution of today can be undone by the morrow. We must not only face unpleasant facts, but we must go further than we have gone in countering danger to self-interests and world preservation.

Let no man say the Democratic administration failed in its endeavor to settle our world conditions. This Eighty-first Congress has been a dynamic force in coping with international problems, and a leader in seeking peace for the world. International cooperation and international foreign policy dominated the affairs of the Capitol. Public opinion has demanded that national affairs be subordinated. National problems could easily be resolved if the costs of war were forever removed. Seventy-five percent of the Federal budget arises out of servicing the Federal debt, in providing benefits for veterans, and in building national defense—in other words, these are our expenditures for past wars and for protection against threatened aggression.

The successful results flowing from our legislative programs turned the tide of communism in Europe and conceivably must have impelled the leaders in the Kremlin to strike hard in Asia where our humanitarian programs had not been given sufficient time to take root. We do not demand that every nation accept our way of life. Democracy can be demonstrated in action with such success that it will necessarily become the desire of almost all civilized people. An ECA program for Asia, wholeheartedly supported by Americans, together with the Democratic point-4 program in action, would have halted and forever throttled communism in the Far East. But June 25, 1950, dawned on another day of infamy. South Korea, an independent republic established under the sponsorship of the United Nations, was invaded by North Korea, a Soviet Union satellite. Three short months ago the free nations of the world, in their mission for peace, had high hopes that conflict in the world might be avoided. Once more an aggressive move, a disregard of others, and a cruel and alien ideology have produced a war thousands of miles from American shores, threatening the freedom of our Republic and the peace of the world. Now we see the nations of the world gearing their industries for military preparations. Translated in our own country, we have upon us all that this brings about—disrupted homes, casualty lists, higher taxes, and the adjustment again to a war economy. Yet, with a love of God and our fellow men, with hope, with courage, with cooperation from us all, we shall succeed.

Following is a brief summary of the most important legislation enacted during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress:

DOMESTIC ISSUES

SOCIAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS, 1950

The new law makes 30 major changes in the programs established under the Social Security Act.

Among the most important changes are the following:

Extension of coverage to self-employed persons other than farmers and certain professional persons.

Coverage of regularly employed domestic workers.

Coverage of State and local government employees not members of retirement systems, through voluntary agreements between the State and the Federal Government, and compulsory coverage of certain employees of certain transit systems taken over by States or local governments after 1936.

A substantial liberalization of the benefit formula for future beneficiaries.

Increase in the wage base for benefit and contribution purposes from $3,000 to $3,600.

A substantial increase in benefits for current beneficiaries, averaging 77½ percent.

Payment of benefits to dependent husbands and widowers of insured women workers.

Liberalization of survivors' insurance benefits with respect to insured married women.

Payment of the lump-sum death benefit in all cases of insured deceased workers.

Increase in the benefits for dependent parents and for the first child in a family from 50 percent to 75 percent of the primary insurance benefit.

Provision of wage credits of $160 for each month of military service during World War II.

Provisions for Federal grants to the States for the needy permanently and totally disabled.

Inclusion in aid to dependent children of one adult relative in a family, for Federal matching purposes.

Provision for mandatory exemption of $50 earned income for the blind, beginning July 1952.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

This law gives the President discretionary power to impose rationing controls; to fix price and wage ceilings simultaneously; to requisition plants, equipment and materials; to allocate and assign priorities; to control consumer credit, to control credit on new housing; to make or guarantee production loans and to set up machinery for settling war labor disputes.

PUBLIC HEALTH

In this field, Federal aid for hospital construction was extended to 1955. Public Law 692 authorized support of research and training in the search for cures for rheumatism, arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, and other diseases.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY AID

This measure authorized $1,188,000,000 for a 2-year program of Federal aid to highway construction to assure adequate highway systems to keep pace with the progress of our Nation.

RENT CONTROL ACT OF 1950

This important legislation extends rent controls to December 31, 1950, with permission for local communities to carry them beyond that date for an additional 6 months.

HOUSING

Although curtailed because of present war conditions, the housing law of 1950 expands and supplements the Federal Housing Act for moderate income families and it increases the limit on mortgage purchases by the Government. It liberalizes financing terms on FHA-insured rental and cooperative housing, particularly for veterans.

AGRICULTURE

In this field, the following measures were enacted: The Federal tax on oleomargarine was repealed. Farm price supports for cotton, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, peanuts, and other crops were continued. The 1950 potato crop support was made subject to producer agreement on marketing quotas. Government control on imports of fats, oils, rice, and rice products were extended to June 30, 1951.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION ACT OF 1950

The basic functions of this National Science Foundation are to promote basic research in the sciences; make grants to colleges and industry for basic research; award scholarships and fellowships in scientific fields; initiate and support research related to national defense; initiate and support nuclear energy research with the permission of the Atomic Energy Commission; act as a clearinghouse of scientific information; correlate individual and public research; and maintain a register of scientific personnel. This measure is in keeping with our defense program and is a necessary preparation for potential emergencies.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

This session of the Eighty-first Congress has liberalized procedures and payments for various types of disabilities, and has eliminated many of the abuses that existed in the administration of the GI bill of rights, providing assistance to veterans for educational purposes. Also laws were enacted extending time for filing, in certain cases, for pensions and compensation, and a bill was passed granting payments of family allowances to dependents of members of the armed services.

INTERNAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950

This measure provides for registration of Communists and subversives, forbids Communists to hold Federal jobs, and tightens restrictions on immigration and aliens. It would also permit a round-up of all Communists and other subversives in time of national emergency. This legislation has passed the House and the Senate. It was forwarded to the President at the time of this writing.

DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1950

Under the terms of this new law, the original act is extended to June 30, 1951. It increases the number of displaced persons who may be admitted to the United States from 205,000 to 415,744. Regular immigration quotas allotted to the various countries will cover most of this increase. Screening by the Departments of the Army, State, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and immigration authorities will check any influx of foreign ideologies.

REORGANIZATION

Twenty-six of the thirty-four reorganization plans were accepted by Congress. These plans included the streamlining and modernizing of the housekeeping of the vast Federal establishment. The adoption of these plans provides for the elimination of duplications and overlapping of functions of the various departments, and will result in a savings of one and one-half billion dollars, through increased efficiency and economy in the governmental services.

SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

This measure extended the existing draft law to July 9, 1951. It gives the President the right to call up the National Guard and the Reserves when he deems such action necessary.

OMNIBUS APPROPRIATION BILL FOR 1951

This bill is the spending bill for the fiscal year 1950–51. It is a departure from the procedure of former years when individual bills were enacted for every department and every item of Government expenditure. Fiscal experts, the Commission on Reorganization, and management groups have consistently urged a trial appropriation bill where the entire costs of the Government might be considered in a single package. They asserted that the former method of piecemeal examination by the Congress did not enable the public nor the Congressmen to get a clear-cut, over-all picture of the fiscal needs. Thirty-six billion dollars are allocated, in this bill, to normal operation of the Government. With the advent of the Korean war, a supplemental budget necessitated an additional amount of approximately eighteen billions.

The foregoing is the picture of the accomplishments of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress pertaining to affairs at home.

THE ATLANTIC UNION

On the international scene, in support of our ideals and our principles which we adhere to in the United Nations, the Congress enacted vital legislation to support the Atlantic Union.

This union was established to carry out the North Atlantic Treaty—the first act in the history of our country to renounce neutrality and to pledge assistance by the United States to countries abroad. The purpose of the Atlantic Union is carried out through our economic cooperation aid program:

Title I. Economic assistance to Europe and Asia.

Title II. Palestine refugee aid plan to resettle and to rehabilitate the refugees of this section so that the Nation of Israel can devote its energies to the necessary internal improvement.

Title III. Point 4 program: This is a noble plan for humanity, for security, for national defense. Its purpose is to develop the vast resources of undeveloped areas of the world through American techniques and American private capital.

VOICE OF AMERICA

Ninety million dollars were appropriated to the Voice of America to continue its program of educating the world on the truth of American democracy.

My constituents who have expressed themselves to me leave no doubt that the American public is well aware of the action of our Government in affairs at home and abroad. For the interest of my constituents, this report is respectfully submitted.

Not Above City Hall Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks an article that appeared in the Allegan (Mich.) Gazette shortly after the Truman insult to the United States Marine Corps. The writer, Leo W. Hoffman, points out that neither the President nor the officials under him have the right to ignore the basic law as provided in the Unification Act; but, of course, the New Deal officials have for many years been doing as they pleased. The law, as such, has never bothered them.

The article follows:

TRY AS HE MAY, TRUMAN CAN'T RISE ABOVE LEVEL OF A CITY HALL POLITICO

Recently Congressman McDONOUGH, of California, urged President Harry Truman to permit the Marine Corps to be represented on the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff.

To us the request seems a reasonable one. As long as the Marine Corps is a fighting organization and is usually the first to engage an enemy, it is only fair to argue that they should have a part in planning the battles they have to fight.

However Truman evidently thought otherwise. He replied to the Congressman in his now infamous letter wherein he stated that the Marine Corps "had a propaganda machine comparable to that of Stalin's" and that the Marine Corps was merely a police force, and would remain such as long as he was President.

Public opinion immediately made itself felt and first the President by letter to the head of the Marine Corps, and later in person, apologized, saying that he was sorry for his unfortunate choice of words and that by police force he had in mind the language of the Unification Act as applied to the Marine Corps.

Many of our metropolitan papers have commented upon the action of the President in saying that he was sorry and point out that it was big of him to apologize, and are willing to forgive and forget.

This little paper has a different opinion. We conclude that it is another example of Truman's unfitness to hold the highest office in the Nation.

The incident illustrates that Truman is inclined to be dictatorial, has little if any common sense, and is unfair and insincere.

First, the unification law provides in substance that the Marine Corps is primarily a fighting force and that in addition to its primary duty it shall also act as a police force in certain naval establishments, provided however, that this secondary police duty shall in no way interfere with its primary duty.

We repeat, the unification act is a law, and neither the President nor any other executive officer is above the law. The President cannot by Executive order change the character or duty of the Marine Corps. If he uses his power as President to circumvent the law, then he is violating his oath of office. His reply that the Marines would remain a police force as long as he is President indicates that he has little if any regard for the law and that he is inclined to use his power as President contrary to his duties as outlined in our Constitution. In brief, he wants his own way and whenever he can't get it he becomes angry and stubborn as would some little child who has not yet learned that obedience is necessary before you can accept responsibility.

Second, the incident indicates that Truman has little, if any, common sense. There are millions of Americans who believe that the Marine Corps is necessary to the defense of this country. In the fight by Truman and his supporters to reduce the Marine Corps to a police unit these people, unsupported by public tax money, have logically and reasonably presented their arguments in opposition to the President's plan. High Marine officers—refused the right to express their opinions by Executive order—resigned their commissions so that they could—as private citizens—express their opinion.

To compare the efforts of these people to preserve our Marine Corps with the Russian propaganda machine is so ridiculous as to indicate an utter lack of common, ordinary intelligence.

Third, Truman has permitted his two social schemers, Brannan and Ewing, to spend millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in advertising their schemes to socialize agriculture and medicine. If there is any propaganda machine in the country comparable to Stalin's, it is that employed contrary to law by Brannan and Ewing. We believe that this illustrates that Truman has little, if any, fairness in his makeup.

Fourth, Truman's apology comes a little late to be sincere. It was made only after the Marine Corps League had prepared a resolution condemning the President for his action and only after the press, radio, and people had expressed their opinion of the President's action.

In brief, his apology was window dressing; an apology of political necessity; one of expediency and not from the heart. When Truman said that by the use of the phrase "police force" he meant to refer to the language of the Unification Act, he is either guilty of complete ignorance of the English language or he is an unmitigated liar.

It is our conclusion that he is a liar because no one with his experience could be so ignorant. He must have read the act before he signed it, and its meaning is plain.

We conclude that this incident is only one blunder of many and illustrates Truman's unfitness for office. No matter how long he remains in office, he can never rise above the level of what he originally was—a member of the Pendergast city hall gang.

Jenner Needn't Worry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "JENNER Needn't Worry," published in the Chicago Daily Tribune of September 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JENNER NEEDN'T WORRY

Senator JENNER, of Indiana, knew, when he rose in the Senate the other day, that what he was going to say about General Marshall's unfitness for the office of Secretary of Defense wasn't going to win the acclaim of seaboard editors and radio announcers. The Senator was dead right. They thought it wasn't nice of him to examine the record and report the facts.

Nevertheless, the facts Mr. JENNER cited in his speech were not denied and they cannot be denied. The plain, inescapable truth is that General Marshall, the Chief of Staff before Pearl Harbor, knew that Mr. Roosevelt was engaging illegally in war against Germany and was consistently betraying this country's neutrality. When the Germans refused to accept these provocations to war, Mr. Roosevelt sought to get into the conflict by way of the Pacific and refused to make any terms with the Japanese that they could accept.

The short-run consequence was Pearl Harbor and the long-run consequences were the conquest of China and half of Europe by the Reds and the present war in Korea.

General Marshall's professed inability to recall where he was and what he was doing on the night of December 6, 1941, the most important night of his life, is an old story and so, too, is his failure on the morning of the 7th to alert his garrison in Hawaii. Mr. JENNER rightly called attention to these grave derelictions.

All through this period General Marshall was close to Mr. Roosevelt and went along with important conferences, and went along with his program of betraying the confidence of Congress and the American people. Mr. Roosevelt surrounded himself with Communists like Hiss and gave Russia priority over our own forces in the distribution of supplies at the cost of thousands of American lives. George Marshall attended all the conferences at which Russia got a free hand in Asia and eastern Europe. There is no record that he ever protested. His man, General Deane, in Russia reported again and again on Russia's true attitude but General Marshall took no warning.

His mission to China after the war was a ghastly failure in plan and execution. His Marshall plan originally contemplated enormous gifts to Russia as well as the western countries. When Russia refused to participate, the plan was proclaimed as the certain means of placing western Europe in a position to defend itself against Russia. It has not done so. The plan was supposed to operate until 1952; now its indefinite extension is assumed by the very people who are denouncing Mr. JENNER for daring to say that General Marshall isn't much of a statesman.

Mr. JENNER's speech is one of the few that have been made in this Congress that are likely to be read in years to come. Naturally it has been resented by those of his colleagues in the Senate who were themselves parties to the betrayal of the American people by the regime in which the general occupied a key position. Naturally, too, the speech is resented by the editors and radio commentators who were in the conspiracy against America and helped spread the New Deal's falsehoods.

Mr. JENNER need not worry about the attacks on him. The Korean war is itself proof that he is right, for the New Deal promised peace as the fruit of the last war and the promise was false. The American people know now that they were betrayed. They will be grateful to Mr. JENNER for his part in presenting the evidence.

Excess-Profits Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I voted to impose without delay a tax on the wartime profits of corporations.

The purpose of this so-called excess-profits tax, as I see it, is primarily to help raise funds to defray the expenses of our present "little war" in Korea, and all the other "little wars" presumed to be on Stalin's timetable.

But a second, and almost equally important purpose of the excess-profits tax, in this war as in those preceding it, is to drain off from corporate treasuries virtually all of those profits which may be excessive, by reason of the favored position of corporations as war contractors.

In other words, the excess-profits tax is one of the mechanisms used by the Government, both to raise war funds and to make sure that no corporate entity in control of a part of the means of production shall use that control to profit excessively from the desperate necessity for haste in getting a tremendous output of war materials and equipment.

As we all know, war contracts usually are made hastily and in large volume. Contract terms are generous, in order to expedite war production. Furthermore, no war contractor is going to shave prices on a "quickie" contract when wartime inflation so easily can make price shaving disastrous for all concerned. The excess-profits tax simply acts as a curb, as well as a source of Government income.

Now I did not think a few days ago, and I do not think now, that present proposals as to technical details of the excess-profits tax measure are satisfactory. Far from it. Drastic changes will be necessary. I did think, however, and still remain convinced that it was desirable to serve quick notice to the American people, and to American soldiers in Korea, that nobody at home shall be permitted to escape a fair share of the war burden. Profiteering is o-u-t, out.

So far as the faulty details of present excess-profits-tax proposals are concerned, it was my opinion that Congress should first get the tax into effect and then proceed to iron out the faults. Too much emphasis cannot be laid on the moral effect, upon the general public and the armed forces alike, of early imposition of this tax. American soldiers, and the American people, as well as American industry, will exert their best efforts only when they know, beyond question, that favoritism is dead.

But Congress, as a whole, decided that imposition of the excess-profits tax shall be preceded by public hearings and study by the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee. With this decision I shall not quarrel, because it was agreed that the tax shall be made retroactive, either to June 24, when the war started, or to October 1, covering the last quarter of the calendar year. Thus forewarned, industry may be expected to set up the necessary tax reserves.

Nevertheless, as I said a moment ago, drastic changes in the present excess-tax proposals will be necessary. As they are now made they would lay the major portion of the burden on the shoulders of those least able to pay; the small corporations, whose profits out of subcontracts usually are small compared with those of the big prime contractors.

At the same time this very misapplication of the excess-profits tax not only would let the big corporations escape the heaviest part of the burden, while the medium-sized and small corporations would not, but the tax yield itself would be small. It should be borne in mind that we must make this war, and others to come, pay-as-you-go wars, so far as that may be possible. The tremendous proportions of our $264,000,000,000 national debt, the onset of wartime inflation, the necessity of preserving national solvency demand it.

I shall not attempt here to discuss at length the reasons why the present excess-tax proposals must be revised; even though such revision might take the form of amendments after the tax is imposed. It is preferable, I believe, to quote the words of Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and a tax expert second to none in America.

"It simply cannot be done," said the Georgia Senator. "It is impossible to impose on the structure of the Excess Profits Tax Act of World War II a new excess-profits tax act, when conditions are not only different but when they actually are completely opposite to the conditions which existed when we formulated the Excess Profits Act for World War II.

"The difficulty about an excess-profits tax," Senator GEORGE went on to explain, "is this: A tax of the kind which is no more than the changing of a base period, with an attempt to fit it into an act which was passed at the beginning of World War II, is wholly inapplicable, because none of the relief provisions will grant the relief actually needed, and the average credit formulas will not properly apply."

Without relief provisions in an excess-profits-tax law, the result is one of the most harmful forms of taxation that possibly could be devised, the Senator concluded.

He meant, of course, that without proper safeguards, to assure equitable application of the tax, it could happen, and probably would, that companies producing the most vitally needed war supplies, would be taxed out of existence at a critical moment, when lack of such supplies might bring disaster at sea, in the air, or on the battlefields.

Furthermore, failure to provide proper tax relief in hardship cases, and inequitable application of credit formulas, would be bound to encourage wasteful spending and inefficiency on the part of war contractors. Especially would this be so in the case of medium and small companies, which did not prosper after World War II, and whose postwar earnings base period would show returns so low as to make their new wartime excess-profits taxes excessively high.

Wastefulness and inefficiency on the part of war contractors, whose motive for economy and efficiency would be destroyed by excessive wartime taxes, could not do otherwise than add to the wartime inflation, which already is upon us. As a matter of cold fact, it should be said that because of the resultant tendency toward wastefulness, excess-profits taxes are deflationary only insofar and no further, than they provide the Government with money it otherwise would have to borrow. The inflationary effect probably is the greatest.

Possibly the effort of those weighed with the responsibility for making the excess-profits-tax law equitable, and at the same time high in tax yield, should be to keep the tax rate at levels not so high as to encourage wasteful practices. The latter would serve only to reduce tax income, while adding to inflation.

I say this at the risk, perhaps, of an accusation that I harbor a too tender regard for the interests of big business. But I speak, also, in the knowledge that there are other, and better, methods of reaching those excess profits. Methods that are better because they adhere more closely to the rules of fairness; methods that operate to make those pay most, who benefit most from war-created industrial prosperity.

One of those methods consists of a straight, across-the-board boost in corporation taxes. This, perhaps, is the least important of the various methods, so far as Government income is concerned. But it is fair to everyone concerned, because it is a tax paid strictly in proportion to present earnings, with no reference at all to what earnings may have been in some former period of years. All corporate taxpayers are on an even basis, with favoritism out of the window.

It appears to me that Congress has done a good job with respect to this form of taxation. The bill provides for a yearly increase of about $1,500,000,000 in corporate taxes, as distinguished from excess-profits levies. The bill would increase individual income taxes by about $2,750,000,000 annually. When it is considered that all corporate incomes this year will total only about $30,000,000,000, compared with a national income of something more than $220,000,000,000, it would seem that Congress has leaned over backward to protect wage earners and other individual income-tax payers.

The only danger here, as in respect to excess-profits taxes, is that the rate may prove to be so high that postwar industry may lack reserves wherewith to maintain employment and seek new markets, when war production ceases.

Another method for getting at those excess profits, and by far the most important and effective, is through what is called contract renegotiation. You may recall that this method was used during and immediately after World War II. It returned to the United States Treasury billions of dollars that otherwise would have been added to the cost of that war.

In substance, contract renegotiation is a mechanism whereby the Government keeps watch on the actual costs of war production in the various plants; and then, in the light of those costs, the Government proceeds to reprice everything it buys from the war contractors. In most instances, prices are revised downward, and substantially so. In a few isolated instances, prices are revised upward, when some unforeseen production difficulty, or increase in the cost of raw materials, makes it necessary in order to maintain satisfactory output of war goods.

Under all circumstances, by means of price renegotiation, prices and costs are so geared to one another, that war materials, munitions, and equipment are obtained at the lowest possible prices, which at the same time give the war contractors enough money to stay in business and continue production efficiently. At the same time, by this renegotiation method, public policy can be served insofar as it concerns leaving the war contractors funds wherewith in postwar years they may rehabilitate their plants, seek new markets and in general, maintain high levels of employment.

In the last war, contract renegotiation was conducted under the direction of Joseph M. Dodge, president of the Detroit Bank, and if any man ever deserved the gratitude of the taxpayers, who comprise all of the people, it is this Michigan banker and businessman.

On the basis of the considerations I have outlined for you, it would seem that Congress should act quickly to impose an excess-profits tax; but at the same time, that tax should be kept down to levels that will serve only to drain off such excessive profits as may redound, by reason of the war, to all corporations, whether or not they are engaged in war production. With equal expedition, provision should be made for setting up a contract renegotiation board; and this method should be used to recover all funds paid out by the Government, which may constitute war production profits in excess of such normal rates as public policy dictates.

If these things are done, I believe it will be possible to distribute the war-cost burden fairly and honestly among the various elements—wage earners, corporations, stockholders, and those who may fall into none of these categories. These things must be done, because every day it becomes more evident that a series of little wars is bound to explode eventually into world war III.

The Three Keys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege in 1947 to view the American GI's in Trieste under the command of Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore and I shall always remember how thrilled I was over their smart appearance and obvious discipline.

More recently General Moore, whose military record is so brilliant, has taken over the superintendency of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. Last Sunday I was pleased to note in the supplement of the New York Herald Tribune a featured article, The Three Keys, by General Moore, in which he points to the three-word motto of the Academy, "Duty, Honor, Country," as a guide to both soldier and citizen in this time of crisis. The article follows:

THE THREE KEYS

(By Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore)

In these days, every school—including West Point—has a double duty. One is to train the minds of its students; the other is to help form their character. As knowledge expands that becomes a difficult task. The sheer effort of mastering many complicated subjects tends to crowd out everything else.

That is why we are grateful for the coat of arms of the Military Academy. The motto emblazoned on the scroll consists of three words: Duty, Honor, Country. These are the three keys of character, and for the West Pointer they are an everlasting reminder of the other side of education, a reminder that, in life, a man without character, however clever, is nothing.

Duty, Honor, Country. These are simple, elemental words. They need no interpretation.

Duty goes further than mere obedience to orders. It implies willingness, loyal execution, and the sacrifice of personal interest, if necessary.

Country means more than display of patriotic sentiment. It calls for devotion, whether in the tedium of unspectacular service or the mortal struggle of the battlefield.

Honor is the central and highest word on the scroll. It is the keystone of the arch; for without it, all principles, ideals, and beliefs will surely fail.

This trinity of principle is the heritage of the American people. West Point received it from the founders of the Republic—Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Monroe—who were also the founders of the Academy. It has been tried in the fire of experience and found equal to the test. It guided West Pointers in war and peace for a century and a half. Grant found in it the key to victory, and Lee the strength to turn bitter defeat to the service of a reunited country. Pershing, Eisenhower, and MacArthur drew their power from it.

Duty, Honor, Country. Here are three words to guide both soldier and citizen in these troubled times. They are words to live by.

Have We Licked Foot and Mouth?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Have We Licked Foot and Mouth?" written by Paul Friggens and published in the October 1950 issue of the Farm Journal. The article refers to the aftosa or foot-and-mouth-disease-eradication program which the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Animal Industry, has conducted. They have done a splendid job in Mexico. I believe the article gives much good information to all who read it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAVE WE LICKED FOOT AND MOUTH?

(By Paul Friggens)

MEXICO CITY.—The greatest experiment in livestock history is winding up in Mexico. But don't let anyone tell you that we're all through fighting the dread foot-and-mouth plague—aftosa, as the Mexicans call it.

United States and Mexican forces have performed four vaccinations on every pig, goat, sheep, and cow they could find between quarantine lines in Mexico—60,000,000 vaccinations.

We would have trouble vaccinating again. The Mexicans might not take it.

Science has done everything it knows how to do. We've got to stop now, sit tight, and wait for 8 months or a year—at least—to see if the gigantic vaccination experiment worked.

On August 1 we shut down mass vaccination, began pulling out our crews. We're leaving behind a rear guard of 1,500 Mexican and American inspectors, under orders to "find aftosa and destroy it." We're maintaining an 800-mile northern quarantine line, manned by Mexican soldiers.

The United States must stick in Mexico for another year—maybe two—before we can say we're out of the woods with aftosa, and the $10,000,000,000 United States livestock industry is no longer threatened.

"This is the most critical period of all," Gen. Harry H. Johnson, American codirector, told me.

"We believe aftosa still exists in Mexico. We're doing everything we can to find it. I'd like to assure livestock growers that this campaign is a success. But whether it is, it's too early to say."

Señor Oscar Flores, Mexican codirector, says flatly: "Aftosa is 95 percent licked."

Around aftosa headquarters in Mexico City and out in the field, though, the attitude is a cautious "wait and see." And there are good reasons.

"Vaccination never was totally effective," stresses General Johnson. "At best, it was only an aid—good for only 4 months. It's no good against a hot or massive infection."

By November 1—4 months after the last vaccination—probably 17,000,000 animals will be susceptible to aftosa again in Mexico. If there are small, sporadic outbreaks, the United States and Mexican forces are ready to move in fast. But if aftosa ever flares out of control again as it did before—then we're unquestionably through in Mexico.

We will have tried slaughter, and killed 1,000,000 animals.

We will have tried the world's greatest vaccination experiment.

Not a single outbreak has been reported this year. "On the other hand, aftosa is tricky," says Dr. L. R. Noyes, assistant director. "We don't know how long it will remain on the premises under ideal conditions. And we don't know how long animals remain carriers."

Meanwhile, General Johnson is cutting his 6,000-man crew in half. At the peak, aftosa cost us about $2,500,000 per month; we vaccinated 24,664 animals per hour, 8 hours a day, 6 days a week.

Vaccinators forded wild rivers, hugged dangerous mountain trails, dodged bullets and bandits, battled disease, and isolation.

"Gringo" (American) haters spread the story that vaccination produced sterility, poisoned the milk. In Guerrero State, only 500,000 animals were produced on first vaccination. But confidence grew later. About 1,200,000 animals were brought in for the second vaccination; 1,668,000 for the third.

On the Guatemalan border, vaccinators traveled by cayouca—a hollowed-out mahogany log; hauled their horses across swift streams in these same boats.

Communists kept up bitter attacks. Late this summer a Communist rally threatened to attack the United States Embassy in Mexico City. The Communists want us to fail.

But the worst difficulties were physical. Vaccinators stood waist-deep in malarial swamps in southern Mexico. There were no fences. You caught the cattle right in the water.

To keep vaccine effective, it had to be brought in ice from Mexico City laboratories, often hundreds of miles into the back country. Vaccinators used boats, pack trains, airplanes—sometimes hacking out their own airstrips. Vaccine often was stored in deep holes.

Steamed up by the fiery General Johnson, who turned a rout into a full-scale offensive (he was likely to show up anywhere in the field before breakfast), aftosa fighters somehow did the job.

What's more, costs dropped from $16 per shot to 35 cents. Today the general is cutting all costs below $1,000,000 a month. Total cost of the campaign so far is about $150,000,000.

As the vaccinators carried on then, so the inspectors carry on today.

They camp out in pairs—a Mexican and an American—and make joint reports, inspecting every ranch every 30 days.

Often the inspector has to climb through the window of a thatched hut to find a sick pig under the bed, or hidden down the well.

Mexican livestock suffers from every other disease from anthrax to hog cholera, and all must be reported fast. With the livestock industry of Mexico and the United States still at stake, inspectors can't take a chance. It might be aftosa.

As long as there's a single case, we still have a job in Mexico. Vaccination has ended. Now we're depending on inspection—and hope.

International Law Is Ignored by Victorious Occupation Forces, This Is a Deterrent to a Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, our conduct as a victorious power in World War II and as one of the occupying forces now stationed in former enemy lands, is open to serious question. It appears that we have openly been a party to flaunting well-established international rules of law as set up by the Hague Convention. There is a good deal of propaganda in circulation today by those who contend that peace can come only by a world government based upon law. Yet these groups and officials in our Government have seen fit to ignore a great body of international law which has accumulated over the centuries.

Since the termination of active hostilities in Europe and in the Far East, Congress has been requested by the President to furnish appropriations so that we can maintain a semblance of compliance to the Hague Convention which obligates this country as a military occupant to prevent disease and unrest and to restore and maintain proper order and normal living conditions in the occupied areas. This is in essence, Mr. Speaker, a provision under said convention. Now what do we find in actual practice?

Soviet dictators, the Polish puppet government, the British and the French occupation forces were declaring that the Hague Convention rules were not applicable to the victors. No doubt in order to justify the looting of conquered territory, the destruction of competition, the retention of prisoners of war as slave labor, the uprooting of people from their homes resulting in a further burden on the economy of the defeated nations. Even the executive branch of this Government, while insisting upon the sanctity of the Hague Treaty before this body and while engaged at Nuremberg in expressing righteous indignation because the vanquished had violated the Hague Convention concerning military obligations, was conniving with other victors to impose a Morgenthau plan to dismantle the private plants in our occupied areas and actually giving these war plants to Stalin without compensation to the rightful owners, and otherwise carrying out an occupation in the United States zone which was as illegal under the Hague Convention as the acts of many convicted war criminals.

Mr. Speaker, many of those lawyers who participated in this dishonorable act and who had some qualms of conscience endeavored later to find legal justification for it. Numerous grounds were suggested but now that another conflict which again involves the occupation of many European countries appears imminent, a justice of one of the few neutral countries of World War II expresses a fear of the precedent that we have established. Justice Algot Bagge, Swedish member of the Permanent Court for National Arbitration, in a Danish periodical discusses and gently annihilates the many reasons presented to justify this double-dealing. He then observes that the Hague Convention represents an interpretation which had its origin in a more civilized period, free from hysteria, and we should try to do something to preserve what there is still left of it.

Mr. Speaker, since the question will eventually involve appropriations of money for occupation purposes since observation of international law is the surest way to achieve peace in the world; since the Hague Convention has been accepted by this country as a treaty; since we must eventually make a peace treaty with Germany and Japan; and since there will be further military occupations in which this country will participate; let us pray, only as the occupiers. I present a partial translation of Justice Bagge's article which probably represents the views of the thinking people in western Europe today. It follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL STATUS OF THE BIG POWERS IN GERMANY

(By Dr. Algot Bagge)

The 15 prominent lawyers who have been commissioned by the United Nations to ascertain what international law is still in force and also to patch up the wreck of the international law which has remained after the World War have not had an easy task. To ascertain in what form international conventions exist which are still regarded as binding and to interpret their substance, may sometimes present great difficulties, but to prove that there is orthodox law within international law puts the legal opinion and objectivity of the 15 lawyers to a still harder test. International law is just like a chameleon; it changes its aspect according to those who have the power in the world. To be sure, the small nations may be able to claim that a change in the present international law on the part of one of the big powers in unacceptable, but in the course of time one nation after another will find itself outside of the community of the big powers and forced to adjust itself even from a legal point of view to the new state of affairs, and thereby to recognize de facto the new order in international law which is tied up with it.

Such a case of theoretical interest and practical significance is the question of the international legal status of the Four Big Powers with respect to occupied Germany.

The beginning of the year 1943 already subsequent to the conference at Casablanca, marked the emergence of the proposition from the Anglo-Saxon quarter to unconditional surrender as an objective of war. Very likely it was attempted in this manner to avoid the difficulties and charges of breach of promise which Wilson's 14 points had caused during the previous World War.

When shortly thereafter at Yalta, in February 1945, the United States of America, Great Britain, and Soviet Russia agreed on the treatment to be meted out to Germany after victory, that point of the program came in handy. It was inconceivable to achieve a change of the German entity of such sweeping proportions as was planned there without an unconditional surrender.

But, as Prof. Andre Gros says in his article, a Condition Juridique de l'Allemagne (the Legal Status of Germany) in the Revue Générale du Droit International Public (1946, p. 76), such a situation, which is comparable to the Roman "deditio", by which the defeated nation by agreement surrenders to the good will of the victor who thereafter has all rights over persons and property, is no longer recognized under international law.

It is therefore natural that the legal profession in the Allied Big Powers has shown an interest in how the Yalta program might be brought into harmony with currently valid international law. The greatest obstacle in this regard is considered to be the War on Land Laws of 1907 (hereafter called Hague Convention).

A comparison between the program of the Four Allied Big Powers for the treatment of Germany and the regulations of the Hague Convention is, therefore, of interest.

An unconditional surrender of the various German military forces took place in May 1945. The surrender was, however, only a military surrender, signed by authority of the German High Command. With Doenitz, whom Hitler had selected as his successor, the Allies wanted to have nothing to do; he would not under any circumstances pronounce himself in favor of this military surrender. The documents of surrender contained no mention of Germany's status after this military surrender.

On June 5, 1945, the Berlin declaration was promulgated, signed by the Supreme Commanders of the Big Four Powers, acting by authority of their respective Governments. It was stated therein that these governments were assuming the supreme authority with respect to Germany, including all the powers possessed by the German Government and any local government or authority.

In September 1945 a series of proclamations, laws, orders, directives, and instructions began to be issued by the control council regarding the implementation of the resolutions of the Potsdam Conference bearing at length upon the question concerning personal integrity and private property of the German people.

The regulations of the Hague Convention should then be compared therewith. Under section I of the Convention is treated the belligerents; under section II, the hostilities; and under section III, the military authority on enemy alien territory.

Under the provisions concerning hostilities are taken up the subjects of surrenders and armistice, to be followed by the provisions for military authority on enemy alien territory. In accordance with the last-mentioned stipulations, an area is regarded as occupied when it finds itself under the authority of the enemy army. Inasmuch as the authority of legitimate power (l'autorité du pouvoir légal) passes over de facto to the occupant, he shall take all necessary steps to assure general order and security and at the same time, unless it is absolutely infeasible, respect the laws which are in force in the country. Family honor and rights, as well as the life of the individual, shall be respected. Private property shall be respected. It shall not be seized. Looting is prohibited. If the occupant imposes taxes or other contributions he shall, as far as possible, follow the current tax legislation of the country. He shall also pay the expenses of the administration of the territory. Other financial contributions are to be levied by the occupant only in an amount sufficient to provide for the needs of the troops and administrative expenses [connected therewith]. Receipts shall be rendered for contributions imposed. Requisitions in kind shall be made only to an extent sufficient to provide for the needs of the occupation troops. So far as possible, payment shall be made on demand or as quickly as possible. The occupying army may seize all movable property of a state which may be used for military operations. War needs, such as munitions stores, means of transportation, reserve stockpiles of any kind, although privately owned, shall be seized, but returned and compensation paid when peace is made. The occupying states must not regard themselves other than as administrators and utilizers of public buildings, real estate, wood- and farm-land facilities, under the ownership of the enemy state and located within the occupied country. Property which is used for religious purposes, care of the needy, education, and scientific pursuits shall also be treated as property under private ownership in the respective state.

In accordance with the contemporary international legal postliminium theory, the previous legal status obtains again after a belligerent occupation is ended. The former government resumes the administration. Real and personal property, etc., must be returned to the owners if the occupant has taken steps to which he was not entitled under international law, the postliminium invalidity of those unlawful measures becomes evident (Oppenheim, International Law, 1944, vol. II, pp. 487 ff.).

There has been no doubt on the part of the Allied Big Four Powers that the agreement with regard to the treatment of Germany (disarmament, political reorganization, reeducation, population transfers, reparations to be taken out of personal property, etc.), far exceeds what under the Hague Convention is accepted as belligerent occupation. At the same time there is unanimous agreement that the occupying Big Powers continue to be bound by the Hague Convention.

It has consequently been of vital importance to demonstrate that the Hague Convention is not applicable to the situation at hand.

Justice Bagge then discusses the suggestion, made in 1945, before the American Society of International Law by a representative of the Department of Justice, to avoid the Hague Convention obligations and legally justify the Morgenthau plan. This suggestion was that the victors end the war by a declaration of unconditional surrender or merely a declaration of termination of war, and avoid the customary treaty of peace. Then, it was concluded, the Allies would be able to do what they wished, unhampered by international law. Bagge observes that the only recognized unilateral declaration which can end a state of war is a declaration of annexation.

Bagge also comments upon the view of the former German jurist, Prof. Hans Kelsen—another protagonist of the Morgenthau plan—that Germany ceased to exist after the "unconditional surrender," so the war ended and the Allies were no longer governed by the Hague Convention and its laws concerning wartime occupation. Bagge cites subsequent British and American judicial decisions which hold that the war continues and that Germany continues to exist as a nation.

There are, meanwhile, other circumstances which may give rise to doubt whether, although the state of war continues to exist between Germany and the Allies, we are dealing here with a belligerent occupation.

The Control Council and its dependencies is undoubtedly a military government. According to the United States Department of State Bulletin of May 13, 1946, the Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, had stated that "the Four Allied Big Powers Military (High) Command has worked out a joint program to impose a stern military government" over Germany in order to carry into effect the policy agreed upon at Yalta. It can hardly be interpreted otherwise than that Germany is under the authority of the enemy army (Hague Convention, art. 42).

But it is obvious that at least certain stipulations in the Hague Convention have reference only to the event that the opponents of the occupying power still have an active army or, to say the least, have allies who carry on hostile operations of a military nature. In this respect article 44 prohibits a belligerent from compelling the population within the occupied territory to supply information concerning the army of the other belligerent, or to take part in military operations against their country (art. 52).

It would, however, be premature to draw from this the conclusion that the Hague Convention in its entirety bears upon a situation where hostile operations of a military nature continue to be carried on. The individual stipulations intended for such a situation need not imply that the same holds true of other stipulations in the convention which also fit a situation where similar operations no longer occur.

The following discussion confirms the assumption that the Hague Convention is to be regarded applicable even under an occupation which continues after an armistice pact is concluded and thus hostile operations of a military nature have ceased, but the state of war continues to prevail. See Feilchenfeld, the International Economic Law of Belligerent Occupation, Washington, 1942, paragraph 396, where he says: "An armistice presupposes that the war has not yet come to an end. Admittedly, the rules of international law, including the Hague regulations on occupants, continue to apply so far as they are not superseded by provisions contained in the armistice agreement."

The Swedish jurist then raises the question whether, by an armistice agreement, a more harsh treatment may be imposed on the occupied country than that permitted under the Hague Convention.

It will, in any event, have been brought out that the aim which the victorious power under international law has a right to pursue for its own ends by "belligerent occupation," must be differentiated from the goal which the victorious power wants to attain by a war. War objectives may be the destruction of the military and economic power of the vanquished for all time, the usurpation of portions of the territory of the defeated state and economic resources, as well as the imposition of reparations. Such aims may not, under presently enforced international law, be pursued for selfish ends through the actual power which an occupation implies. These aims are designed to stablize the relationship between the victor and the vanquished if they are not in conformity with the transitional nature of the occupation. It has been rightfully said that the guiding principle is that the occupation power must not undertake anything which is calculated to become a permanent condition. (See Castberg, Postliminium, 1944, p. 13.)

If, therefore, the occupation extends beyond the time limit set for the cessation of military operations, under international law this does not imply any increase in the powers of the occupant other than as motivated by the extension of the duration of the occupation.

It is therefore inconceivable that it is the intention of the stipulation of article 39 of the Hague Convention, on the possibility that by the armistice pact the relations of the population toward the occupant power be regulated, to make possible a defeat of the principles which are subsequently laid down in articles 42 to 50 of the Convention.

Should, however, the four allied big powers be regarded, under international law, to have overthrown the protective system of the Hague Convention by an armistice pact, there may be a question whether it is only a formality to be disregarded, inasmuch as the four Allies have taken the matter in their own hands and unilaterally declared the Hague Convention in its entirety null and void.

It should not be long, as soon as the military opposition is beaten down—which may occur immediately or under continuing belligerent occupation—before an unconditional surrender may [lawfully?] permit a unilateral complete setting aside of the protective regulations of the Hague Convention.

Justice Bagge points out that the Hague regulations require that the status of the population with regard to the occupant be regulated by armistice agreement, and not by a unilateral declaration of the victor. He observes, also, that the Berlin declaration states that Germany has no central government to carry on such negotiations, but he does not believe that this should effect the protection to which the German people are legally entitled, since the Allies would neither recognize Doenitz as Hitler's successor, not permit a government to function.

Justice Bagge then discusses the view proposed by a British professor, R. Y. Jennings, that Germany is in a new kind of legal status, between the final victory and the termination of war, in which the German people have lost their sovereignty and cannot recreate it. To refute this argument he quotes the British Attorney General, Sir Hartley Shawcross, that England "is now in belligerent occupation of Germany, with the army of occupation in control."

Even though, nevertheless, the Hague Convention should not be regarded as applicable in this connection, it is necessary that in addition to the negative presumption that the Hague Convention is not applicable, the unlimited power which the Allies exercise in Germany be recognized under international law and also, that a positive legal basis for that power can be proved.

The legal basis cited by the Berlin Declaration to establish the facts as they had been created was the unconditional surrender in conjunction with the absence of a German Government and the declaration of the Allies to assume the supreme power.

Professor Jennings has developed this point of view in greater detail in his article (British Year Book, 1946, p. 136). He stresses, and rightly so, that the legal basis for the Berlin Declarations cannot be effected merely by proving the inapplicability of the Hague Convention. Assumption of "the supreme authority" must be supported "by a demonstration of positive title."

Such a "demonstration" has been attempted by Kelsen in his article on "The international legal status of Germany according to the declaration of Berlin" (op. cit., pp. 519 ff.).

Justice Bagge observes that Professor Kelsen upholds the view that the Berlin Declaration resulted in the Control Council's assumption of sovereignty over Germany without annexation thereof, which has not hitherto been considered legally possible. Kelsen bases this theory on the premise that the German state has ceased to exist—a premise which the British Government, including its courts, have since denied. Bagge cites the Modern Law Review, 1947, page 407, for a further discussion:

Judging from the extremely far-reaching powers which have been vested in the Control Council, the Four Allied Big Powers must in any case regard themselves as having acquired, under international law, the right to exercise the still existing sovereign legal powers of the German state.

The Allies, however, count on exercising neither the powers which Hitler had usurped—all meddling in this regard has been expressly forbidden—now their predecessor's constitutional competence under which the German subjects were protected against intervention of the state in an entirely different way than under the present Allied Military Government. The Allies might do well to refrain from interfering with the unlimited right of the German people to exercise the sovereignty which resides in the German state. No cession of this right through representatives of the German people has as yet taken place. The unconditional surrender was an act pronounced against the military only and to be carried into effect by them.

This unilaterally assumed sovereignty is exercised by the Four Allied Big Powers jointly through the Control Council. Inasmuch as the German state continues to exist, there is still a state of war between it and the Allies, in spite of the fact that Germany is governed by the Allied Power and authority (competence). In this respect there is no lack of agreement with the certificate of the foreign office.

Professor Andre Gros, who in his article in the Revue General de Droit International Public (op. cit., pp. 67 ff.) rejects the Kelsen theory on the establishment of sovereignty of the four occupying powers, leaning most closely to the idea that the four governments might assume a provisional trusteeship of the German territory in the interest of world security and for the purpose indicated in the Preamble to the Berlin Declaration of June 5, 1945. An interpretation of this Declaration, which is noteworthy because of the choice of language, should, Gros says, prevent one from concluding there is a sovereignty of the occupying power over the German territory. Professor Gros holds that the Allied governments' unilateral decision has been made possible exclusively on the ground that the organ of the German state has disappeared. Therefore, no general or particular convention on law in warfare binds the Allies with respect to Germany.

Jennings says finally that although the true meaning of "subjugation" is conquest together with annexation of the enemy state, the same legal principles apply to conquest in unison with the assumption of the powers of the enemy government, "always provided the former enemy government has ceased to exist."

This theory, which concerning its application specifically provides that "the former enemy government has ceased to exist," leads first of all to the question as to the various instances in which such a government has ceased to exist. It is not clear that it ceases if the government is exiled. Nor if all of the members of the government die, or the government mandate is terminated for some other reason. If there is evidence of the continued presence of the head of the state who is able to appoint a new government, that ought to be ample grounds for existence. In the event that the head of the state is a president, whose term of office runs out, but a new president may be elected under the constitution, that ought to be ground enough; provided that the occupation does not place insurmountable obstacles in the way of a new election. But if the occupying power intentionally prevents such an election, is that sufficient reason for not creating a government competent to be given a legal title to power. The Hague Convention prescribes that the laws of the occupied country shall be applied unless this is absolutely infeasible. No exception is made in the case of a constitutional state. One can go still further and hold that the Hague Convention gives the occupied people a right to create a new constitution and with it a new government if it is practicable to do so under an occupation. There is also a question as to whether the Allies, due to the fact that they had not wanted to accept, without extensive negotiations and for other obvious reasons, the provisional successor chosen by Germany's former unreservedly recognized head of state, could claim a legal title based on the excuse that the German Government "had ceased to exist."

Jennings solves this question by saying that the German Government has been extinguished by its authority having been transferred to the conqueror and that the right for their taking this step is the reason for the conqueror's right to annex Germany—although he has declared that he will never make use of this right.

Jennings' interpretation, that the party justified in annexing—the German state—is also justified, without in this manner stepping in as soverign, in assuming to exercise all soverign rights, is contrary to classical international law. There are a good many reasons which may be mentioned with regard to this particular stand toward the problem. As a rule, a sovereign governs his people in the interest of their welfare, unless he is a dictator who has no consideration for the people's welfare. The same reason namely, interest in the people's welfare, does not apply in the case of a transitional occupant. There is, therefore, no inducement for such a transitional government to protect the people's rights under international law. It is likely that these considerations are not alien to the Hague Convention nor to the interpretation of classical international law with respect to its application.

"When does a government cease to exist?" asks Bagge.

Probably not when it is exiled, or if its members are deceased, or their mandate otherwise terminated, especially if there is existing provision for election or appointment of these officials. But suppose the occupying power prevents an election. He believes this itself is a violation of the Hague regulations. He also questions whether the Allies can claim a legal title based on this theory where they refused to accept Hitler's provisional successor. With respect to Professor Jennings' view—that since the Allies could end the government by annexing Germany, they had power to end the government without annexation—he observes that the reason why international law never accepted this theory is because the sovereign is assumed to govern in the interests of his people, but a transitional occupant has such interest in the welfare of the occupied peoples.

Finally it should be mentioned that the significance of the Hague Convention would not be lessened by obliging the occupying states to approve, in a peace treaty, the measures which had been taken contrary to its terms. If without the protective terms contained in the Hague Convention having been notified by an armistice pact and the regulations of the convention should continue to be regarded as applicable, such a forced approval would likewise constitute a violation of the Hague Convention as being an act performed under the occupation in direct conflict with the Hague Convention. Otherwise the Hague Convention has been frustrated in a manner which cannot be regarded acceptable.

Professor Jennings, who so brilliantly defended the formal right of the Four Allied Big Powers to assume "the supreme authority," has at length found, it seems, that this new development—Mr. Bevin answered on March 20, 1946, a question from the floor in the lower House, "The positions of the Allied Control Council and that of Germany are without precedent" (Hansard, vol. 420, p. 1856)—calls for sanctions based on international moral standards. He says (p. 139) that when a state wages an aggressive war contrary to the most solemn covenants, it would be an anachronism of most damaging kind to observe the normal laws for military occupation. But, Jennings says, the aim of the occupation must be "effective control and reeducation of a recalcitrant member of the community of nations at large" and not "the individual benefit or aggrandizement of the occupying powers."

Even if this were now the case with the procedure in Germany—it is, after all, extremely difficult to cultivate such an aim especially with regard to what is revealed in the eternal quandry of the occupant in the matter of German property and German territory. There is reason for doubt that the goal is at all times what Jennings demands it to be—the rules of international law are concerned with the power of a victor during the time of occupation to interfere with the vanquished people to their disadvantage, as a result of fears concerning this power. A future combination of victorious powers, of a composition other than the present, may find that another educational and political "reeducation" should take place in order to achieve harmony with their respective moral and political beliefs. I am inclined to think that experience has shown that a "community of nations at large," unanimously agreed on these questions, is an illusion—at least within the reasonably near future. Those grounds and the procedure based thereon should therefore not be incorporated into international law. More likely, I believe, the statements of Professor Kelsen in his article in the International Law Quarterly (1947, p. 171) would hold true: "If the principles which are applied in Nuremberg should become a precedent—a legislative rather than a judicial precedent—after the next war, the governments in the victorious states would pass judgment on crimes by the governments in the defeated nations which have a definitely unilateral and retroactive effect. "Let us hope," he says, "that there is no such precedent."

This may happen, however, since a considerable number of matters have been brought up for discussion in connection with the procedure of the Allied Four Big Powers in Germany, as seen from the point of view of meaningless conformity with hitherto valid international law. This procedure has been approved by a great number of nations which were enemies of Germany during the war and, as concerns the other nations, as I have indicated before, they have had to adapt themselves to the actual state of affairs, that is, they have had to give their de facto approval to this state of affairs.

A discussion such as this is, perhaps, not without practical signficance with respect to international law. It is obvious that the new developments in international law present a great hazard to the Hague Convention. The first thought of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence in taking up this problem has been to produce sufficient grounds for setting aside the Hague Convention. That this means retrogression in the wartime protection of the population under international law is also clear. And that is not merely a theoretical question. In the April 1946 volume of International Affairs, Sir John Leale, who led the inhabitants of occupied Guernsey against the German occupant, reports that the Hague Convention was of great help to him. He said: "To the man who states, 'Civilized nations pay homage to the Hague Convention, it is not easy to reply, 'Well, I won't, anyhow' and at the same time to maintain one's self-respect; and the Germans were very, very self-respecting." The circumstances were, on the other hand, terribly different in the case of the countries occupied by the Germans. But we must map out our campaign on the assumption that international law will become regarded as a valuable prop for the civilian population, also against an unscrupulous occupant. Otherwise we might as well give up altogether working for an international law in this area of warfare.

The totalitarian ideas, which have been introduced into the relationship between state and population during the past 10 years, has also facilitated an objectionably harsh treatment of the occupied people. The Hague Convention represents an interpretation which has its origin in a more civilized period, and we should try to do everything in our power to preserve what there is still left of it. At least, the states which it may be presumed will became the victims of a belligerent occupation have every reason to appreciate the merits of the protective terms of the Hague Convention.

If the Allies are satisfied that the reason for the exceptionally far-reaching powers of the military government in Germany, as mentioned above, is that the "situation in German is anomalous" (see Fawcett, op. cit., p. 383) and the viewpoints of international law should be entirely pushed aside, one can possibly avoid regarding the procedure of the Allies there as a precedent under international law which may threaten the people in occupied countries in the future, and thereby succeed in salvaging the Hague Convention in the above sense as the treasure of international law which the 15 prominent lawyers have been commissioned to administer by 40 nations.

Can We Pick Statesmen?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Can We Pick Statesmen?" published in the October 1950 issue of the Farm Journal. The editorial is an excellent one.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAN WE PICK STATESMEN?

The votes farmers cast for Congress on November 7 deserved to be planned with as much care and thoughtfulness as next year's crops.

Your congressional district is one of 435 which will elect the House of Representatives. One-third of the States will elect United States Senators. Men from both parties are asking for your votes. You can choose only one.

What reasons will you be able to give to yourself, when you emerge from the election booth, for the decision you will then have made? How will you distinguish between the "mere politician" and the statesmen?

The bloody facts of Korea, and the long list of costly mistakes that led to Korea, have sharpened the public awareness that these are difficult days. More dangerous ones may lie ahead. Throughout the land today one hears the question: "Why do so many ordinary politicians occupy places of power, when the Nation needs statesmen of the highest order?"

The only answer, when good men or bad get into office, is that the people elected them. Those who didn't vote had as much to do with it as those who did.

The opportunity to make these choices is the most precious privilege of Americans. Congress is the great instrument of American freedom. As long as we can send to Congress enough men who are devoted to American ideals, freedom will have a chance to continue. Enough real statesmen in Congress can protect freedom from encroachment by other branches of government. They can be powerful influences toward sensible foreign policies.

No candidate ever speaks against freedom. But if his record or his promises indicate that he supports restrictive or overspending measures which are dangerous to freedom, he may deserve defeat.

One able senatorial candidate complained the other day that a "better tomorrow" was his opponent's campaign promise. "How can I be against that?" he asked. He can't, but he may easily be able to show what is better—what is best for the common welfare. Government cannot deliver a better tomorrow. Government is a useful servant, but a dangerous master. It should be allowed to attempt little more than to keep order at home, and to protect us against agression from outside.

Your candidate's ability to tell a merry story, or to remember faces, neither proves him to be good or bad material for Congress, and will not influence the intelligent voter who has at heart only his country's good. His promises to deliver government benefits to your community only mean that some other district's candidate is promising his people to tax you for their benefit.

The dictionary describes a statesman as "one who shows unusual wisdom in treating or directing great public affairs."

Will "unusual wisdom" determine your vote? Can it win elections? It does sometimes when people think—and think patriotically.

Now, as October comes, is the time to begin to decide your choice. Picking statesmen is no matter to decide by whim, nor to postpone until breakfast time November 7.

The One Hundred and Tenth Infantry Federalized for Fifth Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The One Hundred and Tenth Infantry Federalized for the Fifth Time," written by Capt. Robert H. Campbell, public information officer, One Hundred and Tenth Infantry, and published in the Washington (Pa.) Reporter of September 9, 1950. This organization is commanded by Col. Henry K. Fluck, of Somerset, Pa.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE HUNDRED AND TENTH INFANTRY FEDERALIZED FOR FIFTH TIME—ORGANIZED MILITIA OF STATE CREATED IN 1873, LOCAL UNITS EARLIER

(By Capt. Robert H. Campbell, public information officer, One Hundred and Tenth Infantry)

Local military history will repeat itself again this week end when several hundred men from Washington and Greene Counties depart with the famous One Hundred and Tenth Infantry Regiment for duty with the federalized Twenty-eighth Infantry Division at Camp Atterbury, Ind.

Today's call is the fifth to be answered by this historic regiment since organization as the Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry in the summer of 1873. Many of the towns and counties from which the Tenth came, however, have enjoyed the distinction of fine military organizations for more than a century and a half. Predecessors to Waynesburg's Company K, for example, have all available records which show the company participated in the Indian wars of 1795 under "Mad" Anthony Wayne.

Few military organizations have enjoyed the distinguished career of the Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry which was reorganized in 1917 as the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry. Always located in the southwestern section of the Keystone State, the regiment has called to its ranks the best of all classes of the sturdy people of this section. When mustered for the Spanish-American War, it had within its ranks some men who won their spurs in the Civil War; when called for duty on the Mexican border, it retained the services of men who had served in the Philippine Insurrection; when ordered out in 1917 for World War I, many veterans of the Mexican incident were among its members; when mustered for World War II, some of its top leaders recalled vividly the trench warfare of Meuse-Argonne, and today, the One Hundred and Tenth answers its fifth call with its membership composed of many veterans who apparently failed in the United States' effort to "win the peace" in 1945.

Great names have been associated with the regiment since its organzation. Col. John A. Black, Claysville, was the first commander of the Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry and held the post until 1878 when he resigned and was succeeded by Col. Alexander L. Hawkins.

The history of the Tenth's participation in the Spanish-American War is a history of Colonel Hawkins whose first service in the National Guard of Pennsylvania was with Company H in Washington. He was in command of this company when elevated to the command of his regiment. Colonel Hawkins also served in the Union Army in the Civil War, enlisting as a private in Company K, Fifteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, while a student at Waynesburg College. He was in command of the Tenth Regiment during its service in the Philippines, and while on his way home died on board the U. S. transport Senator, in 1899.

Original organizational orders in part consolidated and designated the Light Guards of Monongahela, as Company A; Washington Blues of North Washington as Company E, and Washington Guards of Washington as Company H. The Waynesburg Blues were mustered into the National Guard and designated Company K of the Tenth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

On May 11-12, 1898, the Tenth Regiment was mustered into the United States service and directed to San Francisco, Calif., to become a part of General Merritt's command.

On June 14 of the same year, the regiment boarded the steamship Zelandia and sailed for Manila, stopping at Honolulu, arriving at the latter place the day after the Hawaiian Islands were annexed to the United States. There followed the battle of Malate, the fall of Manila, the Philippine Insurrection and the Malolos campaign in which the regiment participated gallantly.

In 1899, the regiment sailed for the United States and was mustered out of service on arrival in August of that year.

During its service, units of the Tenth Regiment from this area were commanded by Colonel Hawkins, regimental commander; Lt. Col. James E. Barnett, second in command; Capt. Harry B. Duncan, adjutant; Capt. Thomas S. Crago, Company K; Capt. Gustav Schaaf, Company A; Capt. Alonzo M. Porter, Company H. The old "Washington Blues" of North Washington had been disbanded prior to entering the Spanish-American War.

The regiment was organized in the early part of 1900 and Colonel Barnett was placed in command and served until 1907 when he resigned and was succeeded by Col. Richard Coulter, of Greensburg.

In June 1916, a condition of affairs had developed on the Mexican border that was regarded as acute and relations between the Government of the United States and the de facto Government of Mexico were severely strained. On June 18 of that year the Secretary of War, at the direction of the President, called out the National Guard of various States and subsequent orders directed the National Guard of Pennsylvania be mobilized at Mount Gretna.

On July 2, the regiment entrained for the Mexican border, arriving at El Paso, Tex. The presence of troops on the border had a quieting effect on the Mexicans and no trouble threatened after the arrival of the Tenth. On September 29, the regiment received orders to return to home stations.

The final call for the Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry Regiment was received on July 15, 1917, and the units were drafted for Federal service and World War I on August 5 of that year.

When the regiment departed for training at Camp Hancock, August, Ga., on September 7, it was commanded in part by Lieutenant Colonel Coulter, regimental commander; Maj. Edward Martin, Waynesburg, second battalion commander; Capt. Edward Hartland, Monongahela, Company A; Capt. John Aiken, Washington, Company H, and Capt. Walter Montgomery, Waynesburg, Company K.

Immediately on arrival at Camp Hancock, rumors were heard concerning the reorganization of the Pennsylvania division. On October 11, division orders were issued designating the Tenth Infantry as the One hundred and tenth Infantry Regiment. Col. George E. Kemp, of Philadelphia, former commander of the Old Third Pennsylvania Infantry, was made commander of the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry on reorganization.

The regiment left Camp Hancock April 24, 1918, after working strenuously for 7 months on new combat principles evolved by the European war and assimilating them with the American ideas of fighting learned in wars gone by. The regiment traveled to Camp Merritt, N. Y., and sailed May 3, landing at Liverpool, England.

The history of the regiment's participation in World War I requires a separate volume in itself. Among citations won by the famous One Hundred and Tenth were battle streamers for Champagne-Marne, Aisne-Marne, and the Meuse-Argonne. Great names associated with the regiment in World War I include Coulter, Martin, Tompkins, Aiken, Winship, Ham, Kinnison, King, all of whom served as regimental commander; Hartland, Gee, Chambers, Heslep, Culpepper, Reid, Company A; Aiken, Ferguson, Braden, Rowe, Bell, Seavey, and Scott, Company H; and Montgomery, Garrison, Taylor, Furman, Herbert, Meighen, Foudy, Hendler, Roat, Cummings, of Company K.

Following World War I, the famed One Hundred and Tenth Infantry Regiment became part of the army of occupation and spent from December 1918 to March 1919 in Briey near the Verdun front.

On March 17, 1919, the regiment started to leave for the Le-Mans area and sailed for the United States April 29. Regimental headquarters, first battalion, machine gun and supply companies and a part of Company E arrived in Philadelphia on May 11 and entrained for Camp Dix. The regiment was mustered out of Federal service on May 24.

Once again the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry reverted to the old Tenth Pennsylvania Infantry with Colonel Martin in command. On April 21, 1921, however, the Tenth was again redesignated the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry and has retained that identity to the present day.

In the postwar period after World War I the regiment had two commanders, Lt. Col. John Aiken, who relieved Colonel Martin who was assigned as commander of the Fifty-fifth Brigade, and Lt. Col. A. O. King, who succeeded Colonel Aiken in 1940, remaining in command until December of 1941.

On February 17, 1941, the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry received its fourth order to Federal service. Serving in command at that time were Major General Martin, Commanding General of the Twenty-eighth Division; Brig. Gen. John Aiken, commanding the Fifty-fifth Brigade; Colonel King, commanding the Regiment, and Lt. Col. Raymond E. Goodridge, commanding the First Battalion.

Regimental commanders during World War II were Colonel King, Lieutenant Colonel Goodridge, Lt. Col. L. M. Chumrine, Lt. Col. Norman P. Groff, Col. Benjamin C. Jones, Lt. Col. Thomas L. Hoban, Col. C. M. McQuarrie, Col. William May, Col. Theodore A Seely, Col. Hurley E. Fuller, and Col. Daniel B. Strickler.

Following training in the United States, the regiment sailed for Europe and participated in many glorious battles, winning battle streamers at Normandy, northern France, Rhineland, Ardennes, and Central Europe.

The One Hundred and Tenth arrived in United States from duty in Europe on August 2, 1945. Colonel Strickler, commanding the regiment on its return to America, was greeted at the dock by Governor Martin, of Pennsylvania.

On October 25, 1945, the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry was inactivated to end the activities of a regiment which served the United States proudly, faithfully, and well through two world wars and which had kept alive the traditions of the Keystone Division by constant applications of its motto—"28, Roll On!"

The regiment was officially reorganized as a major unit of the Pennsylvania National Guard on June 17, 1946, through the aid of Governor Martin, General Strickler, General Hoban, Col. George H Rumbaugh, and others.

On reorganization, headquarters was established in Washington, Company H was again assigned to Washington, Company A to Monongahela, Company K to Waynesburg, and Company G to Canonsburg.

Later Company G was moved to Altoona and the heavy-mortar company organized in Canonsburg.

This week end the One Hundred and Tenth Infantry Regiment, under the able guidance of Col. Henry K. Fluck, Somerset, who rose from private to colonel in 20 years and assumed command of the regiment in 1947, entrains to answer, its fifth call to Federal service. Officers will include Lt. Col. Edward S. Martin, Maj. Lawrence R. Stewart, Maj. John Aiken, Maj. Richard W. Siegrist; Capt. John J. Wemzette, Lt. John P Liekar, Lt. Joseph Lynn, Lt. Harry W. Purviance, all staff officers, Capt. Armand DiVicenzo, commanding headquarters company; Capt. Robert L. Shaw, Company A; Capt. Robert H. Stoner, Company H; Capt. Fred L. Phillips, Company K; and Capt. Phillip Ahwesh, Heavy Mortar Company.

Eighteen From Pennsylvania Are Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 21 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article entitled "Eighteen From Pennsylvania Are Veterans," written by Herman A. Lowe, and published in the Philadelphia Inquirer of September 21, 1950, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. The article refers to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN]. It is a very good article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS RECORD—EIGHTEEN FROM PENNSYLVANIA ARE VETERANS

(By Herman A. Lowe)

WASHINGTON, September 20.—With the country engaged in another war and preparing against the possibility of a much bigger one, it is noteworthy that Pennsylvania is represented in Congress by the largest delegation of war veterans of any State.

Senator EDWARD MARTIN and no fewer than 17 of its 33 House Members wore the uniform in one or more of the Nation's wars. It means the delegation is especially fitted to understand the problems of fighting men and veterans.

The No. 1 ranking serviceman in all of Congress is Senator MARTIN. He saw service in the Spanish-American War, fought under General Pershing on the Mexican border in 1914, was in France in the First World War, and was the major general who trained the Twenty-eighth Division in the early portion of the Second World War. No other among the 531 Senate and House Members has a record to compare with that.

A few fought in two wars. Most were in one.

The Pennsylvania Representatives who served in the First World War included: ANTHONY CAVALCANTE, PAUL B. DAGUE, HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, IVOR D. FENTON, LEON H. GAVIN, BENJAMIN F. JAMES, JOHN C. KUNKEL, JAMES F LIND, GEORGE M. RHODES, RICHARD M. SIMPSON, JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, FRANCIS E. WALTER, WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN, and HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR., JAMES G FULTON, and JOHN P. SAYLOR were in the Second World War, in which LIND, VAN ZANDT, WALTER, and HUGH SCOTT again saw service. Seven Members of the delegation—EBERHARTER, LIND, RHODES, SAYLOR, VAN ZANDT, WALTER, and SCOTT—hold reserve commissions; and, of course, SCOTT recently returned from a brief tour of duty in Korea.

In case of those who were not in uniform, it should be pointed out that they were mostly too young for the First World War and a little over age to be called into the Second World War.

Recommendation XXIII, pp. 63–64.

Second paragraph: Nearly every Postmaster General, in his Annual Report, has recognized that the cost ascertainment system is not properly a basis for postal rate making and it should not be so used.

For example, Postmaster General Frank C. Walker, in his report for the year 1942, said:

"The purpose of cost ascertainment is to credit as accurately as possible to each class of mail and each special service the revenue earned by it, and charge each class of mail and each special service with its share of the expenditure. Its methods and figures have been criticized. I have not been satisfied personally that they should be used for rate purposes. * * * Cost ascertainment does not and possibly cannot reflect intangible factors such as degrees of preferment in mail handling, the relative importance and economic value of the several classes of mail, or the relative priority of service."

3. Higher Second-Class Rates Won't Raise Revenue.
In addition to testimony referred to later, the committee should be supplied, by the Post Office Department, with cost ascertainment tables 40, 40A, 41, and 100, fiscal year 1949, which we understand are now available. These show second class, divided into 8 categories, for the first time. We understand they show (1) that zone-rated magazines paid 33.8 percent of their apportioned expenditures, or 2.45 times more on their apportioned expenditures than the rest of the second-class publications; and, (2) tables 40 and 41, when compared with corresponding tables for 1948 fiscal year, show that there was no increase in number of pieces of second-class mail.
The law of diminishing returns is already at work. Proposed increases in second-class rates will result in decreased volume and will not increase revenue.

Disabled American Veterans, for example, use third-class mail for their identotag program. The proceeds from the sale of these miniatures of license plate key rings maintain their hospital for veterans' children. The increases proposed in the bill will amount to $125,000 annually to this program alone, all of which must be subtracted from the money spent on this worthy charity.

Report of the Activities of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Eighty-first Congress, Second Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HENDERSON LANHAM

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments under the distinguished leadership of its chairman, the Honorable WILLIAM L. DAWSON, has made a brilliant record of accomplishments for itself during the first and present sessions of the Eighty-first Congress.

This committee, charged with the grave responsibility of perfecting legislative measures reorganizing the executive branch of the Federal Government and other fields, has done its job well. It is a pleasure to report the achievement of increased efficiency and economy in governmental services as a consequence of study and work of the membership of this House committee.

On Friday, August 26, 1949, in my extension of remarks, I was privileged on that occasion to be able to report to the Congress on a most creditable work performance of the legislative matters handled during the first session. It is my intention to here outline the legislative program successfully completed during the present session.

Last year saw our creation of the General Services Administration, a consolidated agency for procurement, utilization, and disposal of Government properties, attuned to the needs and requirements of the civilian branch of the Federal Government.

The committee has continued its interest by amending the basic act in order to spell out functions in greater detail. This month saw successful passage of Public Law 754 (H. R. 9129) which implements the mission of the General Services Administration in relation to operation of buildings and custodial care of property under its jurisdiction. This measure also permits the Government donable program to be extended to distribution for public health purposes. The original law—Public Law 152, the Federal Property Act—had limited distribution to educational purposes; thus, surplus property, no longer of need or usable within the framework of the Federal Government, is now made available not only to our educational institutions, but to our medical schools, hospitals, clinics, and other such agencies qualifying for inclusion.

Further, Public Law 754 includes the Federal Records Act of 1950. This landmark may be briefly said to reorganize the records management of the Government. The General Services Administrator is given increased control over the National Archives, and provision is had for creation of a National Historical Publications Commission. In the field of records management, it shall be the duty of the Administrator to develop and improve standards, procedures, and techniques aimed at improvement of management with an eye to economy and efficiency. Directly tied to this is the responsibility placed in the Administrator for better utilization of space, equipment, and supplies, a necessary adjunct of conserving and protecting Government records. Further, the Administrator is authorized to establish and operate record centers. Of interest to the Congress also is the inclusion of a section within this public law calling for conspicuous identification of Government motor vehicles.

The consideration of this legislation—which became Public Law 754—led to examination and incorporation of many points in pending committee bills dealing with similar subject matter. In this vein it can be recited that Public Law 754 incorporated and superseded H. R. 6315, H. R. 6366, H. R. 6634, H. R. 7545, H. R. 8253, H. R. 8416, and H .R. 8330.

Another measure of signal importance drafted by our committee is the "Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950." In my opinion this is the most constructive and remedial law which the Eighty-first Congress has had the opportunity to act upon. This is now known as Public Law 784.

Briefly, it may be stated that Public Law 784 reorganizes the budgeting and bookkeeping of the Federal Government. It will be recalled that 29 years ago the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 went into effect. During the interim period many studies and surveys have been undertaken to bring this legislation up to date; more adaptable to modern day circumstances. The tremendous growth of our Government in the last 30 years dictated the necessity for improving and renovating budget and accounting methods. The Budget and Accounting Act of 1950 is aimed at providing the Government and the taxpayer with accurate and complete information as to revenues received and expenditures made by the Government in its operations. Public Law 784 carries out substantially all of the suggestions in these fields of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. In this fashion, the budget, accounting, and auditing systems, procedures, and techniques will be brought into line with sound commercial and governmental practices and resultant better control over all Federal funds.

Laudable teamwork by the General Accounting Office, Treasury Department, and the Bureau of the Budget furnished the basis for the studies which produced this epochal public law, so well received on all sides.

This Public Law 784 marks a new high in legislative and executive cooperation for a common goal. In addition to a modernized "performance budget" program, this act provides that the Comptroller General shall prescribe the principles, standards, and related requirements for accounting in the executive branch. The auditing of Federal Government financial transactions, will continue to be the responsibility of the Comptroller General of the United States as an agent of the Congress. It can be noted in passing, that this act repealed in whole or in part 106 provisions of existing law now obsolete or outmoded. On the agenda of the committee H. R. 5178 and H. R. 5823 dealt with similar and related subject matter.

H. R. 5526 now designated as Public Law 673 is of engaging regard. This bill authorized the President to provide for the performance of certain functions of the President by other officers of the Government and for other purposes.

The committe was made aware of, and alerted to, the extremely heavy workload of the President of the United States by the distinguished majority leader, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK of Massachusetts, who sponsored this act. Testimony developed that the President is called upon to perform many minor duties, often bearing little relationship to the leadership tasks of a Chief Executive. This act provides for the performance of certain of the lesser duties of the President by others appropriately delegated. However, the law retains in the President responsibility for the acts of such designees in office. Consequently there is assured to the President a relief from the many smaller and often more burdensome tasks while affording him greater opportunity for concentrating his attention on the more important duties of his office.

In the program of reorganization President Truman, beginning in the period between March 13, 1950, and May 31, 1950, transmitted to the Congress 27 reorganization plans dealing with various departments and agencies of the executive branch. The plans covered a wide diversity of interests:

Plan No. 1: Reorganization in the Department of the Treasury. Failed of enactment: Rejected by Senate May 11, 1950. The defect cited by the Senate was adjusted; this plan was later resubmitted as Reorganization Plan No. 26 of 1950, and became effective July 31, 1950.

Plan No. 2: Reorganization in the Department of Justice. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 3: Reorganization in the Department of Interior. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 4: Reorganization in the Department of Agriculture. Failed of enactment: Rejected by Senate May 18, 1950.

Plan No. 5: Reorganization in the Department of Commerce. Effective May 24, 1950. Plan affirmatively sustained in committee and on floor by House Committee on Expenditures.

Plan No. 6: Reorganization in the Department of Labor. Effective May 24, 1950. Plan affirmatively sustained in committee and on floor by action of House Committee on Expenditures.

Plan No. 7: Reorganization in the Interstate Commerce Commission. Affirmatively sustained in committee by House Committee on Expenditures. Failed of enactment: Rejected by Senate May 17, 1950.

Plan No. 9: Reorganization in the Federal Power Commission. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 10: Reorganization in the Securities and Exchange Commission. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 11: Reorganization in the Federal Communications Commission. Failed of enactment: Rejected by Senate May 17, 1950.

Plan No. 12: Reorganization in the National Labor Relations Board. Affirmatively sustained in committee by House Committee on Expenditures. Failed of enactment: Rejected by Senate May 11, 1950.

Plan No. 13: Reorganization in the Civil Aeronautics Board. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 14: Coordinating the administration of labor standards. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 15: Transferring the functions of the General Services Administration relating to public works in Alaska and in the Virgin Islands to the Department of the Interior. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 16: Transferring to the Federal Security Agency the functions of the General Services Administration relating to assistance to local school districts and grants and loans for water-pollution-control projects. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 17: Transferring the functions of the General Services Administration relating to the advance planning of non-Federal public works and the management and disposal of certain war public works to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 18: Transferring to the Administrator of General Services the functions of the various Federal agencies with respect to leasing and assigning general purpose space in buildings and the operation, maintenance, and custody of office buildings. Effective May 24, 1950. Committee print, "Memorandum—Status of Employees Transferred," issued by the committee after hearings were held to scrutinize the effects of the transfer, and to assure transferred employees protection in their rights.

Plan No. 19: Transferring from the Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Employees' Compensation and the Employees' Compensation Appeals Board and their functions. Functions of the Federal Security Administrator with respect to employees' compensation are also transferred by the plan. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 20: Transferring from the Secretary of State to the Administrator of General Services a number of functions which have no connection with foreign affairs but bear a close relation to the archival and records functions of the General Services Administration. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 21: Effecting a basic reorganization of the functions of the United States Maritime Commission along the lines recommended by the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. Effective May 24, 1950.

Plan No. 22: Transferring the Federal National Mortgage Association from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Effective July 9, 1950.

Plan No. 23: Transferring from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency the lending functions of the Government with respect to the production and distribution of prefabricated houses and components. Effective July 9, 1950.

Plan No. 24: Transferring the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce. Affirmatively sustained in committee by the House Committee on Expenditures. Rejected by Senate July 6, 1950.

Plan No. 25: Transferring the functions of the National Security Resources Board from the Board to the Chairman of the Board and making the Board advisory to the Chairman. Also provides for a Vice Chairman, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Effective July 9, 1950.

Plan No. 26: Reorganization in the Department of the Treasury. Effective July 31, 1950.

Plan No. 27: Creating a Department of Health, Education, and Security. Rejected by the House July 10, 1950. This plan is similar in many respects to Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1949. Plan No. 27 was designed to meet the objections registered against plan No. 1 of 1949. It parallels to a large degree H. R. 575, 1949, and H. R. 782, 1949, and H. R. 8674, 1950.

In summary, it may be stated that 26 of the plans submitted during the Eighty-first Congress 1949–50, were successfully adopted by action of the Congress.

Public Law 467 which the committee drafted grew out of consideration of H. R. 4455. This measure authorized the transfer to the Attorney General of the United States of a portion of the Vigo Plant near Terre Haute, Ind., for use in connection with the United States penitentiary at Terre Haute. During the first session of the Eighty-first Congress a related bill, H. R. 4442, became Public Law 225. Public Law 467 supplements Public Law 225 by making available to the United States prison system for its use an additional tract of land near the Terre Haute penitentiary.

During the last session of the Congress the Travel Expense Act of 1949, Public Law 92, was passed, providing for increased per diem rates to be paid Government employees while engaged in field operations. It was brought to the attention of the committee that this legislation did not permit the receipt of a per diem allowance where civilian officers and employees become ill or injured, not due to their own misconduct, while in travel status on official business. Accordingly, immediate action was had on H. R. 5951, Public Law 482, which amended the Travel Expense Act of 1949. This meritorious amendment corrected a condition of employment which has resulted in inequities and in some instances extreme hardship for Government officers and employees. The result of this corrective amendment continues an employee's per diem allowance where he must remain at his temporary station until he recovers sufficiently to complete his assignment or return to his official headquarters.

The committee calendar included two bills which would authorize relief of certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Departments of Interior and Commerce. H. R. 6131, Public Law 540, developed this phase in the Department of Commerce, while H. R. 7688, Public Law 541, outlined it for the Department of the Interior. Thus, the Congress has cleared away the last accoutrements in these Departments in relation to the terminated agencies of World War II.

Fort Ruckman Military Reservation, Nahant, Mass., was transferred to that township as a result of H. R. 7477, Public Law 623. Acquired during World War I and World War II, this area is no longer of use to the Federal Government. The township of Nahant received this surplus installation in order to develop its civic needs, upon payment of $23,000. The committee, however, was insistent upon the Federal Government's rights to recapture this property in the event of a national emergency or for reasons of national security, or in the event that this property was not put to a public, educational, or recreational use. Under no circumstances would the committee countenance the future employment of this reservation land for general commercial, industrial, or residential purposes. H. R. 2816, a bill embodying similar provisions to H. R. 7477, was incorporated into Public Law 623 during the consideration by the committee.

The committee pressed for enactment of H. R. 5819, Public Law 633. This act authorizes the withholding of compensation due Government personnel who have received improper payments of Government funds for which a certifying officer is held responsible. Hitherto, compensation could not be withheld from Government personnel indebted to the United States by reason of overpayment or improper receipt of public funds. This law, therefore, gives the necessary statutory authority to withhold current payments from Government personnel.

The Department of Interior in seeking to consolidate its property in low-rental areas in the region of Boise, Idaho, outlined the merits of H. R. 7667, Public Law 649. General Services Administration, under this act, accordingly transferred 11½ acres of land and appurtenances to the Department of Interior without reimbursement or transfer of funds. This legislation provided a short-cut for economical transfer, obviating the necessity for a Department of Interior appropriation item request which would be passed to the General Services Administration for eventual coverage into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury. This legislation had the desired result of reducing governmental red tape.

H. R. 5281, Public Law 688, and H. R. 8662, Public Law 656, involved certain operations of the Treasury Department.

Public Law 656 provides a business-type budget and revolving fund method of financing for the operations of engraving and printing. Accrual accounting, integration of cost accounting with the general system of accounts, and the production of financial statements of useful purpose and management will, under this act, afford full disclosure with respect to the financial condition and operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

On the other hand, Public Law 688 authorizes executive departments, other Treasury Department bureaus and wholly owned and mixed-ownership Government corporations to reimburse the Division of Disbursement, Office of the Treasurer of the United States, for work performed for the respective agency. In those instances where funds have not been made available to the agency or bureau of the Department of the Treasury.

It can always be said that every device to eliminate Government red tape is regarded as laudable. H. R. 9430, authorizing certain administrative expenses in the Government service, will go far toward this goal. This measure provides amendments based on administration of Public Law 600, 1946; studies of the Comptroller General; and recommendations of the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. This estimable public law improves previous provisions for dealing with expenses of travel of employees, transportation of dependents and shipment of household effects on permanent change of station, and payment of expenses for persons appointed for duties overseas. This matter is of prime importance today in view of evacuation of civilian employees for military and other reasons at foreign posts. The Comptroller General has incorporated in this law his study of restriction in appropriation acts with a view to determining costs to the Government of complying with such restrictions. In addition, under the emphasis of the Hoover Commission on Organization's recommendation, this bill is designed to eliminate from appropriation language many useless phrases which are required under existing law and thus eliminate from the appropriation acts the "jungle of detailed provisions" of which the Commission was so critical. After favorable House and Senate action, this bill awaits the Presidential signature.

The House on July 27, 1950, passed H. R. 8621 which would facilitate settlement of accounts of certain civilian deceased personnel of the Government. The effect of this laudable bill would be to permit settlement at field levels in the Government service of amounts due the next of kin of Government personnel. This would avoid the reference of correspondence and settlement to the Washington area.

H. R. 8706 provides for the purchase of bonds to Government officials and employees of the Government now required by law to be bonded, and would authorize the payment of premiums of such bonds from Government funds. This bill passed by the House on July 17, 1950, parallels similar legislation. The following are recited from the committee calendar as covering the same subject matter: H. R. 2830; H. R. 2871; H. R. 2943; H. R. 4084; H. R. 4642; H. R. 7913; H. R. 8528.

The committee believes this legislation to be highly desirable and the cost to be a proper one to be borne by the Government. It was determined also that its enactment would be in keeping with sound business practices of private industry, State and local governments. It was also found to be firmly advocated by the Commission on Organization as a marked and progressive step for improvement and simplification of present outmoded bonding procedures in Federal Government.

The Expenditures Committee held a series of hearings which allowed for an exchange of academic and practical viewpoints with regard to the budget. In these hearings the budget was scanned as a technical instrument and its structure examined as a fiscal as well as an economic factor in Government. H. R. 8054 and H. R. 6275 were employed as avenues of approach to this absorbing problem. The presidential item veto, a scrutiny of the investment phases of the budget, and the many parts which go to creating it as a structure were amply explored. Serious scholars of government, expert witnesses, as well as public officials, were invited to attend the hearings. The results can be stated as highly productive and thought provoking, since it afforded an excellent opportunity for a keen appraisal of the structural framework of the national budget.

A number of hearings were had on H. R. 5182, which proposes to establish a United Medical Administration by consolidating hospitals of the Armed Services, Veterans' Administration, and Public Health Service. The complexities of effecting this proposed consolidation were brought to light. The studies of the Hoover Commission on Organization were analyzed, and the committee became thoroughly informed with the many ramifications of this proposal. This area, which can be fruitful of efficiency and economy, is of continuing interest to the committee.

Studies have been made, and it is hoped that appropriate legislation will be able to be considered in the near future on the subject of traffic management. H. R. 7429 and H. R. 7430 were introduced as a means of opening up this field for gainful staff analysis.

A number of fields remain for future legislative endeavor. Staff work is being done in exploring further potentials in these productive regions, in order to reduce the costs of government to the taxpayer. It is contemplated that from the present period until the beginning of 1951 basic studies now under consideration will provide basic legislative drafts, aimed at increased efficiency and greater economy, commensurate with our Nation's need in governmental services.

The membership of the committee is to be heartily congratulated on the excellent caliber of their work during this session and the entire Eighty-first Congress. Its past and present record will stand as a goal for others as well as a spur to their own future endeavors.

Report to the People of the Second Congressional District of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GLENN R. DAVIS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith my second annual report to the people of the Second Congressional District of Wisconsin. Last year I prepared a report on my voting and attendance record during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. This is a similar compilation for the second session complete to the date of preelection recess on September 22.

By means of news letters, radio broadcasts, and conferences throughout the district during congressional recesses, I have attempted to inform my constituents and report to them on my stewardship as their Representative in Washington. This voting report is in keeping with my purpose of keeping the people of my district as fully informed as possible on congressional issues.

It is a complete record. It is not a hand-picked list of a few so-called key votes compiled by some lobbyist, pressure group, or political campaign committee. The whole record is there in concise form for the people to examine and evaluate for themselves.

If more complete information on any measure considered, or an explanation of any particular vote, is desired, I shall be glad to respond to such requests.

Appropriations for Projects in the Western States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN PHILLIPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, several members of the Committee on Appropriations have been interested in the money spent by the Department of the Interior in projects now under development in the Western States. In reply to our request, the Department has supplied figures covering all expenditures, from the Bureau of Reclamation, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Bonneville Power Administration, and the Southwestern Power Administration, for the years 1934 to 1950, inclusive. I have asked consent to include these tables with this extension of my remarks, because I think they will be of interest to all Members, particularly those from the West.

I should call attention, in passing, Mr. Speaker, to the excellent record in this regard of the sometimes maligned Eightieth Congress. Not only does this Republican Eightieth Congress stand out in leadership for the development of the West, but I call particular attention to the well-known fact that the Eightieth Congress repeatedly emphasized, and insisted upon, the completion of the projects already started, particularly when hearing the appropriation requests of the Bureau of Reclamation. Money was appropriated generously to finish the projects then under way for years. This should be the major objective of the Department. The tables follow:

Stalin Laughs at Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I wish to include an editorial entitled "Camden Can Spite Stalin and Lead United States in Reviving Industry Vital to Nation." The editorial appeared in the Courier-Post newspaper of Camden, N. J., issue of September 18, 1950.

This editorial refers to the unfortunate discharge last week of 1,000 workers at the Camden, N. J., yard of the New York Shipbuilding Co. A few days ago 2,000 more workers were laid off. This action has not only brought distress to the workers and their families, but has demonstrated again how inadequate is our national shipbuilding program. What we need is a long-range program that will keep our shipbuilding industry in a healthy condition ready to go. To do otherwise is to flirt with disaster. Too little and too late must not be our policy with reference to ships.

I commend the following editorial to the careful consideration of the officials of our Government who determine our shipbuilding program. It reads as follows:

CAMDEN CAN SPITE STALIN AND LEAD UNITED STATES IN REVIVING INDUSTRY VITAL TO NATION

Josef Stalin and his fellow plotters in the Kremlin received encouraging news from Camden last week.

The news was that 1,000 workers at the New York Shipbuilding Corp. had been given an indefinite lay-off—not that the company wanted it that way—high lighting the continuing failure of Congress and the administration, even in the face of the Korean War, to recognize the vital necessity of shipbuilding to assure America protection in time of war and prosperity in time of peace.

The 1,000 men were laid off because of construction changes ordered by the American President Lines in its three passenger-cargo ships now being built at the yard, delaying their delivery dates by 3 months and making it impossible for the company to find useful work for these men to do, since it has little on hand.

Following announcement of the layoff, officials of the vigorous and energetic union which represents 7,000 workers at the yard, the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, Local, No. 1, AFL, quickly boarded the train for Washington. There they held conferences with heads of the Federal Maritime Board, the Navy's Bureau of Ships, and Congressman WOLVERTON to see what, if anything, could be done about the lay-off and to forward the larger objective of an adequate shipbuilding program for America which will keep this Nation's yards open and give the country the adequate and modern merchant marine and naval shipping it so sorely requires.

James C. McKissock, union president, and Thomas W. Saul, executive secretary, report that all those with whom they conferred "fully realized the importance of an immediate shipbuilding program." But, Saul says, such assurances have been received on numerous occasions in the past, "only to see such programs and plans die on the desks of people in Washington" because of indifference and ignorance about shipbuilding needs.

The Wednesday conferences did, however, produce immediate and tangible results.

Within 48 hours the Maritime Board and the Maritime Administration announced that the three American President liners in the Camden yard, as well as the 43,000-ton superliner United States, now under construction at Newport News, Va., were being taken over by the Government and would be converted into troop transports.

The IUMSW leaders had specifically requested that this be done only in the case of the two liners not yet launched, but the Government is going further in adding the third to the list, in addition to the superliner.

The Maritime Administration also announced that it has ordered 25 more wartime Victory ships out of storage, to be repaired and reconditioned for the merchant marine reserve fleet at 10 shipyards on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

Such a move also was requested by the Camden union.

These two steps should benefit shipyards in the long run, but what immediate effect they will have on employment at the New York shipyard, and elsewhere, or whether they will mean the return of the 1,000 men laid off here, remains to be seen.

As MacArthur's troops storm ashore in amphibious attacks behind the Red lines in Korea, as we wage a campaign across 5,000 miles of water that requires enormous supply lines of merchant shipping and the support of the Navy, here are a few shocking facts:

We do not have the fast, modern cargo ships in our merchant marine that would have the effect of cutting our supply lines in half or less, and must rely on obsolete vessels to do a job for which they are unfitted.

We are doing so little building of new ships that, by next June, all present construction will be finished and there will be no work for American shipyards, except repairing and refitting—unless action is taken now.

"Demothballing" is not the answer. Our World War II surplus merchant ships, now rusting away in many a bay and estuary, are a menace rather than an asset for wartime purposes. Their 7-knot speed makes them sitting ducks for submarines and bombers. (It would be advantageous, however, to take a number of Navy vessels out of the "mothball fleet" and reactivate them as well as to construct more modern Navy ships.)

While our own shipyards are dying of dry rot, 19 yards are being operated in Japan now—with American money. Italy, as one sample in Europe, has restored shipbuilding to its prewar level—again with American dollars.

But if Russia were to declare war, it could quickly and easily bomb European and Japanese shipyards into destruction, and with no construction on the ways in America the democratic nations would be without the ships and the shipyards which are their first line of defense.

Even worse, in America the shipyards would have the utmost difficulty recruiting the skilled workers needed for building, who have turned in discouragement to other jobs because employment in their preferred occupation has been so precarious and uncertain.

What can be done, and done now, about this perilous situation?

First and foremost, says local No. 1, adopt and push with all speed the Maritime Board's program for 50 new fast, 20-knot cargo ships, as favored by the Board's Chairman, Admiral Edward F. Cochrane, and Admiral D. H. Clark of the Navy's Bureau of Ships.

This program is in the blueprint stage and can rapidly be set in motion if the Budget Bureau gives the go-ahead signal.

The Navy Department also should give demothballing jobs to private shipyards, and let east coast yards share in this work which is now being done almost exclusively on the Pacific coast.

Locally, the union proposes removal of obstacles now standing in the way of immediate resumption of work on the "killer ship" Norfolk, which is lying uncompleted at New York ship.

These proposals are all in addition to the steps ordered Friday at Washington.

The union urges all citizens to recognize their responsibility for getting these things done, and to wire or write President Truman urging immediate action on behalf of national security.

"It takes highly skilled workers to build ships," Saul rightly says. "If shipbuilding continues to be a 'feast and famine' industry, these skilled workers will be impossible to obtain in the event that there should be a national emergency requiring new ships to defend our Nation."

Shipbuilding is not and will never be a belt-line, mass production industry like the manufacture of automobiles or radio sets. It is like a tailor's work, a separate, individual job for every single product.

It requires a great variety and host of skills, skills that are hard to acquire but easy to lose when not steadily practiced.

The skilled, intelligent workers necessary to produce ships can find other jobs readily enough, in normal times, and do find them when they become fed up with "stop and go" employment at their own trades. They move away from the shipyard cities, they find their new jobs satisfactory enough, and many of them are lost to shipbuilding forever, together with the skills which they possess and which new workers can gain only by long, arduous and costly training.

That is what may happen to the 1,000 workers being laid off in Camden unless the Government takes immediate action.

This is a local issue as far as the 1,000 and the other workers at New York ship are concerned, but the same issue exists just as starkly in every shipbuilding center. It is both Camden's and the Nation's.

Will Camden, through a flood of protests to Washington, lead the way in solving it in the national interest?

Will the next news from Camden to reach Stalin's eyes give him cause to frown, instead of smile?

Draft Can Get Out of Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Star of September 8, 1950:

DRAFT CAN GET OUT OF HAND

To the EDITOR: The medical draft legislation is one of the most significant pieces of legislation to be considered in Congress since the Korean emergency. It carries one of the most dangerous implications and potential threats to our democratic principles of individual rights that has ever been considered by a hasty and emergency-minded Congress.

The bill would draft doctors and dentists regardless of their draft standing, number of dependents, or other circumstances that apply to the male population of our country not in those professions. As such it is extremely dangerous because it will deprive a certain small segment of the population of their normal civil rights because of their profession.

Past experience with Federal legislation in other fields, both on an emergency and peacetime basis, has proven that once the precedent has been established there is no guaranty that it will stop in the relatively restricted field in which it was originated.

If doctors and dentists can be drafted solely on the basis of their profession, there is no guaranty that other small segments of the male population cannot similarly be deprived of their normal civil rights for the same reason or for any other reason that may be brought to public attention in an emergency. It is not fantastic to speculate that the next segment selected for such consideration might be in other areas than professional. Once the ball is rolling it could conceivably reach out for strikers, those labeled Communists, or any other field that Congress should select because it has been convinced by hysteria, public or financed propaganda, that it is necessary.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the people of the Third Iowa Congressional District have no illusions about the costliness of war and they are willing to pay to the best of their ability. But they have absolutely no patience with the continued wasting of money by some governmental agencies.

Following is a copy of a letter which I have received on this subject and which is expressive of many other similar communications from the Third Iowa District:

THE HINSON MANUFACTURING CO.,
Waterloo, Iowa, September 19, 1950.

MAURICE J. TOBIN,
Secretary, United States Department of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TOBIN: In today's mail we received a publication prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics entitled "Trends in Man-Hours Expended Per Unit Selected Types of Luggage, 1945 to 1948."

As manufacturers of luggage, we were of course interested in reading this pamphlet, and we found it to be interesting.

However, we cannot possibly imagine why this pamphlet was prepared. The information was somewhat of interest, but it was nothing that we either did not already know, or at least strongly suspect. We cannot possibly see how the preparation of this pamphlet could provide any earthly good whatsoever, to us or to any other manufacturer of luggage.

Undoubtedly the preparation of this material required the expenditure of a considerable amount of public funds. In our opinion such expenditure was almost 100 percent wasted.

We believe that this publication is typical of the unnecessary and wasteful expenditures being made by the Federal Government at this time. We beg of you to exert every effort to eliminate such unnecessary expenditures.

Yours very truly,

WM. H. HINSON,
Vice President.

Sale of China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, at the request of several of my constituents, Mrs. Gerald French and Mrs. Louise H. Padelford, of Pasadena, Calif., I am including with this extension of my remarks an interesting presentation of the backgrounds to the transactions by which Stalin may be said to have "bought" China. We are seeing the results of these secret pacts and negotiations in Korea today. The article, entitled "Sale of China," by Robert T. LeFevre, follows:

SALE OF CHINA

(By Robert T. LeFevre)

How much would you say China is worth—in good old United States dollars, that is?

From Manchuria and the northern Korean Peninsula, where some of the most fabulous deposits of minerals, iron, and lead in the world are located, to brawling, bustling Shanghai, pushing out into the East China Sea, to be scraped by the keels of ships from every country and every port in the world—China, with its more than half a billion people—what should the asking price be, if you had it for sale?

Think of some of the assets of China besides the land and the minerals and the peoples. What about the great cities, such as Canton, Hong Kong, Tientsin, Peiping, Chungking, Shanghai, Kwangchow, and scores of others? They must be worth something; and the trade, so vast there is no known commercial index which truly represents the yearly total, but it is assuredly in the billions. What about the vast farm lands that lie between the Hwang Ho and the Yangtze? What would your evaluation of them be?

Well, don't worry too much about it, because it is too late now, anyway. You see, China has just been sold.

Oh, yes, it has; although the sale was not consummated with the consent of the Chinese people. In fact, most of them know nothing about it. But we hope some of our Chinese wage earners in this country will translate this article and see that it gets into the hands of their cousins and brothers and sisters back in the Far East. For when the Chinese people learn what is in store for them, and how they have been betrayed, bartered for and delivered, they will rise up in their wrath and do away with the perpetrators of this most foul and perfidious act.

Secretly, and at night, there was delivered to the wage-earners committee a translation of the articles of the Mao-Stalin secret pact. We cannot reveal how it was brought to this country, nor how it was translated, for to do so would be to endanger the lives of certain people who are in position of trust and confidence elsewhere in the world. However we will be happy to produce it for any properly authorized representative of the United States Government.

We are not going to reprint it here in full. But we are going to tell you what it says in certain of its more important sections.

First, this is the secret pact of friendship entered into on February 12, 1950, at Moscow. It is signed by the plenipotentiary delegate of the Chinese people's government, Chou En-Lai, and by the plenipotentiary delegate of the Presidium of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Andrei Noraivich Vishinsky.

Second, there were only supposed to be two copies. Each copy was written in both Chinese and Russian. One was taken by each delegate back to his own master.

The document consists for the most part of 19 articles of agreement between the upstart labor boss of the Communist Party in China, Mao Tse-tung, who in this case was the seller, and the labor boss of the Bolsheviks, Joseph Stalin, the buyer.

Buyer and seller agreed to the following arrangements:

Seller was to receive $300,000,000 United States dollar credit. (We should like to ask, how it is possible for the U. S. S. R. to make this bargain in United States money?) In return, certain obligations were to be undertaken. They were:

1. The Chinese People's Republic will assign northeast and north China air bases to the U. S. S. R., and will assume the responsibility of carrying out the "liberation" of Southeast Asia so as to effectuate the completion of the "liberation" of the whole of Asia (art. 2).

2. The Chinese Republic will organize its army into an international Communist Army to be under the direct command of the highest officer of the Red Army (art. 3).

3. The Chinese People's Republic must begin diminishing its population by 100,000,000. A lack of resources makes this necessary; details of this massacre to be left to the Chinese (art. 7).

4. The Chinese will mobilize 10,000,000 slave laborers to be turned over immediately to U. S. S. R. control to build necessary establishments in order to cope with "imperialistic aggression" (art. 4).

5. The Chinese will increase the number of men in the new Communist army by 4,000,000 before the end of 1050 (art. 6).

6. The U. S. S. R. will have special right to allocate iron, lead and other minerals and raw materials within the boundary of China (with the exception of 20 percent of lead production which the Chinese can maintain), to be supplied to the U. S. S. R. in order to assist in the industrialization of the Chinese People's Republic (art. 12).

7. The Chinese People's Republic must pay back the $300,000,000 advanced credit as follows: It must use as security the entire raw material production of the northeastern and northern sections of China, delivering such raw materials to Russia according to a schedule determined by the U. S. S. R. (art. 14).

8. Both parties agree mutually to assist each other in taking over the governments and the races of peoples living in Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia, Tibet (art. 16).

9. The contracting parties both agree that it is their duty to keep this agreement secret and never to announce it publicly (art. 19).

And there are more.

But now you can see why China is no longer for sale.

Now you see how far a labor boss and his villainous stooges can and will go. Remember that Mao Tsetung is a labor boss. What else can he be when he can enslave 10,000,000 men, corral another 4,000,000 into a mercenary army and put to death 100,000,000 at the demand of another, bigger, and still bloodier labor boss

Can you see the handwriting on the wall? That which has happened and is happening elsewhere can happen here. So while you're figuring out the price of China, how much would you be willing to take for America? Remember, America hasn't quite been sold—yet.

Statements of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and Gen. Orvil Anderson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the following excellent editorial appearing in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer on September 4, 1950:

Within the past week two of the most devoted, competent, and patriotic American military men have been slapped down and humiliated for their honest appraisals of the grave war situation which confronts us.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, for 50 years an all but infallible prophet of the military dangers facing this country, was forced by the President to withdraw a statement concerning the importance of Formosa to our Pacific defense.

Yet hardly 2 months ago the administration ordered MacArthur to preserve the security of Formosa. He was given the Seventh Fleet to invoke that order.

Now, and probably to the consternation and dismay of MacArthur (who has forgotten more about the Pacific than Mr. Truman's Pacific advisers ever knew), he is told bluntly that Formoca does not count.

Mr. Truman (or is it Mr. Acheson?) seems to be saying, in effect, "We plan to spill blood and money fighting the Communist attack on South Korea, but let the Reds do as they please with Formosa—even though Formosa is immensely more important to us, strategically, than Korea."

The other general who in the past week has been transferred to the political doghouse is Maj. Gen Orvil Anderson.

General Anderson was quoted as saying that long-range United States bombers could break up Russia's atomic production plants in a week, if ordered to do so. And that civilization's best interest would be served in such an event.

For this statement he was relieved of his command as Commandant of the Air War College.

Surely this is a more temperate statement than that made by his boss, Defense Secretary Johnson, who promised the Russians an appalling atomic beating within hours after an attack on the United States.

I know from personal acquaintance and intimate conversations with any high-ranking officers of our three armed services that these banned views of General MacArthur and Anderson are widely and sincerely shared.

Two questions arise. First, are these men qualified to speak their minds? General MacArthur's qualifications are too well-known to review. As for General Anderson, let us briefly examine his background:

This veteran airman is entitled to wear five different types of wings, indicating his wide experience ranging from Navy-dirigible training to the ability to command the latest in intercontinental bombers.

He has twice been awarded the Distinguished Service Medal; twice the Distinguished Flying Cross, and the Silver Star for valor in action.

But most importantly, General Anderson served as a leading member of the War Plans Commission which plotted, far in advance, the destruction of industrial German war might by strategic bombing.

Fellow officers proclaim him to be one of the greatest planners in our military air arm.

So much for their qualifications.

Now, the second and even more important question: Should these unquestioned authorities have the right to speak?

Since they spoke as American soldiers trained and tried in combat with enemy forces in wartime, I believe they have every right—in fact, duty—to speak out at this crucial time.

But they have been muzzled.

Their opinions are banned because they do not have the blessings of the State Department, two of whose more recent and profound military stratagems resulted in our loss of China and the untenable position in which we find ourselves in Berlin.

Are we Americans to be permitted to hear or be exposed to only one official viewpoint?

Are we to have censored or kept from us any and all other views, even from the most competent sources?

MacArthur and Anderson won their rank in recognition of their many qualifications, not the least of which is their judgment in military matters.

But now, suddenly, there can be no other view except the one "official" stand of the President and his haphazardly gathered advisers.

Not many years ago another soldier general, Billy Mitchell, was busted in rank and publicly chastised for voicing an opinion contrary at the time of the "official" opinion. Mitchell said that airplanes could sink battleships. He even demonstrated that they could. World War II proved him abundantly correct, and a chagrined government eventually got around to awarding him the Congressional Medal of Honor—posthumously.

Is the only thing we are to learn from history again to be that we learn nothing from history?

Must we again blunder into censoring and humiliating experienced officers for courageously expressing viewpoints not necessarily "official"?

High among the evils we deplore and detest in dictatorships is control by government of freedom of thought and expression.

Are we not getting too dangerously close to that very same type of thought control right here in our own country?

Isn't it just about time for the American people to get answers to some of these questions?

Lobbying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED GOSSETT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, in response to an inquiry from the House Lobby Investigating Committee when it first began work, I suggested to them that the agencies and bureaus of the Federal Government were the most powerful, the most effective, and ofttimes the most offensive lobbyists. Apparently, little effort is being made by our committee to determine the extent of the pressure brought by executive agencies upon the Congress, or the effect of propaganda campaigns by newspaper columnists.

In today's mail I received a letter from a prominent and distinguished university official, in which he states:

Incidentally, some of the Federal agencies are pressing university officials to lobby for certain national loan and scholarship funds. I hope you will use your influence to kill this measure. Most colleges have all the loan funds they need—available at low rates of interest; such funds are on the increase. I sincerely doubt whether there are very many worthy boys and girls capable of taking a college education who do not eventually get it through the people in their home towns, through existing scholarships, and particularly through their own initiative. I know that you will do your part to keep the old-fashioned way of developing men and women fit for leadership and command. You don't get them by feeding them with spoons.

While Our Men Are Fighting and Dying, Some Are Learning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from Collier's of September 30, 1950, comes an editorial which reads as follows:

NEEDED: A VAST UN ARMY

Collier's strongly supports Gov. Thomas E. Dewey in his call for a vast world army of men from all free countries, under the flag and leadership of the United Nations. We made the same appeal on this page 4 weeks ago, and we think the matter is important enough to be urged again.

It is time that the other UN governments realized that there is a limit to America's ability to foot the free world's bills and fight the free world's battles. That statement is not inspired by any sympathy toward isolationism. It is inspired by a disappointment in the non-Communist government's leisurely and tentative response to UN Secretary General Trygve Lie's request for aid in Korea. It is inspired by a resentment of the American lives lost in a war that concerns every non-Communist member of the United Nations as much as it concerns the United States.

We do not mean to minimize the sea and air forces that two or three countries sent at the beginning of the Korean War. But the sea and air were not where help was most urgently needed. The need was for foot soldiers in the first bitter weeks when American forces were so vastly outnumbered, outtrained, and outgunned. The need was for foot soldiers, not in a few months or weeks, but then.

For 2 months, the American and South Korean ground forces fought it out alone. For 2 months, they fought without even the promise of help from the other major powers. The smaller nations like Australia, Thailand, Canada, and the Philippines, who were the first to volunteer assistance, perhaps should not be blamed for not having combat troops in readiness. But Great Britain had some 30,000 trained soldiers in Hong Kong when the Korean fighting broke out, and France had about 150,000 metropolitan and colonial troops under arms in Indochina. Yet, it was late August before Britain even offered to send 1,500 men to Korea and France promised a volunteer force of 1,200.

It is true that Hong Kong is a potential trouble spot, and that France is fighting a guerrilla war with the Communists in Indochina. But the fact remains that when the crisis came, this country's 50-odd non-Communist associates in the United Nations were unready or unwilling to send even a token force of ground troops into battle. The fact remains that it was the Americans alone who had to help the South Koreans defend their country and their freedom. It was the Americans alone who had to die for a cause to which the whole free membership of the United Nations was equally committed.

It may be too late now to hope for effective outside assistance in Korea. But who will be so rash as to say that Korea is the beginning and the end? There may well be other "incidents." But there must not be another Korea. With partial mobilization already under way in several countries, this is the time to start organizing the vast world army that Governor Dewey spoke of, an army prepared and alert to act in the event of further "incidents" and stop them quickly.

So long as the formation of such an army is delayed, the Soviet Government will find it easier to carry out some of its evident intentions. The intentions are these; to brand the United States as an aggressor and try to turn the masses of Asiatic people against us; to bleed our economy by forcing us to divert more and more of our wealth and effort to armaments; to expend its satellites' manpower while it keeps its own millions of men-at-arms safely at home.

Russia has spent only military equipment in Korea. America has spent equipment and lives, not to protect its own territory, not to gain any material prize, but to fight the UN's war. This cannot continue through crisis after crisis.

The United States is the bulwark of all free nations in the struggle against Soviet imperialism. It will not remain a bulwark forever if it is called upon to stand alone. As a matter of self-interest, if for no more noble consideration, the rest of the free world should realize this.

It has been said that the League of Nations expired because it had degenerated into a debating society, paralyzed by talk. There is danger that its successor might suffer the same fate unless the UN governments quickly realize that they must condemn Soviet aggression not only in indignant words but in action—action by a world army whose physical power and moral force could even make the men in the Kremlin revise their blueprint for world conquest.

It indicates that some of the internationalists should, before they subscribe so wholeheartedly to the proposal to take us into a one-world organization, have figured the possibility of a successful conclusion of that policy, of its cost to the people of the United States, its possible effect upon the security of the Republic.

Dean Acheson apparently will never learn, for he now wants us to furnish the major portion of the men and the money to form an international police force—the war in Korea is just a "police action," says Mr. Truman—to which American youth would be drafted, where their duty would be to protect the commercial interests of the British Empire.

Is it not time that Acheson, who apparently has no conception of his duty to the Republic, should either step aside or be kicked out?

The Story of Five Tragic Years

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST K. BRAMBLETT
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BRAMBLETT. Mr. Speaker, 5 years have gone by since the end of the shooting in World War II. These have been tragic years for the United States. They have been years of the most reckless, the most extravagant, and the most shilly-shallying conduct of affairs by the administration in power. Unless our house in Washington is quickly put in order these 5 years could be the prologue to the collapse of the greatest and finest form of government ever conceived by man.

Just look back at the record of those five postwar years. It is a record of spending and squandering at home and of appeasement abroad.

In five short years we have wasted one of the greatest periods of prosperity in the Nation's history. The Federal Government collected more money in taxes from the people than in any other similar period and it has spent more.

In the past 5 years the Federal Government has spent about $40,000,000,000 just for domestic civilian programs and this does not include interest on the public debt.

In the past 5 years we have spent $95,000,000,000 on the Defense Department, and I ask, Where did the money go? Why were we in such a shocking state of unpreparedness when our boys were ordered into Korea to face the crack Russian tanks and the blazing cannon of the Communist's modern fighting forces?

In the past 5 years we spent more than $11,000,000,000 in foreign aid through the Marshall plan, and on top of this Congress appropriated millions for military aid under the Atlantic Pact.

We spent billions to prepare us for the day of emergency and we were unprepared and unready when that day came.

During these 5 years while we were spending all this money our Government was following a policy of appeasement toward Russia—a merry-go-round policy which lost China to the Kremlin's Red warlords.

Where do we find ourselves at the end of that 5-year period?

The answer is plain—our Federal Government has the greatest public debt that any Nation in the world's history has ever known—and we find ourselves again at war, with American boys fighting and dying on the mountains and on the plains of Korea.

People wonder and ponder over this sad state of affairs. They are amazed and they are worried at the results of the thinking by our Government leaders.

Can you blame them? Early this year Congress was told by officials who were supposed to know what they were talking about that the South Korean troops were well-trained units and were ready and able to defend themselves. What did Congress hear a little later? From other presumably well-informed officials we were told that the South Koreans were not trained and not given American military equipment because it was feared they would attack the North Koreans. Figure that one out.

Here is some more of the same fuzzy reasoning and queer statements by Washington thinkers. It was argued that big expenditures had to be made under the Marshall plan in order to contain communism and prevent war, but at the same time the chief of the Marshall plan said that the effects of the foreign-aid program in South Korea provoked the North Koreans into starting the war to destroy its benefits. Another one to ponder over.

The plain fact is that we have an irresponsible Government in Washington. We have officials and bureaucrats who do not know what is going on and who have fumbled and bungled the United States to the brink of disaster.

All these 5 years while the Washington star gazers have been squandering our prosperity and permitting our country to become weak defensively, our enemy has been growing stronger and bolder.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD, of Virginia, recently made a speech which all real Americans should read. In it he said, and I quote:

> I assert without fear of contradiction that the American democracy—all of the things that make it and all of its beneficence—stands today in the hour of its greatest peril.

In the same speech Senator BYRD made a plea for preservation of the American way of life and American freedom. I am going to quote briefly from his speech again. He said:

> We have maneuvered the greatest country, the best form of government, and the finest Nation of people in the history of the world, into a position where they are fiscally vulnerable from within, and perhaps so greatly extended that they may be militarily vulnerable from without. Neither democracy nor freedom can survive in either the shackles of overwhelming debt or the bondage of military dictatorship.
>
> This, then, is a simple plea for the preservation of freedom in our homes, in our work, and our religion. It is a simple plea that we do what we know has to be done—strip off the luxuries of sociological ventures and political bids for votes by spending public money. It is a simple plea that we get down to the sweat and the toil of the work that is required to make this country fiscally sound and militarily impregnable.
>
> Our only hope to meet the responsibilities we have assumed and to preserve our free way of life lies in the capacity of the free-enterprise system to produce in mass quantities those goods, materials, and engines of war which are needed under such conditions in better quality and greater quantity than all of our adversaries combined. And there is no reason for us to expect much help from the nations who are associated with us, for they are more wards than allies.
> Yet, the President and our leaders are still insisting upon expansion of socialistic legislation—socialized housing, socialized medicine, socialized farming (the Brannan plan), which, if adopted, will destroy the free-enterprise system. This free-enterprise system upon which we depend cannot survive in confiscatory taxes or overwhelming debt, or state socialism. What happens to free enterprise under socialism has been demonstrated by the British before our very eyes in these same 5 years since World War II.

It should be very plain to everyone that the United States is paying the fiddler and the piper but that it is the Communist dictators who are calling the tunes. We have been outmaneuvered by the Reds, and because of our appeasement and State Department stupidity the free people of all nations are today in danger.

Because of the shameful administration of our Government at home, and because of our foreign bungling, the United States now wakes up to the facts of life. Our Nation must be reborn; it must emerge a nation strong on all fronts—the home front and the defense front. We must be powerful defensively; we must be ready for the aggressors and by being ready we can do much to prevent a global holocaust which could destroy civilization.

I am not going to give up yet on the real American way of life. I know that the American people want to preserve their freedom. I know that the people want the kind of leadership necessary to protect their liberty.

The people will make sacrifices, but those sacrifices must not be made in vain. Time is running short. Changes must be made in Washington. We must have in high office qualified men of unselfish and unquestioned patriotism; men who can chart and steer the course to keep our Nation free, keep our Nation strong, and keep our Nation at peace.

Citizens Committee Report on Hoover Report

REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to discuss the report from the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report on reductions in postal deficits. The report is as follows:

CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR THE HOOVER REPORT—REDUCTIONS IN POSTAL DEFICITS

The deficit of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1951 was estimated at $555,000,000 in the President's budget message. If the recommendations of the Hoover Commission are enacted and installed vigorously, it can be reduced by $262,000,000 or more.

Former President Hoover, in an address to the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce at Chicago on June 16, 1950, commented on the postal deficit as follows:

"We still have many major reforms to accomplish. They include our proposals:

"To organize the post office into a modern business concern with management free from politics. With this reform and some increase in rates to special commercial users, I believe its deficit of half a billion could be overcome."

ESTIMATES OF HOOVER COMMISSION

The Hoover Commission's estimates, based upon 1948 figures, were that the postal deficit could be cut by $256,000,000 annually as follows:

	(Thousands)
Increases in rates for special services	$64,000
Increases in rates for penny postcards	50,000
Managerial economies (post offices with receipts over $1,000,000)	90,000
Economies through modernization of methods and equipment	[1] 60,000
Subtotal	264,000
Deduct: Annual cost of economy program plus new equipment to effect managerial economies above	8,000
Estimated reduction	[2] 256,000

[1] Capital installation costs were not estimated in computation of this item.

[2] Appendix A hereto sets forth details regarding the reductions indicated in the Hoover Commission Report on the Post Office.

Current revenue and expenditure estimates would indicate increases in the amounts of the reductions in deficit attainable under items (1) and (2) above by approximately $6,000,000. This would increase the estimated reduction in item (7) above to $262,000,000. Proportionate increases in items (3) and (4) might well be expected on the expanded volume and might well lead to further reductions. But, due to the lack of appropriate data, no estimate of this latter possibility is made here.

ANALYSIS OF THE PRESENT DEFICIT

Assuming a deficit of $555,000,00 and the estimates given above, the possible reduction of $262,000,000 would bring the current deficit down to $293,000,000.

In his letter of February 21, 1949, to Speaker RAYBURN, the Postmaster General states that a "deficit of around $150,000,000" represents "the costs of official penalty mailing, franked mail airline subsidies, and other costs not properly chargeable to the users of the postal service, such items resulting from policies established by Congress as being in the interest of the Government and the public in general."

The Postmaster General's figure of $150,000,000 for subsidies not properly chargeable to postal users in general may be conservative if one considers the possibilities that (1) airline subsidies appear to be increasing, if prorated in accord with increases in gross payments to airlines; and (2) railroads appear to be receiving some subsidies, if the statements attributed to the General Accounting Office on this matter are given credence. However, the Postmaster General's estimate of $150,000,000 is used here because no others of provable authority are at hand. This item of $150,000,000, or whatever it is, should be separately appropriated for because it is, as the Postmaster General says, "not properly chargeable to the users of the postal service."

The Hoover Commission recommended that such a segregation of accounts be made. Recommendation No. 9 in the report on the post office makes such a recommendation specifically relating to separate appropriations for airline subsidies. In its report on Federal business enterprises, the Commission makes a similar recommendation to the effect that departments and agencies should set out subsidies separately as a part of their annual requests for appropriation. Recommendation No. 6, on page 16 of that report, says:

"Losses and subsidies should be made clear each fiscal year and passed upon by the Congress."

Were the postal recommendations of the Hoover Commission to be enacted, installed, and strongly administered, and were the subsidies to be properly segregated, the true postal deficit—that is, the deficit arising from costs properly chargeable to the users of the postal service—would approximate $143,000,000 annually, if we follow the reasoning above described.

It should not be impossible to reduce this remaining deficit, in part at least, by "some increase in rates to special commercial users" as mentioned by Mr. Hoover. Some reduction by this method would not be unreasonable when considered against the estimated losses on the following classes of mail (1949):

	Thousands
Second class	$174,675
Third class	129,053
Fourth class	104,881
Foreign surface mail	26,497
Total	435,106

The Hoover Commission made no recommendations with respect to the classes of rates listed above, stating:

"Certain postal rates are fixed, not primarily to provide postal income but as an element of public policy in the dissemination of information and in the provision of services not otherwise obtainable by the people.

"It is our view, therefore, that the final determination of rates for first-class (including air mail), second-, third-, and fourth-class mail should be made by the Congress."

The citizens committee, under its charter, is unable, therefore, to make any recommendation on such rates, but it will be of interest to the committee to consider establishment of a procedure to furnish Congress with information which would form the basis upon which it could act upon rates with more assurance.

WHAT NEEDS TO BE DONE

The large deficit of the Post Office Department or any other huge enterprise cannot be reduced by the stroke of a pen, or by the passage of a law or series of laws.

The passage of wise laws is the fundament upon which deficit reductions are based, but laws cannot, in themselves, achieve the ends desired by all of us.

In view of the Citizens Committee, three steps are necessary to produce substantial savings in the Post Office Department:

1. Congress must pass laws, wiping out anachronistic practices and providing a full framework for better management.

2. Postal administrators must have the managerial acumen and ability required to install new methods and practices.

3. Postal administrators must have the will and the courage to take all possible steps to save money and to cut deficits.

If the three conditions given above are met, savings of $142,000,000 can be achieved. In addition, revenues, as the Hoover Commission recommended, can be increased by $120,000,000, making a total reduction in the deficit of $262,000,000. The postal deficit can be cut by that amount without reducing postal services by one iota.

This cannot be done overnight. Reforms in so vast an establishment take time. Several years are required.

This cannot be done if authorization of the needed reforms is done piecemeal, or partially only, or slowly.

This cannot be done unless the full pattern of reform is accepted. Panaceas will not do the job—and, partially at least, cuts in services will prove to be but panaceas.

No single legislative measure or action is going to rectify the postal situation. Several moves are fundamental before the rectification process can even get started. Particularly important are a complete modernization of the scandalously bad accounting situation and the installation of a modern and nonpolitical personnel system. These situations are historical. Neither is the fault of the present Postmaster General or of his recent predecessors.

POLITICS AND THE POST OFFICE—ONE KEYSTONE

The personnel system of the postal establishment has historically been dominated by politics. Politics is the prime consideration in selection of the local postmasters. It also enters into the selection of rural carriers and, at times, into other selections for important postal positions. The establishment will never have a grade-A personnel system, or a high morale, or proper esprit de corps, or good public relations, or economy, until politics is utterly eradicated from it.

S. 2213 would eliminate Senate confirmation of postmasters. It would make it possible to take a long step toward a real merit system. If, in the opinion of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, it offers no guaranties of removing politics forever from the establishment, the Citizens Committee will be glad to submit amendments to tighten it up.

Faced with a situation so deplorable, it is no time to quibble over language or details. S. 2213 is the best bill for the purpose before Congress today. If, in the opinion of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, it will not put an end to politics, a measure should be drafted which will.

A modern career personnel system is a sine quo non of economies in the postal establishment. No legislative measure eradicating politics will, in itself, save money, but until this is done, the moneys will not be saved.

GOOD ACCOUNTING—ANOTHER KEYSTONE

A good accounting system is the second absolute essential, if the postal deficit is to be reduced.

Comparative costs, per service, per post office, per employee, and per piece of equipment are attainable only through good accounting. Inventories of supplies, purchases, traffic management, all are based upon accounting. Even proper real estate utilization rests on it. Without good accounting, economy is impossible.

This is not the time to labor the past. A constructive course of action is what is needed.

The Senate committee has before it H. R. 8923 (S. 3830), a compromise measure, which would provide for major modernizations in postal accounting.

The Citizens Committee has maintained that the original administration proposal, S. 2212, would give Congress more assurances of a good accounting system in the postal establishment. However, the purpose of this paper is not to debate the relative merits of the two measures.

Assurances have been given to the committee that the proposed measure, H. R. 8923 (S. 3830) would give the postal establishment a first-class accounting system. That is the end purpose for which the Citizens Committee is striving. To be more specific on the prospects this measure unfolds, the Assistant Comptroller General of the United States on Tuesday, July 18, 1950, made the following statement as to the adequacy of H. R. 8923 (S. 3830):

"While considerable time has been spent in working out the provisions of this legislation, the efforts invested have not been wasted, for the bill being considered by you lays a solid foundation for modernization and improvement of the financial operation and control of the Department without doing away with any of the essential controls by the Congress. Both the Comptroller General and I feel strongly that the bill will provide the framework for the constructive and cooperative development for the Post Office Department of a system of accounting, financial reporting, and audit second to none inside or outside the Government. At the same time, the bill gives full recognition to the Department's special status as a revenue-producing public service organization."

If events bear out this statement of the General Accounting Office, the purposes would be achieved.

The research director of the Citizens Committee pointed out to the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, that this bill can offer the following advantages:

"1. The actual accounting of the Post Office Department which has mainly been performed by another agency of Government in Asheville, N. C., would be transferred to the Post Office Department. It is a fundamental principle of good administration, private or public, that accounting operations should be performed under the supervision of the management.

"2. By so transferring the accounting to the Post Office Department, the present grievous delay between the postal transactions and the accountings therefor could readily be eliminated. The delay in accounting has for many years hampered the postal management in its calculations. Frequently, the results of accounting have not been known definitely for perhaps a year.

"3. The necessity of maintaining a duplicate set of books within the postal establishment itself should thus be eliminated.

"4. For the first time, the postal establishment will be given a basis in law for installation of a business-type accounting system with the flexibility permitted thereby.

"5. The proposed Post Office Department fund, a new revolving fund, should make it possible to eliminate the strict and unnecessary segregation of minor accounts in each of more than 42,000 post offices throughout the land. This should expedite all financial transactions.

"6. The warrant system, installed by Alexander Hamilton and long since outmoded by the modern volume of transactions it covers, can, under this bill, be eliminated.

"7. Site audits would be permitted without violation, witting or otherwise, of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, and it would also be possible to expedite auditing by the use of the spot-check or sampling technique universally used in business today. The absurd practice of shipping truck loads of vouchers to the Post Office Department and thence to Asheville, N. C., would thus be eliminated.

"8. Congress would have a fair and impartial audit performed by its own agent and that agent would no longer have dual responsibility, a practice long held to be unsound, for auditing the accounting maintained by its own employees. This would strengthen Congress' hand in that it would insure objectivity in consideration of the postal accounts.

"9. By the use of the accounting and auditing techniques contemplated by this measure, Congress would have more and better information about what the Post Office is doing."

If the measure succeeds in permitting accomplishment of these objectives, the Post Office Department will have most of the bases for the type of accounting system which Mr. YATES mentioned before the committee.

The measure in itself will not save great sums of money. One million dollars annually is the estimate of the citizens committee.

The measure can, however, offer the key to broad economies. The task force, for example, states that the total expenditures in post offices having receipts of over $1,000,000[1] can be reduced by at least $90,000,000 if operations are placed under better management control. This large saving must be founded upon accounting. (See appendix A, item II.)

Accounting is the tool to savings. Without a good accounting system, economies are virtually impossible.

A good accounting system will not give the savings. That will come from good administration.

VALIDITY OF TASK FORCE FINDINGS

The task force of the Hoover Commission, composed of senior personnel of the distinguished management engineering firm of Robert Heller and Associates, made 24 specific recommendations. In item II of Appendix A hereto are stated that firm's conclusions as to the savings possible from their program. The net figure of annual savings foreseeable under this program is $142,000,000. This figure does not include the Hoover Commission's estimate of $114,000,000 of additional revenues referred to in item I of appendix A.

The survey required many months. Its cost was $146,000. The methods employed are summarized in appendix B hereto.

This management firm has long been considered by private business as preeminent in its field. Its current work in the Department of Defense is producing vast administrative savings—unrelated to the "cut-backs" which are quite a distinct and separate form of economy. The firm has detailed information to back up the statements in its report.

Significantly, it should be noted that the unanimous report of the Hoover Commission follows almost to the letter the program outlined by Robert Heller & Associates. The commission's report in no way differs from or refutes that of the task force.

The 24 recommendations of the task force must be taken one by one, enacted (if necessary), installed intelligently, and administered vigorously, if the envisioned savings are to be realized. It would not be inappropriate for Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to see to it that this is done.

EXAMPLES OF POSSIBLE ECONOMIES

The task force not only stated the amounts of possible economies, but has given general examples of the types of action needed. A careful study of the task force report will show why the citizens committee believes these economies are possible. Some examples follow:

1. Railway mail terminals (task force recommendation No. VI): The task force pointed out that the railway mail terminals, frequently located in the same buildings and on the same floors as local post offices, come under separate jurisdiction. This system causes loss of efficiency due to duplication of operations. There is a lack of flexibility in the assignment of personnel, as well as ill effects from differences in conditions in employment and divided local responsibility. The same is true to a considerable extent in the cases of air-mail field terminals. In the opinion of the task force, "it has been proved that there is no type of transit mail which cannot be handled satisfactorily in a post office." Consolidations of these fragmented field services could save money and improve service to the public.

2. Consolidations of post offices (task force recommendation No. VII): Consolidations of post offices have been blocked by local protests and by the statute forbidding the establishment of a branch office more than 5 miles beyond the corporate limits or boundaries of a city or town. If suburban post offices were merged on a wide scale, operating economies would result through centralized use of purchasing, storage space, inventories, vehicles, administrative officials, records, machinery, etc. Services provided the public could be improved concomitantly.

3. Decentralization (task force recommendation No. II): Decentralization is widely used in private business and in Government agencies. Sears, Roebuck & Co., for example, services the Washington area from the Philadelphia regional headquarters. Similar regionalization is typical of most successful and profitable large private corporations. Appendix C hereto lists some Government agencies which have found decentralization feasible. The Post Office itself practices fragmentary decentralization for example in the case of the railway mail service. However, the individual post offices, comprising the bulk of the service, are responsible to Washington. Washington cannot give adequate supervision to any such vast number of post offices, because of geographic difficulties and because the very number of post offices so reporting to Washington violates a basic principle of management practice. An adequate number of regional offices would cost little money immediately and should almost immediately result in major operating economies. It has been alleged that this would destroy the authority of the Postmaster General. That allegation is not borne out by any known instance in Government or in private business. It has been alleged that this would lead to lack of uniformity. When done properly the contrary has proven to be true. Forty-two thousand units being supervised in a cursory manner, many of them from a great distance, cannot be operated in as uniform a manner as would be the case were 15 tightly-geared regions established. At the head of each such region would be one official, instilled with uniform basic principles of postal management. The regional office would thus be in the position to supervise closely the individual post offices and to insure uniformity, not leave it to chance. Furthermore, close operating supervision of a manageable number of units would insure better exchanges of new ideas, broader installation of improvements, and prompter action on the routine matters which comprise the bulk of all administration, particularly in the postal establishment. The savings from such regionalization should, after the first year or so, accrue in large sums.

4. Money orders (task force recommendation No. XIX): The present money order system of the Post Office is not too much dissimilar from that instituted by the Medici family in Florence in the fifteeenth century. Losses from operation of the present postal money order system are substantial. Postal authorities have, for some years, been working on a program for revising this system. Almost exactly the same system, operated by modern business methods, has long proved profitable for private banking companies which engage in it. Private companies make a moderate charge for travelers' checks and receive additional income, because they have the interest-free use of the purchasers' money for a period starting with the date the money order is purchased and ending with the date it is redeemed. These interest-free moneys reduce the need for the banking companies to obtain (and pay for) other capital. The same can be true of the Post Office, although the size of the units purchased in the case of postal orders averages considerably less dollarwise than is the case in private banking. Here again large economies could be attained.

These are but a few examples. The task force report indicates many other directions for those who seek economy. It speaks for itself.

[1] The task force informs the Citizens Committee that the figure of $1,000,000 was chosen because the installation of management controls on a large scale and the obtaining of savings thereby require units doing a substantial volume of business.

SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The citizens committee is fully convinced that the deficit of the Post Office Department can be reduced by $262,000,000 annually. Specifically, it recommends:

1. Subsides not properly chargeable to the users of the postal service should be segregated accountingwise and separately appropriated for.

2. The Congress should enact whatever laws are necessary to tear out by the roots every vestige of politics in the postal establishment. This is the first keystone of economy.

3. The Congress should direct the creation of a first class accounting system in the Post Office Department. This is the second keystone of economy.

4. The Congress should review every one of the nine Hoover Commission recommendations and 24 task force recommendations on the post office and pass whatever laws are necessary to permit effectuation of each and every one of these 33 recommendations.

5. The Congress should direct postal authorities to take immediate action on each and every one of 33 recommendations.

6. The Congress should review progress on the reform of the postal establishment constantly and continuously.

7. The Postmaster General should be required to report to Congress at specified intervals, his progress at installing the reforms and the dollar savings thereby achieved.

II. EXCERPT FROM TASK FORCE REPORT OF ROBERT HELLER AND ASSOCIATES

V. Costs and savings

Based on broad experience in business and industry, and predicated on knowledge of what has been done in commercial operations, the study of the Post Office Department indicates that total annual expenditures in post offices having receipts over $1,000,000 per year can be reduced by at least $90,000,000 if operations are placed under better management control. If postal volume and the general level of all costs continue to rise, these excessive expenditures will become even greater in future years. In order to achieve the indicated savings, however, it will be necessary to expend annually an amount which should not exceed a peak of $8,000,000, plus minor capital expenditures, for the modernization program recommended in part V. This will leave net savings of over $80,000,000 per year at present volume and at current wage and salary levels.

In addition to the foregoing net savings of $80,000,000 anually, it is conservatively estimated that further annual savings of at least $60,000,000 are possible from improvements in methods and equipment requiring extensive development or major capital expenditures. Development and perfection of the necessary methods and equipment would be carried on within the organization recommended in part V, the cost of which is included in the $8,000,000 mentioned above. Authorization of the capital investment required for widespread application of perfected improvements should, of course, be dependent on prior demonstration of their practicability and money-saving value.

The increased expense required to make possible the estimated savings will be occasioned primarily by adoption of the recommendations dealing with organization, financial and accounting control, control of costs and methods, and personnel administration. The maximum annual expenditure of $8,000,000 will not be reached for several years because a number of the recommendations, particularly those concerned with cost controls and methods improvements, will require time for planning, development and gradual installation.

The length of time which will elapse before the peak of expense is reached will depend on the energy with which the program is pursued, but it will probably not be less than 3 years. Conversely, the estimated savings to be achieved will not reach peak level until the program is in full operation.

No one item of savings will be spectacular in itself. The measure of operating improvement in the postal establishment will be the cumulative effect of many individual savings leading to a very substantial total. Because of the continuing growth in the postal business (it doubled on the average every 11 years for 80 years prior to 1929 and doubled again in 14 years from 1934 to 1948) it is unlikely that any reduction in total expenditures will take place. Instead, the estimated savings will show up in improved productivity of the present organization and a reduction in the rate at which the organization must grow to meet the increasing volume of business.

It should be noted that the estimated additional expense for the Post Office Department will not represent $8,000,000 added expense for the Federal Government as a whole because of estimated savings on the order of $2,000,000 annually which will be reflected in the expense of the General Accounting Office and the Civil Service Commission by adoption of recommendations in this report bearing on their operations.

All the advantages to be realized by the Post Office Department by adoption of the proposed modernization program cannot be measured in dollars alone, nor can all of the financial gains be estimated at this time. Gains will also accrue from such factors as:

1. Better financial control.
2. Better management through on-the-scene direction of field operations.
3. Better recruitment of personnel.
4. Better training of postal workers and supervisors.
5. Better utilization of transportation facilities.
6. Better commercial practices.

After all possible savings in postal operations are effected, however, there will still remain a large deficit. Of major importance, therefore, will be the fact that adoption of the recommendations herein will provide more facts upon which to base consideration of adjustments needed in rates and classifications in order to bring revenues and expenses more nearly into balance.

In the last anaylsis, implementation of the proposed program will require additional annual expenditures of about 6 million dollars by the Federal Government. This amount will represent less than one-half cent of every dollar of postal revenue, and should be repaid many times over.

APPENDIX B

METHODS OF TASK FORCE INFORMATION

Data pertaining to the operation of the postal establishment were obtained from five principal sources:

1. Officials of the Post Office Department at Washington.
2. Personnel of the postal service in the field.
3. Other departments and agencies of the Government.
4. Organizations and persons outside the Government having an interest in postal matters.
5. Public documents, and internal reports and statistics of the Post Office Department.

It was found necessary at Washington to work with about 50 officials of the Post Office Department in order to become adequately acquainted with top management activities. These officials comprised the majority in the first three levels of authority in the Department. From them was secured a knowledge of administrative policies and procedures and considerable information on field operations.

Work with members of the postal service was conducted in 15 areas selected to provide a cross section of field operations. The areas were Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Atlanta, Chattanooga, New Orleans, Canton, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Fort Worth-Dallas, Denver, Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. At each of these cities key personnel in all parts of the field service were interviewed, and visits were made to nearby smaller post offices. Internal operations were also studied in some detail at the Chicago, Kansas City, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Washington post offices, and at the mail-equipment shops in Washington. In all, more than 60 first-, second-, third-, and fourth-class post offices were visited, as well as a number of stations and branches of large offices.

Officials in several departments and agencies of the Government performing services for the Post Office Department or having information of significance to this assignment were seen. These included the General Accounting Office, Bureau of the Budget, Department of the Treasury, Department of Commerce, National Security Resources Board, Civil Service Commission, and the Tennessee Valley Authority. In addition, special data were secured from other task forces of the Commission working with other Government departments and agencies.

Organizations and persons outside the Government, such as railroads, airlines, truck operators, printers and publishers, mail-order houses, advertising agencies, equipment manufacturers, representatives of postal workers' organizations, and former postal officials contributed much useful information and many constructive suggestions. Furthermore, officials of the Post Office Department, Dominion of Canada, gave generously of their time in explaining present and proposed organization and operating methods of the Canadian postal system.

Public documents and internal reports and statistics of the Department which were reviewed and studied are too numerous to list. It is noteworthy, however, that a wealth of written material on postal operations is available and that most of the recommendations contained later in this report have also been proposed in whole or in part by others in previous reports.

America's Most Historic City: Charleston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an article which appeared in the De Kalb New Era, under date of Thursday, September 7, 1950. This article is written by the very able columnist Walter Reiman, entitled "Talking it Over," and it concerns my city of Charleston, S. C.

Those who have seen Charleston leave with a profound impression of a city that has preserved its past and still keeps abreast of history's progress.

The fine people of the South Carolina low country, of which Charleston is the principal city, represent the original Americans. It was here that the English royalty made some of the original land grants on this continent. History is present in every nook and cranny of this splendid section of the Nation. We are proud of our contribution to the history of our country.

Mr. Reiman writes well of my people and our city. We are grateful to him for a fine article and we want the rest of the Nation to see his impression of what we too feel about our metropolis. The article follows:

A visit to Charleston is a must for anyone who would know the South.

This Labor Day week end was our first visit to Charleston—a visit teeming with thrills over the discovery of what we believe to be America's greatest city.

The air of stability struck us most. Charlestonians have valued their old possessions—kept them in good repair—so that the glory of the eighteenth century as seen in their buildings serves present-day Americans admirably at home and at the place of their business.

There is no museum aspect about the town. Charleston is not a restoration, but, rather, a town that has been lived in all the while, a town well maintained spontaneously by thousands of its citizens.

Charleston points up the character of a people we'd like to know—a people who have the vision to evaluate their environment—a people, were we to become acquainted with them, who would open, we believe, a vast treasure of knowledge about the South, knowledge that would be useful for all of the South.

A THOUSAND GEMS

We saw a thousand architectural gems—a gate here, a window there, a wall of weathered warm rose brick.

At a snail's pace three times we drove the full length of Murray Boulevard and the East Battery and East Bay Street skirting the waterfront—and King and Meeting and Broad and Queen Streets—reveling in the beauty of half-concealed courtyards, great porches, graceful doorways, artistic gates, and iron grill work.

We enjoyed the old city market and its beautiful lamps, and St. Michael's church with its exquisite steeple and windows, the 1765 Pringle house built by Miles Brewton, the 1726 Dock Street theater, the Heyward-Washington house built in 1750 by Thomas Heyward, Jr., a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and occupied in 1791 by Washington.

Across the Cooper and Ashley Rivers and back inland whence a four-lane white-way brings U. S. highway 52 to town from the North, we saw modern Charleston's industry, business, and residences sprawl for miles in a great arc of activity.

All in all, we felt the power and the glory that is Charleston.

FOR FOOD IT'S HENRY'S

Henry's, down by the old market, is the place to dine—perfect cuisine, grand, grand service. Henry's has everything and anything you could desire—is one of those rare 'old timey' establishments found here and there about the Nation.

Unfortunately, we didn't visit the famed gardens out from town, Magnolia, Middleton Place, and Cypress.

Magnolia Gardens, John Galsworthy is reported to have said, is one of the most beautiful gardens in the world.

We want to go back to Charleston. When we do we'll see the gardens. They are part of the great living Charleston—Charleston whose people, we believe, post a stirring challenge to their fellow Americans; Charleston, which only a dozen essays, each keyed to a different channel of our culture, might do justice.

Yes; we want to go back to Charleston. We'd like to meet some of its people, because we feel, as Adiemantus in Plato's the Republic felt: "The good and true city or State, and the good and true man is of the same pattern."

Veteran's Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have received many inquiries lately concerning the provisions of my bill H. R. 9437, which seeks to provide automatic insurance protection for all men entering any branch of the Armed Forces during an emergency.

Last May 10, the committee unanimously adopted a resolution directing the staff of the committee to make a study of the possibilities of a new insurance program. The bill which I have introduced is the first step in this study.

Beginning next week, the staff will start a series of conferences with officials of the Bureau of the Budget, Department of Defense, General Accounting Office, Veterans' Administration, American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, and American Veterans of World War II, with a view to giving detailed consideration to this bill and other proposals in this field.

When the Congress returns, in November, it is my intention to have the Committee on Veterans' Affairs hold hearings on this measure.

I make this announcement so that Members may know of the plans of the committee on this subject, and may advise their constituents who are interested.

Revisions Needed in the Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CALEB BOGGS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, as you know, there was recently enacted by the Congress a new and important social-security law. This new law substantially broadens the benefits and extends the coverage for our national social-security program. This new law had my support as well as that of nearly all the Members of the Congress.

Enactment of the new social-security law directs attention, however, to the need for revision of the Railroad Retirement Act. Railroad employees are not covered under the provisions of the Social Security Act, and consequently, I urge the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to undertake as soon as possible a careful and complete review of the Railroad Retirement Act.

It was quite a few years ago that the Congress established for railroad workers an independent retirement system. Under that act contributions to the retirement fund are made by both the employees and the management of railroads. In the Seventy-ninth Congress that act was modified by what has become known as the Crosser amendment.

In my opinion and that of a vast number of railroad employees, serious discrepancies exist between the payments made by railroad workers and the benefits which they receive under the Railroad Retirement Act, and the payments made and benefits received by the millions who are covered by social security.

I readily admit that the problem of equalizing these discrepancies is a complex one. Nevertheless, I am sure that the committee, with its specialized knowledge of these problems, can find adequate solutions. I am also convinced that the committee should launch as soon as possible a full-scale and thoroughgoing study of this problem so that remedial legislation may be presented to and enacted by the Congress at an early date. As I said previously, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of such study and new legislation should be primarily to make sure that the benefits payable under the Railroad Retirement Act are as generous, when compared with the respective payments made, as are the benefits for those covered by the Social Security Act.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is only fair that our railroad employees should be placed on a basis which is comparable with that of the employees of other industries and business enterprises. I am sure that there will be no disagreement with my feeling that no segment of our society should enjoy any undue privilege and, on the other hand, that no segment of our people should be unduly penalized.

A careful study by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the benefits provided by the Railroad Retirement Act and a comparison of those benefits—always bearing in mind the relationship of payments made—to the benefits under the broadened Social Security Act will be a step in the direction of ascertainment that there is fairness and equality for all.

Social-Security Law Points to a Brighter Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, great evidence has been given recently that our Nation is approaching a real maturity in its domestic life. This evidence is embodied in the Eighty-first Congress enactment of the amendments expanding and bringing up to date the Nation's social-security system.

The new law extends security in their later years to some 10,000,000 additional Americans. It raises benefits to conform with higher costs of living. Furthermore, it liberalizes eligibility requirements; potential recipients of benefits will not be required to work so many years under social-security coverage as before, and retired workers, survivors, and dependents will be able to earn more money without forfeiting the right to their benefit payments.

These benefits are made to the people not as a matter of charity nor as a public dole, but as their earned right. It must be kept in mind that social security is fundamentally an insurance plan.

BROADER COVERAGE

The 10,000,000 new recipients of social-security benefits are, for the most part, persons who have been self-employed, such as grocers, retail-store and gas-station owners, and life-insurance salesmen—full time. Beginning January 1, 1951, these persons will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Also provided for under the new law are agricultural workers—although farmers, in the strict sense, are not yet included under social security. Included under the term "agricultural worker" are persons engaged in such work as raising livestock or fur animals, processing or delivering crops to storage or to market, doing household work on a farm, and handling fruits and vegetables for commercial firms.

Domestic workers in nonfarm homes will be eligible to join the system next January, as will the following: Federal employees not covered already by a Federal retirement system; State and municipal employees, provided the particular State wishes to enter into an agreement with the Federal Government whereby it will be set forth specifically which groups of employees will be covered under social security—any State or city employee already covered by an existing retirement system will be, of course, ineligible for social security—employees of nonprofit institutions, such as churches, hospitals, and schools, provided the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution; certain full-time traveling salesmen—other than house-to-house—many delivery-truck drivers; and home industrial workers, provided they satisfy certain conditions.

LARGER BENEFITS

Immediately effective is an increase in social-security payments; checks to be mailed out October 3 will offer the recipient, on the average, about 75 percent more than he has been receiving.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without dependents:

$45	76
$50	92
$55	110
$60	117
$65	122
$70	128
$75	133

After June 1952 a new formula may be used to compute benefits. This formula will yield approximately twice the benefits now being received. A person can begin to use this new formula just as soon as he has worked for six quarter-years—a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The table below shows, roughly, what the benefits will be under this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	86
$200	65	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $10 to $20, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150.

EASIER ELIGIBILITY

In the future persons will not have to work so long in order to be fully insured and eligible to receive payments upon reaching the retirement age of 65. The table below indicates how the new law compares with the old law as to the number of quarter-years of social-security coverage required for wage earners of various ages before they can be eligible for payment.

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
76 or over	6	6
75	8	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
67	24	6
66	26	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
61	36	8
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
56	40	18
55	40	20
50	40	30
45 or under	40	40

All of the time a person has worked under social security up to now is, of course, still applicable to the new coverage requirement.

This means that any insured worker now 65 or over who has had six quarter-years of social-security coverage can draw benefits immediately.

Again, any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he starts his social-security coverage only next year, will be eligible to draw benefits as soon as he becomes 65.

Finally, the relaxation of coverage requirements will greatly assist those who have just been allowed by the new law to come under social security—e. g., the self-employed businessman. It will not be so difficult for them to attain the requirements for eligibility, so that they might begin to draw payments as soon as possible after reaching the age of 65.

As to how much a retired worker, his survivors or his dependents can earn without losing the right to receive benefits, the limit has been raised from $14.99 to $50 per month.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

Survivors and dependents of the insured worker will, on the whole, receive the same proportion of the primary benefit—the basic payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents—as at present; therefore, their benefits will increase, on the average, 75 percent—and after 1952, 100 percent—over the present levels.

Other major changes in the law concerning survivors and dependents are:

First. A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits, provided she has a child in her care.

Second. The divorced former wife of a deceased insured worker may in some cases receive benefits on his record if she is caring for his children.

Third. The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—formerly one-half.

Fourth. A dependent husband or widower of a fully and currently insured woman who is entitled to old-age and survivors insurance benefits or who died after August 1950, is now eligible for insurance payments when he becomes 65.

Fifth. Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly, these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

Veterans of World War II also are affected by this new law in that it provides wage credits of $160 for each month of active military or naval service to men and women who had 90 days or more of active military service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947.

This new social-security legislation received my full support. I believe that it gives winning evidence that ours is a great Nation, devoted to its people and seeking the betterment of mankind.

Dr. Joseph F. Thorning Speaks on the Good Neighbor Policy as It Relates to Latin and South American Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include a synopsis of a recent address, delivered under the chairmanship of Mr. Sam Rosenstock, of the Kiwanis International Club of Frederick, Md., by my friend, Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, one of the best-informed scholars on inter-American affairs in the United States. This report is taken from the Frederick News-Post, September 20, 1950. It reads as follows:

A political policy of expediency in this country is responsible for South America's "cold attitude toward the United States."

In a talk to the Kiwanis Club Tuesday in the Francis Scott Key Hotel, Rev. Father Joseph F. Thorning, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Carrollton Manor, placed definitely in Washington blame for selling the good-neighbor policy down the river for votes which, he said, has produced only paper cooperation by South American republics with the UN plan of action in Korea.

"With reference to substantial quotas of men, materials and money, these neighbor countries have been conspicuous only for the modesty of their contributions," the speaker declared. This modesty he linked with recent events in the Senate—especially the Gillette investigation of the soaring price of coffee, and the Senate agreement to let rest until after the elections a plea for suspension of import tax on copper.

FEELING AGAINST UNITED STATES

Chile's President, on a visit to the United States, sought revocation of the import tax on copper from his country. During World War II when this country was doing preemptive buying, the tax was lifted, but after the House of Representatives passed recently a similar acceptable bill, the Senators decided to table the matter until after November lest it have repercussions from copper-mining States. New England actually does not get enough raw copper to supply her industries, Dr. Thorning said, and would profit largely from greater importations.

Both Colombia and Brazil now have "real feeling" against the United States, in the speaker's belief, because Senator GILLETTE'S report on coffee accused both republics as extortionists instead of blaming speculators in New York for the advanced price of the beverage. "No wonder Brazil sits on its hands and looks and listens," opined Dr. Thorning. "She sent troops to Italy but not this time."

Brazil also remembers, the clergymen continued, that the country was an important funnel of materials of war to North Africa in the campaign which defeated Rommel. These memories make even more bitter to the Brazilian the accusations in the coffee scandal. "Collective security and trade are indivisible," Dr. Thorning reminded.

AMMUNITION FOR COMMIES

Such American actions are excellent ammunition for the Communists in South American countries where left-wing union organizers are trying to "sell workers into the slavery of Soviet imperialism." In Uruguay and Costa Rica labor has been brought to high standards of pay in a democratic pattern but Communists are working diligently to "plant Soviet ideas which are reactionary against freedom."

In Guatemala Dr. Thorning found an apt example of the precarious position the United States holds in South America. Identifying that country's president as "a mystical Socialist," Dr. Thorning quoted some of "his double talk." The official wrote that relations between his own land and the United States are most cordial yet the government spreads Soviet propaganda, and when labor chieftains recently informed United States Ambassador Patterson that his health would suffer seriously if he remained longer in Guatemala, the diplomat had to leave. "An accredited representative of the United States dares not remain in a country because a group of murderers advise him to depart," Dr. Thorning exclaimed.

LOAN TO MEXICO

The New York Times recently sent an ace reporter to look into the situation and his front-page stories show how far Soviet infiltration has gone in this hemisphere, Dr. Thorning said.

A recently authorized loan of $150,000,000 to Mexico is the first fruit of the visit 2 years ago of President Aleman, and it is proving strengthening to the chief executive who has done much to reconcile the different groups in his country. Dr. Thorning suggested the wisdom of all-out aid for Aleman.

"United States officialdom should recognize the necessity of providing lucrative markets for South American products," Dr. Thornin; emphasized, and an effort "to stabilize the Latin economy in such ways as would enable the Organization of American States (formerly the Pan American Union) to organize armed strength for the benefit of the United Nations."

Dr. Thorning was introduced by Samuel Rosenstock, program chairman. President Milton Brunk was in the chair. Guests were Irving Weil and H. H. Harbaugh.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Washington City News Service was established in Washington nearly 17 years ago to make available all the news of the world in brief form to individual correspondents and others, throughout the day. This service, which pioneered the field, has been in use in many of the governmental departments since that time. The White House, the Senate, and a number of Cabinet members have access to the service through their departments at all hours of the day. With direct wires from Capitol Hill news is instantly transmitted through this service to those interested. Especial emphasis is placed upon committee hearings, proceedings in both Houses of Congress, and such information is given precedence over routine news.

The entire world-wide news report of United Press is available to Washington City News Service, so that the subscriber may be kept fully informed, minute by minute, of the important events happening throughout the world.

This service may be purchased at a flat standard rate by any governmental department or bureau and individual installations may be made in any office at the convenience of the subscriber.

Voice of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PRINCE H. PRESTON, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include four timely articles by John Jarrell, of the Omaha World-Herald, relative to the Voice of America. These articles bear testimony to the effectiveness of the program and support the position of those of us who believe that an expanded information service is essential in the battle of ideas. The articles follow:

TRUMAN'S COMMENT ON KOREA BROADCAST TO RUSSIAN PEOPLE

It is evening—a long, Moscow evening—and Kyril Petrov, home from a trying day at the factory, turns on his shortwave radio.

He has a certain feeling of guilt because, while there is no definite law in Russia against listening to foreign broadcasts, he knows it won't do his standing any good if the MVD learns he listens to programs coming from the United States.

Kyril twists the dial, and a voice, speaking perfect Russian, is wafted to him over the air waves.

"This is New York," the voice says. "You are listening to the radio broadcast of the Voice of America. Listen to the truthful information of a free radio. Listen to the Voice of America."

Kyril Petrov continues to listen. This is June 27, a memorable day in American history. It is the day that President Truman announced that he was ordering United States air and sea forces to the aid of Southern Korea, fighting Communist invaders from North Korea.

The Voice of America for June 27 was selected by a World-Herald reporter as a good day to review the entire Russian broadcast by the Voice of America, that controversial propaganda weapon with which this country tries to project the truth into the Soviet Union in the face of a radio-jamming technique that seeks to obliterate every spoken word before it can pierce the iron curtain.

The big story that day was President Truman's decision that virtually sent the United States to war, fighting Communists 5,000 miles from home.

The Truman story was given straight to the Russians, in their own language, without trimmings.

"President Truman pointed out," the Russian-speaking United States news announcer said, "that the invasion of the Korean Republic makes it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to armed invasion, with its aim the conquest of independent nations."

That day also the five daily broadcasts in Russia (which are repeated 24 hours daily by United States relay stations) featured several routine news programs.

The news announcer related a little story from Rome without added comment. None was needed. It was about the resignation from the Polish Embassy in Rome of Poland's commercial attaché, who also announced he would not return to Warsaw.

There was a story on contradictory propaganda statements by the Russians, with the assertion:

"There can be no doubt that in other countries of the world too, this cynical difference between the words and the acts of the Communists will be properly appraised."

There was a labor round-up, quoting the United States Council of Economic Development on United States worker wages—three times as great as 50 years ago—his increased productivity, the reduction of the number of work hours, technical progress, industrial output, the vast amount of consumer spending, all matters deemed of interest to the worker in the U. S. S. R., fed a steady diet at home of propaganda designed to prove that in America the worker is downtrodden, underfed, abused.

VOICE OF 1950 MUCH BETTER—RUSS EFFORTS TO JAM IT ARE PROOF

Just how much good the Voice of America does in its broadcasts beamed to Russia is anybody's guess.

However, the fact that the Soviets utilize some 1,000 transmitters in their effort to jam these Russian-language broadcasts is the best endorsement, it would appear.

A World-Herald reporter has just made a study of quite a few of these broadcasts, enough to give a fairly good cross section.

Compared to the broadcasts he read 2 years ago, on a similar undertaking, the 1950 variety is vastly improved.

TOO SCHOLASTIC?

The criticism has been made that the broadcasts are too heavy, too scholastic in tone, suited perhaps to the political scientist but not to the Ivan on the street.

This reporter is not sufficiently acquainted with the average Russian mind, or to the type of Russians who listen to the broadcast, to know about that.

Following, though, are the results of a rather comprehensive sampling of some programs:

There was a broadcast by the VOA's special correspondent at the Berlin meeting of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, one Yakov Alexsandrovich Savelyev.

DOUBLE TALK

Mr. Savelyev pointed out that the Soviet press of Eastern Berlin was calling delegates to this Congress "lackeys of imperialism" and its organizers spies of the United States State Department.

Then Mr. Savelyev asserted:

"Today everybody knows that when the Communists speak of peace they mean an attack."

A feature of the VOA is a calendar which reminds Russians of events affecting them which the Soviet Government may have eliminated or would like to eliminate from history books.

SCIENTISTS DISGRACED

The Voice recalls, for instance, that in 1948 there was a controversy over the theory of heredity. It was resolved when the official Central Committee of the Soviet Party proclaimed that one theory was "an indisputable scientific truth."

The committee backed up this decision with measures placing a number of Russian geneticists, who followed the other theory, in a state of official disgrace for following a "false" and "bourgeois-decadent" line.

Into Russian-dominated countries went a broadcast relative to the charges by the U. S. S. R. that the United States had, by plane, sprayed Colorado potato beetles into fields to spoil crops.

ADVICE GIVEN

The broadcast denied this (high United States Government officials consider this Russian propaganda blast about the silliest in which it has engaged) and charged it was an attempt to divert attention from the fact that no measures had been taken to destroy the pest, though it had been prevalent in the area for some time.

Then the broadcaster proceeded to relay United States Department of Agriculture advice on how to eliminate the potato bug—good, sound advice that any European farmer could follow.

VOICE SHOWS COMPARISONS—SUBTLY TELLS FREEDOM IN UNITED STATES WAYS

The Voice of America, in its broadcasts in Russian to the Soviet Union, places considerable stress on comparisons between life in the United States and in Russia.

Voice officials consider that one of the really important phases of their propaganda job.

But the broadcasts touch many subjects in the five daily broadcasts.

The daily calendar is an essential part of these broadcasts.

In this feature, the Russians are told of past events which the Kremlin probably would like to have them forget.

TELLS OF AID

On June 11, for instance, the Voice recalled that it was exactly 8 years earlier that Cordell Hull, then Secretary of State, and Maxim Litvinov, then a top official of Russia's Foreign Office and since consigned to oblivion, signed the lend-lease agreement.

The broadcast touched on the amount of lend-lease aid given Russia, the sacrifices that it entailed in the United States, and the difficulty of transporting it to the Soviet Union over the perilous Murmansk sea route, or across Iran.

CITES PHILIPPINES

February 17, 1945, was recalled 5 years later as the day the last Japanese surrendered on Bataan.

It was pointed out that the United States made no attempt to force its will on the Philippines, but instead gave that country its full independence a little over a year later.

There was a broadcast on concentration camps in Russia, with an obvious reference that such things are unknown in America.

One story on the United States retreat in Korea pointed out that the aggressor usually made gains at the outset of any fighting, and mentioned examples.

FORMER NAZI NAMED

One of the examples was Napoleon. Any Russian who knows any history would recall that Napoleon once conquered Moscow—but finally had to retreat in one of the most costly military operations in history.

There is a feature, "Life behind the iron curtain."

For instance, the Communist Government of Hungary named a new cabinet member—and the Voice explained how this Communist used to belong to the Hungarian Nazi Party.

NOT CENSORED

Out of Poland was a story of the disappearance of 200 boy scouts "for collaboration with western imperialists."

Some space was given to a series of articles by two Pravda correspondents in New York, declaring that American workers suffered impoverishment and enslavement.

The VOA pointed out that the Pravda reporters sent their story without censorship—which is unheard of in Russia—and that Pravda, the New Times, and other Russian periodicals are sold here.

"But can a Soviet citizen buy a New York Times at a Moscow newsstand?" the Voice of America asked.

MANY REDS HEAR VOICE—PROBABLY 30 PERCENT GET SOME PROGRAMS

How many Russians listen to the Voice of America?

Anything would be a guess, but it is estimated there are 4,000,000 radio receivers in the Soviet Union, of which 3,500,000 are capable of receiving short-wave broadcasts, such as those broadcast by VOA.

Most of the Russian sets are short-wave receivers.

The Russian Government goes all out in its effort to jam the broadcasts.

PROBABLY EFFECTIVE

The Voice of America figures the jamming is quite effective in the large cities, but that the broadcasts from New York, and rebroadcasts from relay stations, get through about 30 percent of the time.

In less densely populated areas, the percentage is greater.

Officials of the Voice have pinned down 250 transmitters that are jamming the airways. They estimate there are 1,000 of them.

Voice of America officials have another yardstick by which they measure success.

PEOPLE LISTEN

That is the continual reference in Soviet publications to statements made by the Voice, and the attacks made on statements contained in the broadcasts.

This, say officials, seems an assumption by the Russian Government itself that its people listen to the broadcasts.

Not long ago, for instance, one Russian writer took 12 columns to refute a Voice of America broadcast comparing the living standard of people here with those in the U. S. S. R.

Deserters from the Russian Army also have told of the amount of listening.

REACHING ALL

They say that while there is no specific law barring citizens from listening to foreign broadcasts, Russians know that the MVD would write them down in their black books.

When Anna Kasenkina leaped from a window rather than return to the Soviet Union, a year ago, it was front-page news here. But the Russian Government hushed it up at home. The Voice of America, though, featured the case in its broadcasts, and Voice officials said it spread like wildfire through the U. S. S. R.

They count that further proof of the effectiveness of the Voice.

In addition to the 3,500,000 short-wave receivers in Russia, there are as many in satellite countries.

The Voice thinks it is getting through to all of them.

Economic Rehabilitation of Anthracite Area of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to lay before the Congress the final proposal in the legislative program I have sponsored for the economic rehabilitation of the anthracite area of Pennsylvania. I herewith introduce a bill for the creation of a Susquehanna Watershed Commission whose assignment it will be to prepare plans for the development of the resources of the Susquehanna Basin for purposes of flood control, economic development, navigation, soil conservation, recreation, and other purposes.

This program of legislation I have initiated is made up of measures directed both toward immediate, short-range action and toward long-range development. I do not need to recite the facts concerning the acute and persistent economic distress of the anthracite area. They are well known. They stem from the decline in demand for anthracite which began over two decades ago and which has dropped further and further, year after year. They tell the story of unemployment running into the tens of thousands—not only during years of depression but even during the years of World War II and the great prosperity which the Nation generally has enjoyed since VJ-day.

The specific legislation which I have proposed covers: First, the construction of a large office building in Wilkes-Barre to house the anthracite activities of the Bureau of Mines; second, the stockpiling of anthracite by the Federal Government in order to assure a reasonable level of production and employment in the anthracite-coal fields; third, creation of a $10,000,000 fund for the establishment of an anthracite research laboratory and research program aimed at uncovering new uses for anthracite both as a fuel and a raw material; fourth, provision for a 5 percent advantage on bids to bidders from the anthracite area as contrasted to bidders from other areas selling to procurement agencies of the Federal Government; fourth, requests to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a $5,000,000 loan to local industrial development interests for use in building factories in the area for use by new manufacturing enterprises; sixth, establishment of a national Council on Chronic Unemployment Areas to prepare comprehensive plans and programs for the economic rehabilitation of the anthracite area and areas elsewhere in the Nation suffering chronic and acute economic distress.

Mr. Speaker, the anthracite area of Pennsylvania lies within the watershed of the Susquehanna River. That watershed includes a vast area of eastern Pennsylvania and smaller areas of the States of New York and Maryland. The resources of the Susquehanna Valley constitute a rich endowment of nature. Today they are only partially developed. Their full conservation and development can mean new wealth, new income, and new employment opportunities both for the distressed anthracite area and for the much larger area of eastern Pennsylvania.

The Susquehanna watershed comprises some 27,000 square miles. It is the largest stream along the Chesapeake Bay. It contains large industrial centers, the anthracite coal fields, and smaller bituminous coal fields. Somewhat more than half of its acreage is in farms. Some of the farm lands are the finest in the Nation. At the other extreme, some of the lands are definitely submarginal. The rest of the acreage in the watershed is in forest and game lands, with large areas of second-growth timber. Recreation opportunities are abundant.

The most urgent problem of the basin over the years has been the need for flood control. For example, it was estimated that the floods of 1935 and 1936 caused property damage just short of $100,000,000; at today's prices that loss would be even more staggering, yet it fails to reflect the far greater loss in human lives. Over the years there has been progress with respect to flood control. Through a large program of levees and protection walls along the main river, and by building dams, improving channels, and constructing flood walls along the tributaries United States Army Corps of Engineers has given the people of the Susquehanna Basin a large measure of flood protection. But the job has yet to be finished. Agricultural agencies of State and Federal Government have supplemented this flood-control program through forestry and soil conservation activities. The State of Pennsylvania has made great strides in pollution abatement in the basin.

In its lower reaches, the Susquehanna provides a channel for river transportation, with access to the sea. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, there may be opportunities for its further use as an artery of commerce beyond what has as yet been envisioned.

Mr. Speaker, those are some of the steps which have been taken in the development of the water resources of this great river basin. They are piecemeal steps. I have searched and I cannot find an all-inclusive program for that development. I can find no total program which contains separate but interrelated plans for the full development of the Susquehanna's potential, its navigational potential, its recreational potential, the management of its lands for soil and forest conservation, complete protection from floods. Such programs and plans not only exist but are being implemented in the three great river basins—the Columbia in the Pacific Northwest, the Missouri in the vast area between the Mississippi and the mountains to the west, the Tennessee in the Southeast. This summer the President directed that such a comprehensive program be prepared for the Arkansas, White, and Red River Basins in the Southwest by the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Interior, the Corps of Engineers, the Federal Power Commission, and the Federal Security Agency, in cooperation with agencies of State and local government. These same agencies are working jointly on the programs for the Columbia and Missouri Basins.

It is perhaps natural that the Nation should proceed first with the multiple-purpose development of its larger river basins, for they represent, of course, our larger opportunities. However, that work is well along in our larger basins. If the Nation is to achieve real economic security and realize the expansion roles which a growing population and labor force require, we must now turn to planning for the multiple-purpose development of our smaller watersheds. While we have abandoned or are on the road to abandoning a piecemeal approach to resources development in our larger basins, we are still using that approach in the Susquehanna and other small watersheds.

While there were certain efforts at Federal-State cooperation in multiple-purpose development of smaller watersheds during the 1930's, I am told that the bill which I am proposing will mark the first instance in which this approach will proceed under statutory auspices. I believe that what I am suggesting may be equally applicable to other small watersheds in the Nation, and that for this reason the bill to create a Susquehanna Watershed Commission merits the interest of many of my colleagues from other States.

Mr. Speaker, what I am suggesting is the creation of a Susquehanna Watershed Commission to consist of three full-time members to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Two of these members shall be bona fide residents of the area, and each shall maintain his residence there. Using the staff facilities of Federal and State agencies conducting water resource development programs, it shall be the duty of this Commission, after reviewing existing plans and programs, to prepare such multiple-purpose and unified plans and programs for the conservation and development of natural resources and expansion of industry and business as may be useful to the President and the Congress in guiding and controlling the nature, extent, and sequence of Federal programs, projects, and activities in the area. The Commission will be specifically directed to suggest measures and plans for the economic rehabilitation of the anthracite industry and area. With respect to all of its work, the Commission will be directed to seek the advice, assistance, and participation of the people of the watershed and their State and local governments. To that end the Commission will establish a public advisory board of 12 members—3 representing agriculture, 3 business, 3 labor, and 3 State governments.

The Commission will report its recommended plans and programs to the President for transmission with his recommendations to Congress 1 year after the effective date of the act, and its recommendations shall include proposals with respect to ways and means of carrying out and giving force and effect to the recommended plans and programs, including legislation, organization, administration, budget requirements, and relationships with local and State governments. Having delivered its programs, plans, and recommendations, the Commission will go out of existence. After studying its recommendations with respect to implementing the program, I shall sponsor appropriate legislation for an appropriate operating organization.

Mr. Speaker, I have given considerable study to the activities of the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Interior, Federal Power Commission, and the Corps of Engineers in the Columbia and Missouri Basins and elsewhere, and I have noted with particular interest their cooperation and collaboration with similar agencies in State government. What those efforts really involve is the marshalling of the programs of all of these agencies into unified plans which will achieve full development of our natural resources and the latent economic opportunites they hold in store. My observations leave me with the conviction that the collaborative planning work of those various agencies can be expedited and improved qualitatively if it can be done under the aegis of a central body vested by the Congress with real power of decision with reference to the detailed nature of the plans. It is for that reason that I have suggested the vesting of that kind of power in a Commission of three men, none of whom represents or is responsible for any going program of Federal or State government. I call particular attention to the fact that this Commission will have power only to plan and that it will go out of existence upon the completion of its mission. Whatever operating agency or agencies complete the development of resources in the Susquehanna Basin, this initial period of planning will be required. No time will have been lost, and, in my judgment, much time will have been gained through this procedure. I am, therefore, extremely anxious that a Susquehanna Watershed Commission be created at an early date so that it may make direct and practical use of these materials in what I firmly believe can be a landmark in our approach to the development of resources in our smaller watersheds and with particular advantage at once to the distressed economic areas of northeastern Pennsylvania.

For generations this kind of planning for this area has been talked about but no one has ever done anything about it. Now I have done something about it by introducing this series of bills, the last of which is this bill so that we may have before us a carefully planned and worked out short- and long-range program to meet and solve one of the greatest economic problems in the Nation.

Foreign Policy of Truman Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it becomes more difficult each day to follow the meanderings of the Truman administration foreign policy.

With thousands of our boys actively fighting the Communists in Korea, and hundreds of thousands more being called to military duty because of the Communist threat to freedom throughout the world, our State Department and the Chief Executive call upon Congress not to place any limitations upon nations receiving our financial aid.

The continuing practice of ECA countries supplying Russia with materials necessary to the prosecution of a war denotes a shameful disregard for the lives of our forces in Korea. Yet Congress is reluctant to take a forceful stand and write into law a prohibition of aid to any such nation. Is the thirst for profits so great that we will sacrifice lives of young Americans for it? It is the duty of Congress to override administration policy and cut off financial aid to any nation supplying Russia with goods which aid the Soviet war potential.

The people of America remember too well the pre-World War II policy of shipping scrap iron to Japan, which was returned in the form of bombs. While we are not directly aiding Russia, our money is enabling other countries to do it.

Appended is a letter from one of my constituents which sets out very well the fears of the citizens in this regard. The people of the United States want both direct and indirect economic aid to Russia stopped. They want a revision of trade policies wherein we support slave labor in Russia, and at the same time supply American dollars which build up the Communist war machine.

Evidence that labor groups are concerned as well with the failure of the administration to stop transshipment of war matériel to Russia is contained in the following column of Victor Riesel entitled "Inside Labor." The above-mentioned letter and Mr. Riesel's column follow:

SOUTHBURY, CONN., September 12, 1950.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I should like to explain to you my opinion regarding our present foreign policy toward Russia and the satellite states.

It appears to me that our attitude toward Russia is split into two distinct departments; i. e., the diplomatic and the economic—the end result is that our foreign policy consists of little more than lip-service to democracy—a poor, weak front against communism.

Our statesmen decry communism and we read daily in our newspapers of the evils of this system—yet we indirectly support this system by trading with Russia. I understand that we are sending material vital to Russia's war machine to her. Must we wait until the Russians establish a beachhead on the New England coast before an embargo is placed on those goods which make the Russian war machine more powerful?

It seems rather ridiculous that the American people must pay increased taxes to defend this country against communism while fellow citizens are enjoying profits made from building up the very same machine that we are preparing to fight. It is my opinion that there are war profiteers in the United States at this very moment—though they may not be making goods for Uncle Sam.

Furthermore, we import goods from Russia and, in this way, not only indirectly support communism; but we also support slave labor, threaten the American economy, and pour much-needed American dollars into Russia. For example, we are and have been, for some time, importing furs from Russia. It is known that these furs are produced under slave-labor conditions. Because of this and because Russia is badly in need of American dollars, these furs are sold on the American market at a much lower price than domestic furs—thus threatening the businesses of American fur growers, many of whom are disabled veterans who were advised to go into fur farming by the United States Government.

I realize that President Truman likes to leave the door open a crack should Russia decide to talk peace—but there are certain materials which we should not be allowed to export to Russia under the present existing world conditions.

Thus far, this problem has received little publicity from either the press, the radio, or Congress. I understand there have been a few attempts to introduce this problem to the Congress and they have failed. The longshoremen's union tried to prevent Russian goods from entering this country and were informed by President Truman that it was he who decided the foreign policy. I was much surprised at this news as until then I had labored under the misbelief that the State Department and certain learned men, acting in an advisory capacity—and the President, formed the foreign policy of the Nation. I also vaguely remember something about government of, by, and for the people.

It is my opinion that certain men in this country are powerful enough financially, or politically, to wield influence over the press and the Congress and because of this the significance of this existing situation is being withheld from the American people. These men know that aroused public opinion would force them to act on the issue.

I hope that you are sufficiently concerned about this important problem to do something about it, or at least to bring it to the attention of those who are in a position to do something about it.

Very truly yours,

(S) JEANNE FIELD SPALLONE.
Mrs. Daniel F. Spallone.

ALLIED WAR SUPPLIES AIDING REDS—INSIDE LABOR

(By Victor Riesel)

HOUSTON, TEX.—In a series of private lunches and hotel room parleys, eye-witnesses from across the world have reported that our allies, and even some of our own American merchants and swashbuckling ship owners, are taking Soviet gold for a ghoulish profit on sales of rubber, tin, wool for uniforms, steel, steel rails, munitions-making machinery, chemicals, medicines and cargo space to Russia, Red China and North Korean agents.

These reports, brought here by global labor leaders, moved AFL chief William Green to leaders (gathered here for their sixty-ninth annual convention) to demand a world boycott of all Russian trade.

There can be no doubting this evidence, These men know, for example, that the Chinese Communists have asked the London steel merchants (dominated by the government) to send along prices on 50,000 tons of steel rails for Peiping's Red lines, along which, even now, Communist troops are being moved to the Korean frontier. And London is ready to sell those rails to the Chinese Stalinists.

But the Chinese need not wait that long for allied steel. They're getting (or at least got) tens of thousands of tons of Japanese steel from Yahata, in Kyushu, in exchange for coal from mines owned by British and Chinese. The British conceal the destinations of the metal—and our military authorities in Japan are now too concerned with Korea to police the delivery of this special steel.

Other war materials are moving into Soviet ports, by shuttle, from Ceylon and Malaya, in that area, as well as Hong Kong. British merchants have openly boasted—and the labor representatives here can prove it—that they will sell to anyone with gold and American dollars. The Soviets have plenty of both.

From these steaming oriental areas, the Soviets are getting at least 50 percent of the rubber supply for their rolling guns, trucks, tanks, and other automotive weapons and transport systems. And the labor men here say American freighters are specially chartered for the run between these ports of our allies and Soviet docks.

And from Big Tom Dougherty, that lovable giant leader of the Australian Workers Union, I have personal evidence that the Russians are buying millions of pounds worth of Australian wool from Aussie brokers. They peddle the world's best wool—most of it from herds so carefully bred that the Australian Government won't permit the rams to be exported to any other nation. This wool is being woven and cut into millions of Soviet uniforms.

After listening to Bill Green's demand for a boycott of the Soviet, similar to that slapped on the Japs and Nazis years ago, Dougherty came off the convention floor and told me he's returning to Australia to demand that his government halt all shipments to Russia and its satellites. If the government rebuffs him, Dougherty will call out on strike the 40,000 members of his huge union who ride the Australian range and process the wool itself.

Dougherty added that he and his New Zealand colleagues, also with us at the moment, would try to influence the entire East to cripple all potential war shipments—and these include oil and aircraft parts to Red China via Hong Kong.

Only the British labor delegates here seem oblivious to the bitter demand that they force their government to stop dealing with the Soviet. The English attitude is that they must sell machine tools to Russia because there are some things they must get from Russia—and machine tools are the only thing Russia wants in return from the British. It is recognized by the expert workers here that London's claim, that only nonstrategic tools are being sent, is sheer deceiving nonsense. There are 230 kinds of machine tools, and absolutely no machine tool of any kind is without strategic value, I've just been informed by a Midwest industrialist.

But the Australian and New Zealand labor people are determined to put the heat on their British labor colleagues.

As for payment for all this material (except the tools) the Russians have ample dollars and gold, because we ourselves helped them get it.

The dollars come from American purchases of Soviet materials ranging from furs to timber—and these greenbacks are spread through Asia by such outfits as the Soviet-controlled Czech Trade Commission, which finances Stalinist activity in much of the Orient. The gold comes from Russian mines, now equipped with special digging and refining machinery supplied by us under wartime lend-lease.

Nice dividends we're getting—especially for the kids on those Korean hills.

Views of a So-Called Reactionary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, attacks have been made from time to time upon me, and others holding similar views, because of our publicly expressed advocacy of a philosophy of government which our critics declare to be outmoded. Frequently the critics abstain from discussing issues, and descend to the low practice of name-calling, the resort of the political demagogue. We are called Reactionaries, Old Guard, and similar names, which, through the unceasing efforts of the apostles of the New Deal, have acquired in the public mind a meaning of sinister character.

Only recently, a prominent local Democratic officeholder made such an attack on me.

It would be much more helpful to the public's understanding if the issues themselves could be discussed.

With a critical election about to be held, which may determine the ultimate fate of this country, it seems only fitting that these critics should be answered and the views which I and many others hold should be publicly stated.

This country is by far the richest in the world, with the widest distribution of wealth among the people and the highest standard of living ever known in any country, at any time, in human history. Essential to this success has been a system of government devised by our founding fathers 160 years ago. Our Republic then formed was a union of independent States, and the powers not delegated to the Federal Government by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, were expressly reserved by the Constitution to the States or to the people. The limitations imposed upon the power of the Federal Government were basic to the purpose of the founders of the Republic, and for years the rights and powers of the individual States and their people were zealously guarded and respected.

For a century and a half the American people accepted as true the principles declared in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution that government is instituted by the people, that government is the servant of the people, and that the people must support the government. This concept and its connotation of individual liberty—each man to be free to make of himself all that his ability, his ingenuity, and his industry justify—have made this Nation great.

For the past 17 years, however, the leaders of the New Deal Party, which deceivingly bears the label of the once great Democrat Party, have preached the false doctrine that the people must look to their Government for jobs, for food, for housing, for subsidies, and generally for support from the cradle to the grave. In so doing, they have followed an alien philosophy of government which, as history has demonstrated time and time again, can have but one ending—the complete loss of freedom and the enslavement of the people.

For the past 17 years, these leaders have been following, step by step, a pattern cleverly conceived by European Socialists who have directed their countries down the road to the degradation and despair of the despotic Socialist state. Already we are far advanced on this road. This has been due in large measure to the work of Socialist-minded "intellectuals," who have infiltrated our Government in key positions.

In no case is the term "socialism" used by these planners of our destruction. Instead they speak of the "New Deal," the "Fair Deal," a "planned economy," or the "welfare state," knowing full well that if they should call their objective by its right name, "socialism," they would be promptly thrown out of office by an indignant people.

Working in subtle and devious ways, they have bored within our labor unions, our educational institutions, and even our churches. They have promised and given handouts to one group after another for the purpose of buying their votes. They have encroached steadily upon the rights and powers of the States, and have built up a huge Federal bureaucracy until there are now over 2,000,000 civilian employees on the Federal payroll.

Following the Communist manifesto of Karl Marx, they have used confiscatory income and inheritance taxes to destroy the value of private property, which is the basis of the private enterprise system, at the same time depriving the States of sources of revenue on which they depend.

They have used the taxpayers' money to promote competition by the Government with private enterprise.

Under the guise of rent control they have confiscated the property of landlords for the benefit of tenants, the more numerous voting class.

They have wantonly squandered the taxpayers' money. The Federal debt has increased from $21,000,000,000 in 1933 to over $260,000,000,000 at the present time, thereby causing a drastic increase in the cost of living and endangering the solvency of the Government.

In its lust for power, the New Deal government under Mr. Truman spent in five peacetime years, from July 1, 1945, to July 1, 1950, $214,000,000,000, an amount greater by $34,000,000,000 than the total amount spent by all the 32 previous Presidents in 152 years, from 1789 to July 1, 1941. In 1931 the cost of the Federal Government was $30 for each man, woman, and child. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, it was over $200.

As a part of their scheme these Socialist planners have fostered racial and religious antagonism and have arrayed class against class.

They have extended, by Federal administrative, legislative, and judicial interpretation, the power given Congress in the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce. By so doing, they have subjected nearly all labor, business, and agriculture to Federal regulation and control, and have usurped the power of the States to regulate commerce within their own boundaries.

The goal of these Socialist planners, "Government unlimited, is at once the most diabolical, the most treacherous, and the most uncontrollable force known to man. While man has learned to cope with the forces of nature, he has never yet learned effectively to cope with this force he himself creates." In the language of the late President Woodrow Wilson:

> The history of liberty is the history of limitations upon the powers of government.

And now, in the midst of this chaotic domestic situation, we find this country of ours, within 5 years after the end of World War II, engaged in another war which may ultimately develop into world war III. This is our third war in 31 years, all of them under Democrat administrations. It is a war due wholly to the incredible bungling—to speak mildly—of our Nation's affairs by the New Deal Party which has controlled our national Government for the past 17 years.

Five years ago, at the end of the World War II, we had the most powerful Army and Navy in the world, and we were aided by a powerful British Army and Navy. We were in a position to dictate terms to Russia. We failed to do so, and instead, during the years that followed, President Truman and his administration proceeded to turn over to Russia the control of a large portion of the globe and to allow our own military power to decline to a dangerous low.

In pursuit of its policy of favoring Russia, a policy dictated by its Socialist planners, our Government, under the leadership first of President Roosevelt and then of President Truman, shamefully and dishonorably betrayed our stanch ally, Chiang Kai-shek, and the Nationalist Government of China, and turned China, with its 450,000,000 people, over to the Communist stooges of Moscow. By so doing, it rendered impotent the one power in Asia that could have stopped Russia in her tracks, and by so doing, have prevented the present war in Korea.

By so doing, our Government has placed Russia in a position to obtain control of all Asia, with half the population of the world, and has increased immeasurably her chances of achieving her ambition of world conquest.

As a result of all this, the United States is today in great peril. Even though the Korean war should terminate shortly, nevertheless, barring an early beginning and prompt ending of world war III, this country must for a great many years be subjected to the rigors and controls of a war economy, with millions of its men under arms, with crushing taxes levied to support a huge military establishment, with no hope of relief in the foreseeable future, and with the ever-present terrifying prospect of an inflation, already well advanced, that will destroy the purchasing power of our money and the value of every insurance policy and bank account in the United States.

This is the record of the administration that has ruled this country for 17 years; the most incompetent administration the country has ever known. No honest, sensible person having the slightest familiarity with the facts can arrive at any conclusion other than that the present lot of self-seeking, incompetent politicians be driven from office.

In the language of A. B. Genung, in the Country Almanac of September 1, 1950:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., September 22, 1950.

The American people, on the average, simply have no comprehension of barbarian levels of life, thought, motive or action. * * *

But now, suddenly, incredibly, right here in the middle of the twentieth century, we and our civilization have come up stark against the seething, sinister might of a barbarian world. A world alien, unknown to us. But a world full of brutal, rapacious, predatory, utterly ruthless and savage men. Hordes of them, captained and enslaved by power-hungry tyrants to whom conquest is the one age-old road to enrichment.

It is as though, in a nightmare, the clock had been turned back 700 years and we stared out upon the savage Mongol hordes of Genghis Khan, moving westward like a tide to our destruction. It is monstrous, unbelievable.

But it is a fact. The barbarians of the East are on the move again. A billion of them. Armed, equipped, aflame with the fever of conquest and plunder. * * *

America faces a problem. A very simple problem. It is the problem of survival.

It is largely unaware of this as yet. Nor can any of us guess the time when that first sickening spasm of comprehension and of real fear will sweep across this land. It will. We don't know when. It might even be this month.

We are well-to-do children. And for 18 years we have been fed a patent medicine calculated to lull us, soften us, make self-seeking parasites out of us. We are still being fed the same insidious, enervating stuff, a socialistic opium as deadly in this mad world as though we were all literally being dosed with narcotic. The intent is to make us dependent upon a clique of bureaucrats who will plan our lives for us. And the effects are all about us. We are dependent children, believing in Santa Claus, voting for bigger and better presents, unconscious of all this barbarian menace building up. Such is our legacy from the Roosevelt era. * * *

Our own personal opinion is that when and if we do arouse ourselves, we shall discover that the one first job to be done is to clean out Washington, to cast off that incubus of weak, pandering, selfseeking leadership and put men at the head who knows the worth and meaning of the real American system. * * *

Even then the problem will be one of survival.

It is later even than the most alert ones thought.

Defends Lobbies for United States Aides

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, in the September 21, 1950, issue of the Washington Times-Herald, our colleague and distinguished member of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, Mrs. KATHERINE ST. GEORGE, appeared as a guest columnist.

The views of Mrs. ST. GEORGE are always timely. I am sure the Members of the House will be interested in her statement. It follows:

DEFENDS LOBBIES FOR UNITED STATES AIDES

Just as it is a fact that the Members of the House of Representatives are the people in Government who are the closest to the people, because they are all up for election every 2 years and therefore have to be ever in close touch with their own districts, so it is also true that of all the committees of Congress, the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is in closer touch with the everyday lives of a great cross-section of our country.

The civil-service roster of the United States is now tremendous, including as it does, approximately 2,000,000 persons, from the humblest clerks to top executives. Besides these the committee has the Post Office Department and its affairs to care for. Here we have a giant business in which 500,000 employees are working and handling over $1,000,000,000 annually.

Nothing is closer to the people than the Post Office Department. In some parts of the country it is the main contact that people have with the Federal Government, and the local postman is indeed the representative, and in the majority of cases an excellent one, of the Government of the United States.

Now these people all have problems, the principal one being how to balance their budgets in these days of rising prices, and next, how to obtain security when their working days are over.

FEW CONGRESSMEN ARE OVERPAID

Congress has increased salaries in the last 4 years all along the line, and that includes Cabinet officers and others in the executive branch, notably the President.

The Congress has not, however, increased the salaries of its own Members, and I mention that because it is fashionable in some quarters to say that Congressmen are overpaid.

I know very few of whom this could be said, but my suggestion would be that if there are some who do not earn their hiring, you can always replace them by others who will, because going to Congress is like love, you cannot make it unpopular.

There is a great deal of talk and adverse criticism these days of the activities of lobbies and lobbyists and they now have to be registered and duly accounted for, with a statement as to salaries and whom they are working for.

The civil service employees and postal employees are represented by members of their respective organizations who may well be classed as lobbyists, who present their cases before the committee and visit members in their offices to talk over the various bills before them.

I have never agreed with the opposition to lobbying, because it seems to me to be a very important part of the American philosophy of government. The idea is embodied in the first article of the bill of rights where the people are guaranteed the right of petition.

Our country is now so vast, and our population so large, that it stands to reason that in many instances it would be difficult for them to come in person to petition Congress, although they still have that right and exercise it frequently to this very day.

It is, however, simpler, in most cases, for people in a similar profession or career to designate one of their own members to represent them and their interests with the appropriate committees of Congress, and it also stands to reason that this individual must be paid for his work and time. There is nothing to criticize in this practice which is a natural outgrowth of representative government. It is objected that through these lobbies, legislation is often influenced. Why not? Surely one of the cornerstones of our Republic is that the Government belongs to the people and they surely are the ones to influence it through their Representatives, or in person.

PEOPLE TO BLAME FOR FEDERAL FAULTS

The other side of this is that the people themselves are directly to blame for the kind of government they have in this country. In other words, when you complain of waste, extravagance, and red tape—and you have good reason to complain of all three—stop and ask yourself what you personally have done to correct this situation.

If you are perfectly honest with yourself you will have to admit that you are against waste, extravagance, and red tape for everyone and every organization except your own.

Here again we try to remove the mote in our brother's eye while leaving the beam in our own. This is human nature, but it does not help the cause of good government.

If we are to progress we must keep striving for liberty and justice for all, and not simply for ourselves and our immediate group.

Now that so many of our people are in civil service and Government employ there is a rising desire for more measures that will insure security.

This is natural because no one can get very rich in Government service; in fact, it is well-nigh impossible to lap up anything for sickness and old age, and for that reason legislation that will provide for these things is constantly brought before the committee and passed into law.

It is safe to say that there is more security in civil service and Government employ today than in any other kind of work.

But there is not the opportunity to make a fortune that the private individual can have if he is willing to take the risks without which no great success can ever be achieved.

CSC SHOULD PROVIDE SUPREME COURT

Great progress has been made in protecting the rights of employees in the matter of separation from the service.

It is my feeling that the Civil Service Commission should be a final court of appeal or supreme court, if you will, and that any employee may have the right to go before them for a final appeal if he or she does not believe a fair hearing has been provided in the department.

The commission would thus be in close touch always with all departments and a real living organization to the employees.

As our Government gets bigger and bigger we must guard against allowing the various boards and commissions in the executive branch to become a little group of untouchable and unapproachable Olympians, above and beyond the reach of average mortals. They must come down to earth and play their part in the rough-and-tumble of the arena.

This is one of the many dangers of big government: That it gets away from the people and then becomes their master instead of their servant. George Washington said: "Government is not reason, it is not eloquence. It is a force: Like fire, it is a dangerous servant and a fearful master."

This is a true saying and one to be followed and heeded.

The committee has, of course, been deeply concerned about eliminating bad security risks, subversives and Communists in Government. This is a most serious problem today and one that should not be handled in a namby-pamby, sentimental manner.

We have suddenly decided to fight communism all over the world and yet we are slow to eradicate Communists in our own Government. It is said that there are very few subversives and Communists in the departments of Government. The answer to that is that there should be none.

MORE COMMIES HERE THAN IN EARLY U. S. S. R.

Reliable sources, notably the FBI, tell us there are more Communists in the United States than there were in Russia before they took over that country. There is absolutely no excuse for coddling such enemies of the Nation.

I think I can truly say that the present Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is fully aware of this and is guarding the American philosophy of government and the rights of our people, most jealously.

This committee is also very free from partisanship and the committee votes are rarely along party lines.

This is due to the splendid leadership we have in our chairman, TOM MURRAY, of Tennessee, and our ranking minority member, EDWARD H. REES, of Kansas, who work well together and instill a spirit of fair play and cooperation in the whole committee.

We also are fortunate in that we in this committee are near to the people and as we pursue our way, no doubt making mistakes at times, we have the knowledge that we are working with 2,000,000 men and women in civil service and 500,000 postal employees who are, by and large, as fine a group of patriotic Americans as can be found, and that we are all working together for a better America and the preservation of our great Republic.

The Monster Hoarder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am having many letters from my district from housewives asking me why it is that prices of necessities, such as food, are so high, and the cost constantly increasing.

This is not difficult to answer in very plain language. Speaking generally, it is because of the inordinate waste of the New Deal, and its total disregard of the necessities of the overburdened taxpayers, the depreciation of the dollar under deficit financing, the hoarding by the Government of the necessities of life, and the Truman war.

To put the whole matter, so far as necessities are concerned, in understandable and popular language, I am inserting as part of my remarks an article by George Dixon which appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald under date of September 20, 1950:

WASHINGTON SCENE

(By George Dixon)

Ever since President Truman delivered his fireside chat I have been waiting impatiently for him to begin taking his own advice.

Our steadfast and peerless leader came out sternly against hoarding. He inveighed against housewives who buy up more than they need. He said:

"Every American housewife must not buy more than she needs. She must put off buying whenever she can. If the housewife insists on buying more than she needs, there will not be enough to go around, and prices will go up."

The President explained that hoarding only brings on inflation and scarcity.

It goes without saying that our infallible leader is right in what he says about hoarding. Would that he could only be as right about what he does.

Naturally, every American abhors hoarding. We loathe and despise that bloated Mrs. Potts who has 10 pounds of butter stashed away in her deep freeze. She is un-American. But, Mr. President, I know a hoarder who is hoarding 192,000,000 pounds of butter.

That nouveau riche Mrs. Helfer Eaton has almost a whole cheese weighing 20 pounds. She loves to pick at it between meals, the fat pig. But this other hoarder has 106,100,000 pounds of cheese.

I am pretty sure you are catching on to whom I mean, Mr. President, which is all right because I am not trying to keep you in suspense. But we will proceed, without definite identification, for a minute.

Nobody in our block is speaking to that stuck-up Mrs. Harpy. She has three 100-pound bags of potatoes in her cellar. We hope they sprout and she has potatoes growing through her floor. But, Mr. President, she is just an amateur. This other hoarder has bought 5,443,000 bags of potatoes, each weighing 100 pounds.

But he's done something even more abominable, Mr. President. He decided he had too many potatoes, even for him, and ordered nearly 80 percent of those 5,443,000 hundred-pound bags destroyed.

There's a creature up the street a piece from us, whose name we won't even mention because she is just plain sickening, who stocked up her cupboard until it is near busting with cans of that Mexican canned beef. She must have 50 cans if she's got a can. But this other hoarder has 68,891,113 cans of the same Mexican canned beef.

There seems to be no limit to the staggering amounts of food this hoarder will hoard and watch go bad rather than let any American eat it. He is the biggest hoarder in all history.

As of this last week he had a few other odds and ends of food put away, such as 80,952,918 pounds of dried eggs (the equivalent of 242,858,754 dozen eggs in the shell); 320,700,000 pounds of dried milk (the equivalent of 1,635,180,000 quarts as substracted from the cow, or 11 quarts for every man, woman and child in the country).

As I said before, Mr. President, I am not trying to build up any suspense. This monster hoarder is your own administration.

World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL F. WHITE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, a lady who lives in my home town recently had published in our largest newspaper a letter which, while intending to be helpful to the cause of world peace, contained some statements which I feel were inspired by someone with an ulterior, political motive. The letter had to do with a proposal I made for world peace in 1940. The subject of world peace, Mr. Speaker, is too important to be trifled with and I have written an answer to that letter which I wish to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that all the people of central California may have all the facts. The answer is as follows:

EDITOR OF THE BEE.

SIR: Please refer to the letter of Mrs. M. Z. regarding my booklet, A World United.

The lady apparently overlooked the provision on page 2 of my booklet which reads: "A senate composed of two senators from each member nation." Some people have been creating the impression that I proposed representation in the world peace authority on the basis of population only. That is not true, as you will see from the provision for two senators from each nation.

My proposal for a world peace authority like the United Nations is simply to provide a world authority on the same basis as our own National Government is constructed. I think American democracy is the best form of government in the world and I want to see it extended throughout the world to stop these world wars and to stop communism.

Apparently the opposition objects to the spreading of American democracy to a world-wide basis to maintain world peace. That is all I proposed in my booklet and they seem to object to it.

With regard to the immigration clause in my booklet, which the opposition has criticized, the copyrighted edition contains the clause, "subject to the approval of the receiving nation," and I have a photostatic copy of the copyrighted edition from the copyright office to prove it. This knocks into a cocked hat the claim that I advocate impractical immigation laws.

If we only give American money and economic aid to individual foreign nations, we do nothing to promote a permanent world peace organization. If we offer military and economic aid to the United Nations as a united world peace organization, we build a permanent world peace authority, and I am for it.

I would not quibble about unimportant details of a booklet I wrote in 1940 advocating a world peace authority. I would not quibble about the unimportant details of a world peace plan now. To show my latest thinking and effort in connection with world peace, I introduced a resolution in Congress on June 7, 1949, along with 82 other Congressmen, both Republicans and Democrats. This resolution is stripped of all details and deals with the irreducible minimum of elements in order to eliminate details which might be subject to controversy. It reads as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That it is the sense of the Congress that it should be a fundamental objective of the foreign policy of the United States to support and strengthen the United Nations and to seek its development into a world federation open to all nations with defined and limited powers adequate to preserve peace and prevent aggression through the enactment, interpretation, and enforcement of world law."

Let us build the United Nations into a real organization for peace by eliminating the veto and by expanding the present United Nations army (now under General MacArthur) into a force large enough to maintain peace in the world. If Russia does not want to go along, then we would at least have all the other most powerful nations of the world allied together against Russia to insulate the free world against aggression and communism.

I fought in two wars and my sons are now enlisted for this one. I am sick and tired of war. I wrote that booklet in 1940 hoping to help bring about a world authority like the United Nations with an international army to maintain world peace, and I am glad the same general pattern has been followed in the formation of the United Nations. The main reason I ran for Congress was to do what I can to bring about a permanent organization for world peace. If such a world peace authority is finally successful, it may save my two little grandsons from becoming cannon fodder some day, and save civilization from virtual extinction.

Appropriations for the Eighty-first Congress, First and Second Sessions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting a table showing the appropriations for the Eighty-first Congress, first and second sessions, together with the requests from the budget, the House action, the Senate action, the Public Law, and the increases of the second session over the first session. In addition, I am showing the contract authority which has been granted.

The total amount which has been made available as a result of the direct appropriations is $52,540,855,488. This represents an increase over the first session's appropriations of $14,715,829,277. With the single exception of civilian foreign aid, where there is a large reduction, every item shows an increase. Tentative decreases are shown in the Labor-Federal Security and Treasury-Post Office items, but these are explained because of a reorganization which transferred the General Services Administration to the independent offices bill, and there is an item of a reduction caused by a failure to use the funds appropriated last year for railroad-retirement benefits in the Labor-Federal Security bill.

The contract authorizations are less than last year by $2,100,000,000.

The worst part of the whole situation is that the civilian activities of the Government have gone up by tremendous leaps. There has evidently been a throttling of the expenditures for the armed services, because the only set-up that shows an increase, in spite of our foreign situation in the period since the 1st of July 1950, is the Air Force which shows an increase of $596,000,000. The Army itself shows a decrease of $687,000,000. The Navy shows a decrease of $190,000,000.

Expenditures for the fiscal year ended June 30 were $40,166,000,000 and the receipts were $37,044,000,000, leaving a deficit of $3,122,000,000. With appropriations available now totaling $52,540,000,000, it is easy enough to see that the expenditure figure of $40,000,000,000 last year is going to be exceeded by a very large amount, even though the first 3 months' expenditure is less than last year.

The expenditures in the last half of the year will increase very markedly, and unless we have large impounding, on the part of the President, of funds in the civilian establishments of the Government—where they are not needed—the deficit is going to be so large as to endanger our debt limit of $275,000,000,000.

The Republican Members of the House have stood very solidly for retrenchment in Federal appropriations for the civilian establishments, where it could be done. We wish we could say that all of our Democratic colleagues had done as well. We are grateful to those who did stand for economy. But it is apparent that unless a Republican Congress is elected, the wasteful operations of the Government will continue on a very considerable scale.

Appropriation and contract authority comparisons excluding permanent and trust fund accounts, borrowing authority, public debt transactions, reappropriations, etc.

My Report to the Indians of the Ninth District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, northern Minnesota is the home of the Chippewa Indian and much of the Indian population is concentrated in Minnesota's Ninth District. Therefore, as the Congress nears adjournment, I ask permission to report to them on the legislation that I have introduced on their behalf during the recent months and my other efforts as their representative in Congress.

March 30, 1949: H. R. 3895, a bill to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Minnesota Chippewa Tribe.

The purpose of this bill is to declare title to approximately 28,554 acres of land purchased by the United States in connection with the Flat Lake and Twin Lakes Indian demonstration projects in Minnesota, to be held by the United States in trust for the Minnesota Chippewa Tribe of Indians.

It also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to proclaim this land as an addition to the White Earth Reservation. The chief purposes of the Flat Lake and Twin Lakes demonstration projects were to supply a place for homes for Indians; furnish the Indians a place to grow gardens; furnish the Indians a source of fuel; and to bring the whole area under Indian control in order to achieve an economical system of land use for the lands now owned by the Indians.

This measure was approved by the House of Representatives on June 20, 1949, and is now pending in the Senate.

October 4, 1949, per capita payment: H. R. 6319, a bill to authorize a $100 per capita payment to members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians from the proceeds of the sale of timber and lumber on the Red Lake Reservation.

This bill would authorize the payment of a $50 per capita payment to be made upon the passage and approval of this act and the second installment of $50 per capita to be made January 15, 1951, and is similar to the measures I introduced previously which authorized and provided capita payments.

My measure was approved by the House of Representatives on June 5, 1950, and was pending in the Senate until August 23 when it was taken up but not passed. On September 13, 1950, the Senate passed my bill in greatly changed form. Through my efforts and contacts and following out my desires, the House conferees insisted on the more desirable provisions of my bill. However, the Senate held out for the reduced payment of $75 instead of $100 as provided in my bill, H. R. 6319. The payments were divided with $37.50 to be paid this fall, and $37.50 during the winter.

June 30, 1950: H. R. 9017, a bill to promote the rehabilitation of the bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, located on the Red Lake, White Earth, Greater Leech Lake, Bois Fort or Nett Lake, Mille Lac, Fond du Lac, Grand Portage, and Vermillion Lake Indian Reservations, and for other purposes.

The purpose of this bill is to provide a long-range program of rehabilitation which shall include off-reservation employment and adjustments related to such employment.

This proposal would authorize to be appropriated the sum of $15,000,000 for the establishment of a revolving fund to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act. Consideration and action on this legislation will come following reports of the House committee referred to in the next paragraph.

March 20, 1950: House Resolution 525, a resolution calling for the creation of a committee in the House of Representatives to investigate and study the rehabilitation needs of the Chippewa Indians located on the Red Lake, White Earth, Greater Leech Lake, Bois Fort or Nett Lake, Mille Lac, Fond du Lac, and Grand Portage Reservations, with special attention to be given to the following projects:

First. Development of industrial and business enterprises.

Second. Development of off-reservation employment.

Third. Surveys of physical and human resources.

Fourth. Development of agricultural opportunities.

Fifth. Development of educational opportunities, including loans for educational purposes.

Sixth. Hospital buildings and equipment, and other health-conservation measures.

Seventh. Establishment of a revolving loan fund for establishment of business; home and land improvements; for the purchase of machinery, stock, and other farming equipment; and for the purpose of building new tribal enterprises.

Eighth. Construction and maintenance of roads, trails, and so forth.

Ninth. Housing and necessary facilities and equipment.

Tenth. Water and sewerage systems and other common service facilities.

A congressional committee is now working on these suggestions and is expected to report to the next Congress in January.

I am convinced that a comprehensive long-range program for the rehabilitation of the Chippewa Tribe of Indians is essential. The handling of the situation by Washington had its mistaken start long ago and it is time for the Government to meet the situation squarely and effectively.

SURPLUS FOODS

During the past year I have been in frequent contact with the United States Department of Agriculture, urging them to distribute surplus commodities to the Indians of Minnesota. They have distributed $66,376 worth of foods. However, I feel that the amount distributed is not nearly sufficient in view of the great needs of the Indians themselves and the great surpluses of food which are available. I am now seeking a greater distribution of surplus foods for this coming winter.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this report has given the native Americans of my district a clear picture of my efforts on their behalf during the Eighty-first Congress. I am an adopted member of the Red Lake Band of the Chippewa Tribe, my Indian name being "Gi-gi-go-we-ne-ne."

I want to assure all of the Indians of my fullest interest, cooperation, and help relative to their personal as well as tribal problems. I ask them to write to me or personally see me at any opportunity concerning any matter they may have on which I can possibly be of service and assistance.

Daughters of the American Revolution Opposed to Any Form of World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including a forceful, concise statement of the position taken by the great patriotic organization, the Daughters of the American Revolution, which opposes any form of world government which would include the United States. I commend it to the attention of every Member. It follows:

The National Society Daughters of the American Revolution is against any form of world government because:

1. The mere writing of a constitution, the passing of a law or the declaration of pious phrases about peace will not compel peoples to live in harmony.

2. Lack of a common cultural heritage, common language, traditions, religion, and law among prospective members of a world federation would prevent a community of interests.

3. With less than 7 percent of the world population in the United States, the surrender of our national sovereignty to a world governing body will forfeit our liberty, free enterprise and independence to the dictates of this governing body.

4. Forfeiture of sovereignty means forfeiture of our right (again with only 7 percent of the population in our county) to decide what taxes we shall pay and how they shall be spent. Authority of a world governing body to tax all citizens according to ability to pay would be disastrous to the citizens of the United States who enjoy the highest standard of living in the world today.

5. Any form of disarmament and the substitution of a world police force in which your husbands, sons, daughters, and perhaps you, would serve at the dictates of this body would subject this country to domination of the Communist Party, consider the population of Russia, Siberia, the countries behind the iron curtain, Communist China and the subversive groups in all other countries, ready to take over when the moment is ripe. International wars would become civil wars and we would be undefended, having no United States Armed Forces.

6. Concentration of power in a world government would provoke rather than prevent wars. Basic causes of wars are not political but population pressures, unequal distribution of resources, ambitions of dictators and idealogical crusades.

7. Abolishment of the laws of immigration would permit the free movement of all peoples. Every country except one has oversubscribed its immigration quotas to this country for years to come. These people would swarm our shores jeopardizing the economy of the United States with its high wage levels and industrial production.

8. World courts of law over which we would have little or no control would wipe out our system of justice.

9. Inability of these intellectual idealists to agree among themselves upon the form of a world government proves the impracticability of their propaganda. There are some 30 groups, each with a different plan being preached to and believed by many well-meaning earnest people, including a few Congressmen and Senators. Check on yours.

10. The Department of State, the United Nations officials and practical political scientists reject the idea of world government.

KATHARINE G. REYNOLDS,
(Mrs. Bruce D. Reynolds),
National Chairman, National Defense Committee.

FRANCES BARRETT LUCAS,
(Mrs. James C. Lucas),
Executive Secretary, National Defense Committee.

This Question of Bigness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to direct your attention and that of the other Members to an excellent article discussing the matter of bigness in business which is featured in the September 1950 issue of the magazine Steelways.

This splendid article concerning a matter of vital national interest is entitled "This Question of Bigness," and was written by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Delaware, JOHN J. WILLIAMS. I am sure that you will find, as I have, that this article by Senator

WILLIAMS is an interesting, informative, and eminently fair discussion of a matter in which there is widespread public interest.

The article by Senator WILLIAMS which appeared in Steelways follows:

THIS QUESTION OF BIGNESS—WHEN THE WHOPPING FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS BIG BUSINESS, IT'S TIME TO TAKE THE CASE TO THE CUSTOMER

(By Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, of Delaware)

We seem to be about ready to rewrite Horatio Alger in this country. It was all very well for Mr. Alger's characters to struggle up the ladder by their own efforts and to wind up being great successes. But, in the light of the political philosophy extant today, there is some doubt as to just how big a success the hero ought to be. Perhaps he should level off somewhere down the line, at a point to be determined by a suitable committee of critics. Otherwise, he is bound to antagonize somebody.

In the business world, at any rate, nothing succeeds like success when it comes to inviting the displeasure of Washington, D. C. Corporations that have successfully developed and sold their products to an increasing number of satisfied customers now find themselves on the mat because they have grown too large in the process. A report recently issued by the Joint Committee on the Economic Report likens the steel industry to a public utility, saying that it is of such size that the Government should have a hand in fixing its prices and in guaranteeing competition among companies. In the House of Representatives, a Special Subcommittee on the Study of Monopoly Power is eyeing du Pont, General Motors, General Electric, steel, and others on the assumption that their magnitude is inherently wrong.

Neither committee has produced any tangible evidence to show that big business has harmed its competitors, the buying public, or small business. The evidence—and much of it is the Government's own figures—points the other way. But by innuendo, inference and assumption, the idea has arisen that—because monopolies are often big business—big businesses must be monopolies. On that logic, we should certainly be obliged to state that all birds are owls, since it is common knowledge that all owls are birds.

This is not to say that every corporation is a model of respectability. But we do know that our present industrial structure has won a war and gone on to give us the most prosperous years we have ever known. Before we carve that structure into some other image, let us examine it on its economic and not its political merits, without recourse to the witch-hunter's technique of prejudging the case.

Is there, for example, any sound reason for an industry to grow large—apart from the fact that it is bound to do so if it can satisfy the wants of large numbers of customers?

In my home State of Delaware is the headquarters of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.—biggest chemical concern in the United States. On Capitol Hill, du Pont is considered by some to be an undesirable concentration. It is indeed a concentration of money, research men and managerial skills. To what purpose?

Well, take the case of nylon—which du Pont sells as a raw material for further processing as it does with 88 percent of its products. Nylon did not exist 20 years ago. As Crawford Greenewalt, president of du Pont, pointed out to the Subcommittee on Monopoly Power, basic research on the product began in 1928. Not until 1940 was the first commercially made pound of it ready for sale. In the meantime, according to Mr. Greenewalt, du Pont had spent $27,000,000 on development—$27,000,000 gambled on an untried, unknown product.

If there were no large corporations capable of making such an investment in research in hard cash, would there have been nylon? Certainly any small business which wanted to undertake such a development would have to assemble an enormous staff and enormous financial backing—i. e., it would have to become a large business.

Nylon is just one story. Testimony by steel companies brought out the fact that a single big continuous rolling mill for rolling sheet steel would cost a minimum of $50,000,000 to build today, while a complete plant capable of turning out 5,000,000 tons of ingots yearly would take more than $1,000,000,000 of capital. General Electric points to annual losses ranging up over $400,000 on its kitchen-sink disposal during the 19 years since research began.

Small business cannot undertake ventures of this kind. Bigness we must have. Bigness is sired by sheer necessity—the necessity for efficiency and economy of operation—and by consumer demand for improved products at a reasonable price. The question then becomes: Does bigness hurt competitors or damage the Nation's small businesses?

Geoffrey Lloyd, Britain's wartime petroleum secretary, once remarked, "I think we wouldn't have won the battle of Britain without 100 octane."

He was speaking of aviation fuels, natural and synthetic, that gave the RAF a performance edge over the luftwaffe in air combat. The story of those fuels goes back to 1916 when Charles F. Kettering and a small research team began studying auto engine knock in a vacated Dayton, Ohio., tobacco warehouse.

That study, which used up millions of dollars and involved the resources of General Motors research laboratories, not only produced tetraethyl lead, which limited knock in auto engines, but also touched off an exhaustive study of the molecules that make up fuel and paved the way for synthetics.

The wartime role of 100 octane only dramatized what this immense General Motors research program accomplished for aircraft. Beyond that it opened the way for engineers to develop new auto and truck engines that in the past 20 years have become 30 percent more efficient than the engines of the 1920's. And for the entire industry—not General Motors alone—the end isn't yet in sight.

Engineers predict that, with further fuel development, future high-compression engines will travel as much as 30 percent farther on a gallon of gasoline than they travel today. This will save the motorist's money and help conserve the Nation's petroleum resources.

General Motors' know-how in fuel and engine technology, requiring immense outlays of money, brains, and materials, has been made available to the entire internal-combustion engine and petroleum industries—for autos, trucks, aircraft, farm tractors or any other device that operates with a spark ignition. Moreover, much of this experience and development was ground work for the two-cycle Diesel program, which today is revolutionizing the railroads. Many manufacturers in these fields are, of course, in direct competition with GM.

As for the lot of small business, it is worth recalling Mr. Greenewalt's testimony about the $49.95 nylon dress. Du Pont sells the nylon staple for such a dress for $1.92. The difference goes entirely to smaller business—the spinners of the yarn, the throwsters who twist it, the weavers, the finishers, the designers and cutters, and the retail store that sells the dress. While Washington laments their fate, I dare say small businesses like these find things rather to their liking.

There is considerable muttering about monopoly in steel, too. In this industry there are more than 200 companies, according to American Iron and Steel Institute. It is a matter of record that the three largest companies owned 56.3 percent of our steel-making capacity in 1949 as against 58 percent in 1939. It is also a matter of record that the largest company, which produced two-thirds of our steel at the turn of the century, now produces about one-third. Even if these facts did not make an allegation of monopoly look pretty thin, the performance of the steel industry—if it is monopolistic—has been strangely out of character.

Monopolies traditionally tend to hold down production in order to create a scarcity and so keep up prices. Yet, I understand from steel's testimony before the Subcommittee on Monopoly Power that the industry has normally had, over the last 50 years, more capacity for steel making than the public required. In the half century, the public called for an average of only 70 per cent of what the industry was prepared to make—though of course there were temporary scarcities engendered by two wars and two postwar periods. No same businessman would have on hand production facilities capable of meeting immediately a pent-up postwar demand, unless he wanted to see those facilities lie idle for many years to come.

Historically, monopolies also tend to sit tight on the status quo, since there is no need to underwrite research and develop better products in order to take the play away from competitors. Yet you do not have to be a steel man to see steel cars on the highway, "tin" cans in the kitchen, stainless steels in the food processing business—each of which was brought to its present excellence by competitive research, each of which has coincidentally opened up new fields of enterprise for hundreds of thousands of small steel fabricators.

If what is called monopoly or concentration has been at work in this country, it is hard to explain why the 1,660,000 businesses which existed in 1900 have grown to 4,000,000 today—a percentage increase far greater than that of the population. Even the much maligned A. & P. Co. finds itself competing against 30,000 more individually owned grocery stores than there were 10 years ago, and against 275 food chains which did not exist 10 years ago. On the other side of the coin, some of the industrial giants of 1900 have fallen by the wayside over the years.

There is nothing mysterious about the successes or the failures. In the main, they represent the decision of millions of customers as to what products satisfied them and what did not. It is the customers, indeed, who set the apparently suspect policy that like goods shall sell for like prices (since they are not prepared to buy for a dollar here what they can get for 75 cents over there). With the customers sitting in judgment and the law insuring fair play, we have created unparalleled material wealth and prosperity for ourselves.

Lacking any evidence that the relative size of an industry is harmful to the economy, having plenty of evidence that large industry has rendered an enormous service, let's not knock each other down in a wild rush to buy a pig in a poke.

Let us never forget that during the past 300 years our America under our American form of government has developed from a mere infant to the stature of a giant among the nations of the world. In the end, the fact that we have thus survived and grown in stature can be attributed only to our constant belief in and preservation of freedom for men and freedom for enterprise.

Present Democratic Administration Unfair to Dairy Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the State of Minnesota along with other Midwest dairy States, are, and have been, confronted with a serious crisis in connection with the dairy industry and dairy farming.

If the dairy industry in Minnesota and other Midwest dairy States is to survive there must be an end to Federal, State, and municipal barriers and discriminations against interstate shipments of pure milk and cream from the Midwest and against all price discriminations beyond those actually justified by transportation and production costs against Midwest pure milk and cream in Federal milk orders.

The situation is best summed up by Alfred D. Stedman, brilliant associate editor of the Dispatch-Pioneer Press, of St. Paul, in an editorial dated May 14, 1950, when he outlined the gist of the crisis that is facing the Dairy Belt:

1. Midwest dairying is under a severe price handicap compared to seaboard dairying.
2. There's a real migration of Midwest dairying to high-price eastern areas.
3. Rigid Government butter price supports are handing over the Midwest's markets to other areas or products.
4. The effect of all this is to throw the brunt of intense competition on the Dairy Belt.

The figures of the Government offer the best evidence in support of this shift in the activities of the dairy industry. From 1940 to 1949 milk production in the United States as a whole increased 8.8 percent. New York State in the same period increased 15 percent; New Jersey, 18 percent; Pennsylvania, 24 percent; the North Atlantic States as a whole, 13.7 percent; South Atlantic States, 29 percent; and the East North Central, 16.2 percent. In the same period, in spite of the increase in population and the stimulus of war, Minnesota's milk production decreased 1 percent; Iowa, 10 percent; Nebraska, 16 percent; and the West North Central States as a whole are down 4.5 percent.

The dairy farmers in Minnesota and other Midwest States began to notice a decline in their markets early in the war period, and many of them attributed it to labor shortage and other factors incident to the war efforts.

The real effect of losing the commercial outlets was severely felt when many of the fine dairy herds of the Midwest were moved East to swell the supply of milk products to commercial buyers who were formerly customers of the Midwest.

The body blow came with the Government price-support program on butter, which resulted in the disastrous loss of the eastern distributive markets which the Midwest had worked so hard to create and develop as an outlet for their dairy products.

The PMA support program forced producing groups in Minnesota and the Midwest to sell to the Government instead of trade because the prices in the terminal markets are lower than Government support price. It costs 2 cents a pound to ship butter from Minnesota to New York City. Butter made in New York State can go to New York City at a cost of a half cent per pound. It, therefore, follows that New York State-made butter has an advantage over Minnesota of a cent and a half per pound.

The hardest hit under the present PMA support program is the small creameries, including many in the Ninth District of Minnesota. The greater majority of these "small creameries" do not have production capacity to ship in carload lots, and under present PMA regulations they must absorb and pay the freight to place of carlot assembly.

Time and time again I have urged the PMA to modify and change their regulations in regard to their price support on butter, and I have been especially insistent in efforts to aid the small producing creameries. The support price should be f. o. b. the producing plant for carload and less-than-carload lots instead of the terminals. If the present purchase program on butter is continued, it will surely wipe out the small producer in the Midwest dairy belt and eventually the large producers because of the intense competition they are receiving from the eastern producers with their at-hand gigantic channels of consumption for their products.

Mr. Speaker, in order that the dairy farmers of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota may be fully apprised of the present dairy-support program, I am inserting at this point the release of December 22, 1949, by the United States Department of Agriculture, Production and Marketing Administration, relative to the program from January 1950 through March 1951. It is as follows:

USDA ANNOUNCES 15-MONTH DAIRY SUPPORT PROGRAM

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, December 22, 1949.

A program to support farm prices of manufacturing milk and butterfat from January 1950 through March 1951 at national average prices of approximately $3.07 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk of 3.95 percent butterfat (yearly average test) and approximately 60 cents per pound for butterfat was announced today by the United States Department of Agriculture. The program will support the price of all milk.

The support program was announced for the next 15 months so as to extend through the next full marketing year for dairy products. The prices announced are within the range specified by the Agricultural Act of 1949 which requires that farm prices of milk and butterfat be supported at levels between 75 and 90 percent of parity.

The support prices represent about 79 percent of the parity equivalent price for manufacturing milk, as parity is estimated under the new parity formula. (The parity equivalent price for manufacturing milk is 88.5 percent of the United States average parity price of all milk sold by farmers at wholesale to plants and dealers.)

As a means of carrying out this support to dairy farmers, the Department will offer to make carlot purchases of processed dairy products at the following prices, f. o. b. at any location in the United States:

Cheddar cheese, U. S. grade A or higher (cents per pound)	31
Butter, U. S. grade A or higher (cents per pound)	60
Butter, U. S. grade B (cents per pound)	58
Nonfat dry milk solids, spray type, U. S. extra (cents per pound)	12½
Nonfat dry milk solids, roller type, U. S. extra (cents per pound)	10½
Evaporated milk (dollars per case)	3.95

The farm support prices (in dollars and cents) under the new program are approximately the same as the average levels supported during 1949. The percentages of parity support under the two programs differ, however, because of the new parity formula. It is estimated that 79 percent of parity for milk under the new formula is about equal to 90 percent of the old parity price.

In connection with the program, I asked for and received from the Department of Agriculture a few days ago the following data:

Price-support purchases in Minnesota, 1949–50

[Pounds]

	1949	1950 [1]	Total
Butter	23,300,000	26,900,000	50,200,000
Cheese	1,300,000	7,000,000	8,300,000
Milk solids	99,000,000	65,300,000	164,300,000

[1] 1950 figures include purchases January through June.

Minnesota contains 188,952 farms, covering 33,100,000 acres. Its farm people make up 29,300,000 percent of the State population. The available statistics disclose that the farm cash receipts declined considerably in 1949. Cash received from farm products in 1949 totaled about $1,145,055,000, compared with $1,332,313,000 in 1948. According to 1945 census figures, over half of the farmers who receive over 50 percent of their income from dairying live in the Midwest.

The Minnesota Creameries Association informed me in March of this year that their producer groups represent 352 member plants in Minnesota, serving 76,000 farmer producers, so it can be readily seen that the dairy industry is a very important factor in the life and economy of Minnesota.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to assure the dairy farmers of my congressional district that I shall continue to wholeheartedly support legislation and Federal policies that will benefit them and vigorously oppose those measures, regulations, and orders which are detrimental to their interests and welfare. I also invite them to write at any time concerning their Federal problems. My address is: Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, 1405 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., or 205 Post Office Building, Crookston, Minn.

OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an excellent article by Edward W. Allen, of Seattle, entitled "International Aspects of Fishery Conservation." Mr. Allen is chairman of the International Fisheries Commission and vice chairman of the Pacific Fisheries Conference. He is one of the outstanding authorities on the subject with which he deals and I recommend his article to my colleagues. It follows:

INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS OF FISHERY CONSERVATION

(By Edward W. Allen)

The Pacific Northwest can properly claim credit for the greatest progress anywhere in the world in fishery conservation through international cooperation. Although the idea is spreading, even today the International Fisheries Commission, which deals with our coastal halibut, and the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, which deals with the sockeye salmon of this area, constitute the only examples of actual joint international fisheries management.

The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Treaty, the whaling agreement, and the recent treaties entered into by the United States with Mexico and Costa Rica are still in the first stages, and the Great Lakes Treaty has not yet been ratified. To be sure, there have been multilateral pacts such as that dealing with the fur seals besides hundreds of other treaties relating to fisheries, but the two first mentioned are the only ones actually providing a continuous system of joint regulation of a fishery both within and outside of national waters.

The people of this region should take satisfaction in the fact that this method which originated here has met with remarkable success, so much so that the work of these two Commissions has been pointed to throughout the whole fishery world as the outstanding example of how international fishery management can be made practical. This should be borne in mind when considering some of the fantastic schemes which are being proposed as substitutes.

Millions of people today are pitifully hungry and the world population is, nevertheless, rapidly increasing. Whether we view the facts as pessimists or optimists, it must be admitted that there are natural limitations upon land food productivity and that some regions have probably reached that limit and are now declining. Drainage has leached out essential chemical elements and erosion has reduced the quantity of soil in huge agricultural areas.

Some ocean fisheries have also been badly depleted, but they differ from lands from which the soil has been washed away because they can probably be restored by proper management even though the process may be slow and expensive if not applied in time. It also seems reasonably certain that there are substantial fishery stocks which remain almost untapped. As it is, almost 40,000,000,000 pounds of fish are being taken from ocean waters annually. Properly utilized, the enormous food reservoir of the sea may save millions of lives. When one considers relative values, it may well be that the maintenance of wholesome food stocks is more important than building industrial power plants.

But how are we to manage these great marine food reservoirs? That is a mixed question of law and fact. Perhaps our ideas in both respects need reorientation in view of modern developments. Some clear thinking is required so that on the one hand we shall not be hide-bound by legal principles which had their origin in sailing-ship days, and on the other hand, not ignore the cold facts of experience.

Fish appear to be found in all ocean regions—hot and cold, shallow and deep—but there is enormous variation in density, and there can be little doubt but that the bulk of edible fish life is to be found above or adjacent to the continental shelves. In other words, most of the valuable fisheries, though not all, are coastal. These, however, largely extend beyond what Canada and the United States have generally recognized as national waters, that is, waters not more than 3 miles off shore. The law seems to be clear, and there appears to be no inclination to change it in this respect, that a nation has complete control of its fisheries in its inland and territorial waters except to the extent relinquished by agreement.

EXTEND 3-MILE LIMIT

In recent years a strong movement has developed in support of the principle that a nation has a special interest in its coastal fisheries even though they do extend more than 3 miles from shore; in other words, this special interest is not confined to territorial waters.

This movement has been stimulated by two factors. The first is the adverse effect upon a coastal nation's economy if a foreign power sends over its vessels and ruthlessly destroys the coastal nation's fisheries even though not approaching within three miles of shore. This is illustrated by the Japanese threat shortly before the war literally to destroy the highly valuable Bristol Bay Alaska red salmon runs. Similar damage, although perhaps not to the same degree, could be done even now if the Japanese, or any other people, were to engage in unrestricted fishing on Swiftsure Banks off the Strait of Juan de Fuca. The second factor is the success of the International Fisheries Commission in restoring and maintaining the great halibut fishery off this coast which now supplies almost three-fourths of the entire world catch of this delicious fish, much of which fishery extends more than 3 miles out. The recent encouraging results of the Fraser River salmon regulation has also been a contributing factor.

International law, like common law, should not be static, it should develop with changing conditions. Increase and success in the use of this method of bilateral or multilateral management of coastal fisheries may well have its impact upon international law and recognition of propinquous rights.

This still leaves open the subject of what may be termed the open-sea fisheries such as those for tuna and whales. There is now an international whaling agreement with reference to Antarctic whaling, the effectiveness of which remains to be seen. It is a progressive step and may encourage the application of multilateral treaties to other fields.

Nothing referred to is purported to constitute a complete solution of the problem of ocean fishery conservation. Developments have been slow, they have been based upon trial and error, but substantial results have accrued and give promise of even greater future success.

PROPOSED ALTERNATIVES

Now let us consider some proposed alternatives. We find what I trust is a diminishing group, largely of Government economists and professional theorists, who seem to assert that there is some kind of peculiar sanctity to the so-called 3-mile rule so that the only way that any nation should be restrained from destroying another nation's coastal fisheries, as long as territorial waters are not actually penetrated, is by securing the affirmative unanimous agreement of all the nations in the world. In the meantime, our fishermen should sit calmly on the beaches twirling their thumbs while they watch foreigners destroy their livelihood.

On the other hand, some of these same planners or dreamers, whichever you prefer to call them, wish to restrict nations from entering into treaties such as Canada and the United States have done, by making them subject to the proposed International Trade Organization. Before singing the praises of the ITO Charter too loudly, it might pay businessmen to analyze it a bit more carefully than most of them have done.

Then there are some ambitious international bureaucrats who would like to subject all the ocean fisheries of the world to the supervision of the Food and Agriculture Organization, although some of us, anyway, understood that the basic concept of that particular United Nations subsidiary was to help hungry nations develop their own local food supplies for local consumption.

And, of course, one occasionally encounters a domestic fishery official who dislikes to see any jurisdiction get away from him even though his authority is so limited that he is helpless in the international field and hence utterly incapable of coping effectively with the international situations which complicate the management of many coastal fisheries.

CURRENT PACIFIC NORTHWEST FISHERIES PROBLEMS

Now you probably are waiting for something more specific. What are the most imminent international fishery problems of this, our own Pacific Northwest area?

There is, of course, the obscure Russian threat. Thus far I know of no Russian attempt to invade either the Canadian or the United States fisheries. It is true that during the war we deprived our own fishermen of badly needed supplies in order to turn them over to Siberian use to show what good fellows (some of us prefer the term "saps") we were. We also built up the Siberian fleet with the most modern equipment which we refused to our own people. Still, the Russians appear to be so well occupied attempting to develop the Asiatic fisheries which we took away from Japan and donated to Russia, that they do not seem ready to expand in our direction. There are, however, rumors that they are interested in Central Pacific tuna. It is probably as much to Russian interest as to our own to try to get together on some practical working agreement with reference to North Pacific fishing.

The really pressing matter relates to the Japanese. According to newspaper accounts, a peace treaty with Japan may be in the offing.

Prior to the war, the Japanese were said to have one and one-half million fishermen and several hundred thousand fishing boats. It may be stated roughly that they took about one-quarter of the entire world catch. They knew nothing of conservation. They concentrated upon production with apparent indifference to the future and, what was most irritating to other people, without any regard to the effect of their fishing upon the coastal fisheries of other nations.

In view of their methods and low standards of living, it is believed to be commercially practical for the Japanese today, if permitted to do so, to operate off the shores of British Columbia, Alaska, and elsewhere on our side of the Pacific. Fortunately,

General MacArthur has not allowed them to do so. I doubt whether he ever will, but how long he may be in command is another question.

When the so-called MacArthur Fisheries Mission, of which I had the honor to be a member, visited Japan last year to make a fishery survey, its members felt certain that if the Japanese were not in some way restricted they would be off our shores as soon as they could get there. Let me say that all members of the mission left Japan with a friendly feeling toward the Japanese people in general, but this did not blind our eyes to actualities.

It was somewhat significant that in discussing the situation with four members of the fishery committee of the Japanese Diet they all admitted that the Japanese would like to reengage in unrestricted fishery operations throughout the world, but they also admitted that they expected the United States and Canada to insist on some fishing limitations being placed in the peace treaty.

When Japan made her peace treaty with Russia in 1905 there was a definite understanding concerning fisheries. Regardless of whether or not Japan, at that time, took undue advantage of her position as victor, it is not desirable that we should be unreasonable or unfair. On the other hand, there would seem to be no historic reason nor any reason upon the basis of common sense why fisheries should not be dealt with in a practical manner so as to avoid future misunderstandings. Yet there is a strong element in our country, to which I have referred, who seem to think it would be ungentlemanly to insist upon determining fishery policies at this time but that we should sign an unrestrictive peace treaty first so that Japan will be in a position to refuse even to negotiate with regard to fisheries or anything else if she so chooses.

Wholly aside from economics, fisheries are so exceedingly important from the food standpoint that their future maintenance should not be left to chance. Pacific Fisheries Conference, an organization of fishermen's unions, vessel owners' associations, fish-company operators, and research bodies of Alaska, Washington, Oregon, and California, has taken a strong position in this matter. The conference insists that the fishery situation must be dealt with concurrently with the peace treaty with Japan, not left for futile future discussion. This matter is so vital to the entire Pacific coast, as much on one side of the boundary line as on the other, that I have no hesitation in urging upon this body immediate consideration and aggressive action.

News Letter by Frank C. Hanighen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a portion of a news letter, dated September 20, 1950, written by Frank C. Hanighen.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT MERELY GOSSIP
(By Frank C. Hanighen)
MARSHALL

It would take a political seismograph of high sensitivity to register all the electric shocks that the appointment of Marshall has caused. Observers instantly assessed the appointment as a triumph for Acheson and the fellow travelers, but a lapse of days has been required to show how deeply and how seriously these shocks have gone. Americans, despite everything, trust their Government even while they damn it. What else can they trust? But what few vestiges of faith in the Truman Administration yet remained had all but vanished last week. The balloon raising for a quick peace treaty with Japan, no matter what the Russians say, is interpreted as a determination to get rid of MacArthur at whatever cost. (If the United States is at peace with Japan we do not need a Far East High Command.)

The jamming through of an amendment to the National Security Act to permit Marshall's appointment caused a convulsion. Senator JENNER'S speech on September 15 opposing the amendment provided a Senate spectacle of a sort seldom seen. JENNER (Indiana) is an old opponent of the Administration on the Red issue. The amendment released a lot of pent-up feeling from the Hoosier. His speech was like a bellow from a maddened bull. The frustration, the revulsion, the wrath that so many people feel at the limitless capacity of the Administration for welshing and deceit, found expression in this scalding discourse. Discretion was flung to the winds as JENNER screamed out his long list of charges. Despite the luridness of the speech, the core of the JENNER charges—the faithlessness of the Administration—is desperately true. It remains to be seen whether the Republicans as a party have the stamina, the resolution, the resiliency to follow through, not only as political astuteness would dictate, but also as common patriotism demands.

THE GOP AND MARSHALL'S PAST

As a matter of fact, the Republicans rallied to the challenge of the Marshall appointment more strongly than observers had expected (when the news first broke). Many GOP members rubbed their eyes on the morrow of the appointment news and realized the situation facing them: (1) That they had made the far eastern policy of the administration the issue of the coming elections; and (2) that Marshall was one of the principal architects of the disastrous Administration policy on China. How could they support the pro-Marshall legislation or vote for his confirmation, when they would have to attack his record on China in the campaign? At the same time, they recognized that Marshall—thanks to the Fair Deal propaganda machine—had been made a "sacred cow" in the eyes of the bulk of Americans. No little courage therefore dictated the stand of the score of Republicans in the Senate who voted against the legislation providing for Marshall's appointment.

There were a number of southern Democrats who were aware of Marshall's unsound record in the Far East. But the curious psychology which moves these southerners in respect to foreign policy matters apparently forced them into the ranks of the Marshall supporters. Western Republicans watched with disgust as Senator HARRY BYRD, who has quite a following in the North, went down the line in a speech on behalf of Marshall. The question was raised among groups in the Republican cloak room: Can one ever trust the southerners? Certainly BYRD missed a chance to allay the chronic suspicion which western Republicans feel towards colleagues from the South. How can the entente cordiale of southern Democrats and Republicans make any progress (and southern Senators profess to want such progress) with such spectacles as that put on by BYRD?

The case of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, Democrat of Nevada, stood in striking contrast to that of BYRD. MCCARRAN, now up for reelection, showed great courage in lining up with the Republicans against the pro-Marshall legislation. For he faces pressure at home, induced by New York money which has poured into Nevada. And he undoubtedly felt cloak-room pressure as well.

It is now reported that Senator JENNER encountered some of the latter himself. JENNER'S mimeographed speech was circulated in the press gallery some time before he delivered it on the floor, and a copy apparently got into the hands of a certain southern Senator who approached JENNER with the question, "You really don't consider delivering such a speech?" JENNER replied in the affirmative. "Well, then," remarked the southerner, "we'll break you." JENNER retorted, "The people of Indiana won't break me." Meanwhile, Senator LEHMAN, of New York, is reported to have read the advance copy of the speech and to have rushed to Senator SALTONSTALL, Republican, Massachusetts. He is said to have urged SALTONSTALL to reply to JENNER.

All sorts of excerpts from the hardly brilliant record of Marshall in China have been going around. It is recalled that in 1947, in his farewell statement before returning to the United States, Marshall described as reactionary those Chinese who objected to bringing the Communists into a coalition government; that he prated of agrarian reformers, etc. (the line of the pro-Communists in the State Department). Not only did he fail to clean out Communists from the State Department, but it was when he was Chief of Staff that Communists were allowed to be commissioned officers in the Army, and that an attempt was made by officers in the War Department to destroy files on subversives. But it is his China policy which will principally plague him. It is reported that the opposition has Marshall worried. A friend of Marshall's tells us that the general is concerned about his place in history. Will historians look at the Marshall policy on China as does Congressman JUDD, who said: "It always was fantastic to imagine that we could convert our enemies into our friends by treating our friends as if they were our enemies."

Wisconsin and the St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert an article on the increasingly important and long-proposed St. Lawrence seaway project. This article, Wisconsin and the St. Lawrence waterway, appears in the 1950 edition of Wisconsin Labor, the official annual publication of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor. It follows:

WISCONSIN AND THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY
(By H. C. Brockel)

Milwaukee-made oil pipe going by direct steamer from Lake Michigan to Venezuela; powdered milk from Wisconsin farms to Mediterranean ports; Milwaukee-built tractors, cranes, shovels, and machinery of all types flowing to all the ports of northern Europe—all this is not a fanciful dream but a present-day reality. The flow of world trade charted above took place at the Port of Milwaukee during May and June 1950.

The St. Lawrence seaway project is not a romantic dream but a practical fact. Eighty ocean ships will sail from the Port of Milwaukee down the Great Lakes and out the St. Lawrence River to the ports of the world during 1950 in spite of the present physical limitations of the St. Lawrence shipping route.

The port of Milwaukee and the State of Wisconsin are not the only participants in this trade. A vast flow of farm and factory produce from all the States surrounding the Great Lakes is finding its way into world markets through the St. Lawrence River.

The whole economy of the Middle West is intimately tied in with the Great Lakes system. These lakes, one of the world's most important highways of transportation, have made possible the building of an industrial and agricultural empire around their shores as no other nation in the world enjoys. The high standard of living, the high level of production of the farms and factories of the Middle West, is intimately related to the transportation efficiency of the Great Lakes on which every day a vast fleet of ships furnishes the lowest-cost form of transportation known in the world.

Millions of words have been spoken and written about the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. Its meaning to Wisconsin, however, can be reduced to a single phrase. It means job opportunity. Untold thousands of new jobs will be created in Wisconsin following the completion of the seaway project, due to expansion of shipping operations, shipbuilding, and other employment aspects of foreign trade. In our lake ports, the seaway will mean movement of a large volume of new commerce, with added business for railroads, truck lines, stevedores, warehousemen, brokers, bankers, and other enterprises associated with maritime activity. The seaway will act as a magnet to bring new industry to the shores of the Great Lakes with a corresponding increase in employment and production.

Perhaps most important of all, the seaway will enable midwestern producers to meet their competition effectively whether that competition is on the Atlantic seaboard or even overseas. From the experience already derived from direct ocean shipping through the port of Milwaukee, we have concrete proof of the fact that the transportation savings through use of direct ocean steamers make it possible for Wisconsin manufacturers to meet competition of more favorably located competitors. The freight savings by use of direct ocean ships at the port of Milwaukee not only permit us to meet domestic competition, but in several cases made it possible to meet intense competition from European manufacturers located only a few hundred miles from the point of delivery.

Export orders are a most important part of the over-all picture for Wisconsin industry and agriculture. If Wisconsin industry cannot compete effectively in foreign trade, production jobs will decline, the movement of raw materials to Wisconsin plants will dwindle to the injury of the railroad and the trucking industry, and the general prosperity of the State will be adversely affected.

For the Middle West, located 1,000 miles from the nearest seaboard, low-cost ocean transportation is directly translated into job and business opportunities. Although the population of our country has increased by 30,000,000 people since 1920, railroad mileage has been shrinking and it is essential that our national transportation plant be expanded to maintain transportation efficiency. In the 10 years between 1938 and 1948 the mileage of all tracks operated by the steam railroads of this country shrank over 13,500 miles. Although our highway system has been improved, our water transportation facilities have not been increased to the extent necessary to offset the continued shrinkage of our railroad plant.

For the past three decades, America's most distinguished statesmen, diplomats, engineers and business leaders have emphatically answered yes to the question: Should the St. Lawrence seaway be built? Legislation authorizing completion of the project is now before Congress. President Truman, following in the tradition of every President since Taft, has recommended the project urgently to Congress. Twenty distinguished Senators of both major political parties have introduced legislation to authorize execution of our agreement with Canada for the seaway development.

The State Department has given the seaway high place in its international program to demonstrate to the world that nations living side by side can peacefully develop projects whose benefits transcend international boundary lines, and to prove that America is sincerely determined to strengthen international relationships and achieve permanent peace, by peaceful commerce between nations.

The seaway has two great economic justifications—low-cost water transportation and low-cost hydroelectric power. The St. Lawrence is the greatest undeveloped source of hydroelectric power in North America. Two million two hundred thousand horsepower of electrical energy are running unused into the Atlantic because of our failure to harness this tremendous resource. President Truman has emphasized that our whole economic and military future requires further development of our power resources including the vast potential energy of the St. Lawrence.

The States bordering the Great Lakes want the seaway as a transportation resource. By extending deep-draft ocean shipping into lake ports, Midwest farms and industries will be able to use cheap water transportation on a scale hitherto impossible. Industry in the Great Lakes Basin could import raw materials in large quantities, at minimum cost, by substituting a direct water haul for a costly rail haul. Midwest agriculture and industry alike will be able to tap new markets abroad.

There is nothing new or experimental in the seaway project. For more than a century Great Lakes ports have been engaged in direct trade with Europe through the St. Lawrence River. Between 1920 and 1940 a substantial shipping trade developed between lake ports and northern European harbors in spite of the present 14-foot canals in the St. Lawrence River. Briefly interrupted by World War II, direct steamship services between the Great Lakes and Europe have been resumed on a tremendously expanded scale with four ocean steamship lines regularly engaged in the trade and with 80 ocean sailings scheduled for 1950. Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, Toledo, Toronto, and Montreal are now served regularly by these important services with other ports of call included as cargo movement warrants.

The history of the now well-established shipping service between lake ports and overseas destinations proves beyond doubt that large freight savings are possible by use of direct steamers, which eliminate transshipment charges at seaboard ports and costly rail hauls to and from the interior.

The St. Lawrence is not an inland waterway nor an artificial waterway—it is a natural highway into the heart of the continent. It is basic in water transportation that ships will penetrate inland as far as possible before discharging cargo, proven by the inland location of many great seaports, and by ocean shipping operations a thousand or more miles inland on rivers such as the Yangtse and the Amazon. A single factor—the rapids in the St. Lawrence between Ogdensburg and Montreal—has obstructed this principle of water transportation on the St. Lawrence. These rapids are now passable by locks only 14 feet deep and 260 feet long, which limit the size of ships using the route to those dimensions. The project thus contemplates nothing but a modernization of an existing transportation route. Ninety-five percent of the 2,400-mile sailing distance between Milwaukee and the Atlantic is now fully available for deep-draft shipping.

The cost of the engineering works in the St. Lawrence River will be shared by Canada, the United States, and the State of New York. The net cost of the project to the National Government will be a little over $300,000,000, or about one average day's war expenditure during World War II. This nominal expenditure is economically justified by tremendous potential savings in freight charges and electric power rates. The Department of Commerce, as recently as December 1943, estimated that traffic through the seaway including both general cargo and bulk freight would range from 57,000,000 to 84,000,000 tons per year. The Department of Commerce, in its study, estimated that freight savings of $7 to $10 per ton could readily be derived on shipments moving from overseas to Lake Michigan ports, even allowing for St. Lawrence seaway tolls on the basis of $1.25 per ton. Even on the basis of the present 14-foot-draft operations, limiting ocean carriers to about 1,600 tons of cargo west of Montreal, net freight savings of $5 to $10 per ton have been repeatedly demonstrated by the use of existing services.

Aside from the seaway's economic value, another factor of even greater importance is the future security of the United States and Canada. Before World War II, our military leaders urged the completion of the project for the national defense. Shortly after the end of World War II, the Joint Chiefs of Staff advised the Congress that from our experience in World War II, the project is absolutely essential to the national security as a shipbuilding resource, as an additional transportation facility and as a new source of power.

It is a national misfortune that the seaway was not developed before World War II. With it, Midwest industry and agriculture could have made a more effective contribution to the war effort, and much money and perhaps many lives could have been saved.

Our wartime shipbuilding production approached 70,000,000 tons. Sixty-five percent of the steel, machinery, and other component parts of these ships originated in the Great Lakes area. However, only about 2 percent of the completed ships were constructed on the lakes, although we have sheltered harbors, skilled workmen, vast industries, and great steel production. Small ships were constructed in lake ports and sent to sea through the Mississippi River at great expense. The shipbuilding potentialities of the Great Lakes have hardly been scratched. The bottleneck has been the difficulty of getting ships to salt water.

Had the seaway been developed, we could have constructed in lake harbors, escort carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and merchant ships. These ships could have been loaded in lake ports with foodstuffs, munitions and material of war—and if this seems like mere speculation, remember that Detroit was ranked as America's No. 1 arsenal, and was closely followed in war production by Great Lakes industrial centers such as Cleveland, Chicago, and Milwaukee.

Convoys could have been assembled in lake ports and sent to Europe with an ocean crossing 1,000 miles shorter via the St. Lawrence than from Atlantic ports. The submarine hazard would have been reduced in proportion to the saving in ocean mileage by use of the St. Lawrence.

The war has depleted our national resources. We have used lavishly our forests and our minerals. We find ourselves with rapidly dwindling supplies of iron ore, petroleum, manganese, copper, lead, and other strategic materials necessary in war and peace. A strategic stockpiling program is now planned, based upon industrial requirements and the national defense. These critical materials should be transported and stored as effectively as possible, in sheltered interior locations, where they will be used in volume, which means the industrial area surrounding the Great Lakes.

Considering the exposure of our coasts to naval and air attack, it is sound national policy to locate strategic industry in the interior and at the same time, provide it with the advantages of ocean transportation by extending deep-draft shipping into the lakes.

The seaway will check the drift of population from the Midwest to the seaboard. In recent years, there has been a mushroom growth of new industry along the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific coast. The employment offered by these new industries has encouraged many people to migrate from the Middle West to the seaboard, resulting in a rapid growth of population around the seacoasts and a gradual decline of population in the interior. Between 1930 and 1940, many Midwestern States actually lost population. This trend was accelerated during the war.

States tributary to the Great Lakes normally account for 35 percent of our national exports. The foreign trade of the United States does not originate or terminate in our great exports but is in large measure traceable to the import requirements and the export production of the farms and factories located in the heart of the country. Much of our overseas business is highly competitive and must seek the most economical transportation route.

In spite of its distinguished support, the seaway has strong opposition. The principal objectors are seacoast ports, which fear the loss of transfer business between ship and rail; the eastern trunk-line railroads, which are hostile to Great Lakes water transportation; utility interests, who object not to the St. Lawrence power development, but to the fact that it will be publicly rather than privately controlled; and finally, the coal industry, which opposes hydroelectric developments as a threat to coal markets.

The early canal builders opposed the development of the railroads; when Edison invented the incandescent bulb, the gas industry declaimed the impossibility of electric lighting; the railroads opposed the Panama Canal bitterly, as impracticable, just as they today oppose the seaway. Nevertheless, the railroads were built, the automobile succeeded the buggy, electric lights have become commonplace, and the Panama Canal has joined the Atlantic and the Pacific. In each case benefits have exceeded expectations, and predicted disasters have not materialized.

History will prove the justification for the St. Lawrence, and its accomplishment is merely a matter of time. The case for the seaway has been proved and re-proved so often that its merit is axiomatic. It is not the St. Lawrence waterway which is on trial in Washington. The issue before Congress is whether the national interest will prevail or whether the self-interest of certain powerful and articulate groups will determine national policy. The seaway is inevitable. The only question is: How long can delaying tactics obstruct it?

American postwar planning is geared to a philosophy of expansion—greater production, full employment, expanded foreign trade, an enlarged merchant marine. The St. Lawrence seaway will help us to obtain every one of these objectives. An expanded foreign trade will cement friendly foreign relations. We need new trade routes and new traffic to support our merchant marine, the largest in the world. Full employment and full production must be geared to a greater volume of commerce and transportation. No project before the American people today will do more to accomplish these objectives than the seaway.

Secretary of State Acheson has said that the seaway will increase the wealth of the United States by developing one of the greatest natural resources in the world—the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin. He has pointed to the mutual benefits which will be derived by Canada and the United States in terms of new economic strength and added security for both nations. He describes the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system as "a great highway of commerce stretching for 2,400 miles from Newfoundland into the industrial and agricultural heart of the United States and Canada." Secretary Acheson thus joins his powerful voice with those of his distinguished predecessors, with the Presidents of both parties, and with our greatest military leaders in the unanimous conviction that the seaway will open the Great Lakes area with its vast industrial and agricultural resources to ocean shipping; will give power-deficient areas a new low-cost source of electrical energy; and will add immeasurably to the national welfare and the national security.

The outlook for the early construction of the seaway project is bright. Even if all the arguments for the project outlined above were worthless, the Great Lakes iron ore situation alone will compel early building of the waterway. Most of the great steel industries of the country have thrown their full support behind the project, fearing early depletion of the Mesabi iron ore ranges and realizing that the tremendous steel industry of the Great Lakes Basin can be sustained only if the newly discovered iron ore of Labrador can be brought into the Great Lakes all-water. Without the seaway, the Great Lakes steel industry will, over the next 50 years, inevitably be forced to relocate along the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards. The tremendous machine shops and metalworking industries of the Great Lakes region will inevitably be compelled to follow their source of supply and to relocate close to the steel-producing centers. If the seaway is not built, the Great Lakes region 50 years from now will have reverted to a semiagricultural economy with industrial production possibly limited to the consumer needs of the area. With the seaway, the already splendid economy of the Middle West and the Great Lakes region will be fortified and strengthened and the whole national economy will assume a new vigor. While the benefits of the seaway to Wisconsin and the Middle West will be considerable, it is beyond dispute that it will render great national service comparable to that rendered by the Panama Canal and will immeasurably strengthen us in terms of peacetime economy and wartime security.

The Faith of the Stars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it has been my privilege on several occasions to point out that the members of the motion picture industry are as fine a group of American citizens as one can find in any other industry. I am referring to the actors and actresses, producers, directors, technical aides, writers, company executives, and so forth. It has been my contention too that the occasional instances of undesirable individuals in the industry—individuals disloyal to our Government and/or individuals of low moral character—that those instances were quite isolated and that they should not be unduly magnified nor mistakenly construed as representing the typical Hollywood personality.

I have contended that the record of the American motion picture industry in war and peace in patriotically serving our Government speaks for itself and needs no defense on my behalf or anyone else's behalf.

In this connection, therefore, I was delighted to see in the August 1950 issue of the famed magazine, the Christian Herald, of which Dr. Daniel A. Poling is editor, and Mr. Clarence W. Hall, managing editor, the first in a series of stories entitled "The Faith of the Stars," by Robert Lindsay Young.

In the first of this series is an introduction to one of the screen star's statements. This introduction describes the true religious devotion of the average man and woman in our motion picture capital, including some of the leading stars.

I was indeed delighted to see this first article as I know other Members of the Senate will also be, including my good friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] whose deep spiritual devotion is so well known and respected by all of us.

There is a song that runs on the theme of "accentuating the positive" and "eliminating the negative." I think that the series in the Christian Herald does indeed exactly that. It accents the positive. It commends the affirmative qualities of Hollywood life and by that measure it helps to eliminate and reduce the few unfortunate instances of negative activity. Every churchman, every member of the churchgoing public will rejoice in the Christian Herald series as one more evidence of godly activity in Hollywood and elsewhere. We need more such illustrations, more demonstrations of the good, the beautiful, the devoted, which is all about us—in Washington or in Los Angeles. We need less harping on the negative, less magnifying of the isolated, less publicizing of the occasional transgressor. Therein lies the path to uplifting of our standards of morality in all America.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this very brief article as published in the August Christian Herald, be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FAITH OF THE STARS

(By Robert Lindsay Young)

With this month we begin a series of brief articles in support of our assertion that Hollywood personalities, in the vast majority, are not the kind whose flagrant misdoings you see publicized in the newspapers. In this column, from month to month, we will introduce various stars whose daily lives, church activity, and statements of faith stamp them as the kind of folks you would welcome into your church fellowship.

We begin the series with Gale Storm and her husband, Lee Bonnell, active members of the Hollywood-Beverly Christian Church. Their pastor, Dr. Cleveland Kleihauer, calls them "pillars of strength to our church" and goes on to say: "Lee is one of our junior elders, while Gale teaches a Sunday-school class of junior-high students. The Biblical names of their three lovely little boys—Phillip, Peter, and Paul—who are in Sunday school regularly, is another sign of their Christian interests."

Asked for a statement of her faith, Gale Storm says:

"I have never known what it would be like to be apart from the church. It has been such a normal and natural part of my life that I can't just imagine myself without it. Certainly the church has its weaknesses. What institution composed of human beings doesn't have its faults? Nor do I mean that regular attendance at church services is always easy or that teaching my Sunday-school class is just a bed of roses. But I do know that if one is going to live a creative Christian life he must have an understanding of what godly living means in our world. The church teaches us concerning our duties as citizens and followers of Christ, but it does more—it engenders power; it both informs and inspires. I have gone to church back on my heels and come out on my toes.

"I have never thought of the church as merely something I may get something from, but as an institution to which I can and should give. If I didn't share in the life and activity of the church in my community, I would feel like a moral parasite, deriving benefits from society without making any return for values received. No disciple of Christ can be a spiritual hitchhiker, going through life on the momentum of a goodly heritage. I look upon the church as my opportunity and privilege to creatively share in the advancement of the kingdom of God in this world."

Labor's Stake in the St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert an article on the long-proposed and increasingly important St. Lawrence seaway project. This article, Labor's Stake in the St. Lawrence Seaway, appears in the 1950 edition of Wisconsin Labor, the official annual publication of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor. The above-entitled article follows:

LABOR'S STAKE IN THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

(By N. R. Danielian)

On June 8, 1950, I heard a remarkable speech by the celebrated president of General Motors Corp., Charles E. Wilson, before 500 or more members of the press assembled at the National Press Club in Washington. Mr. Wilson showed great statesmanship in advocating many of the principles which have been the ambition and the objectives of labor—high wages, stability of employment, job security, pensions, and technological progress—all the things that labor has fought for these many years.

Those who advocated these same principles 10 or 15 years ago were invariably characterized as radical, but today these principles are accepted, not only as desirable social objectives but as good business. Mr. Wilson said: "Our workers are our clients and we have an interest in their welfare. Admittedly, we have made great progress in the past 15 years."

I mention this because it shows that even though a matter may be the subject of controversy today in our system of democratic give and take and freedom to discuss, argue, and bargain, there is a chance—in fact a great likelihood—that in the end, when all the name calling has died down, opposing points of view will join together in agreement and common effort. The St. Lawrence project is one of those objectives of the workingman which, though somewhat controversial today, will ultimately be accepted because it meets and fulfills many of the objectives of the labor movement. It will improve the standard of living of labor, it will supply job security by preventing unnecessary shifting of industry, it will help industrial stabilization by supplying the necessary raw materials and powers; it will improve the productivity of labor and therefore the chance of securing higher wages; and, more important than all of the foregoing, it will increase national security in peace and military strength in war.

Briefly, the St. Lawrence project will do two things: It will create a 27-foot channel of navigation in the St. Lawrence River between Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Montreal, Canada, a distance of 113 miles, so that ocean-going ships can travel all the way from the Atlantic Ocean into Milwaukee, Chicago, Duluth, and other Great Lakes ports. At the same time, a large powerhouse will be constructed at the International Rapids section near Massena, N. Y., which will have a total capacity of 2,200,000 horsepower, equally divided between Canada and the United States. This power, which is probably the cheapest water power in the country, will be available for distribution to New York and New England, an area which has suffered from high power rates and shortage of supply.

These are large claims but they are justified by the facts of the case. The United States is the only country in the world, with the possible exception of Russia, which has agricultural and industrial sources centered mainly in the midcontinental area, between the Allegheny and the Rocky Mountains, anywhere from 500 to 1,500 miles removed from the seacoasts. Obviously such long land distances create a disadvantage as they increase the cost of bringing the goods from producer to consumer. This great industrial and agricultural empire of the Middle West has grown not because of, but in spite of its disadvantageous location. It has grown because the rich soil was there which the dynamic and progressive agricultural methods of our people made to blossom forth with unprecedented quantities of food. Industry developed in this area because the earth was rich in countless minerals—copper, iron ore, and coal. And a third of our people established in this area because the Great Lakes supplied matchless low-cost water transportation routes.

Favored by these wonderful advantages, midwestern agriculture and industry was able to overcome the disadvantages in high costs of transportation to and from the seaboard. Even though the St. Lawrence seaway would have reduced the cost of transportation by providing deep channels for ocean vessels, the absence of the seaway was not critical from a commercial point of view. It has now ceased to be a matter of choice, however, because the Great Lakes are rapidly losing their principal advantage, namely, availability of raw materials. It has become a necessity, therefore, to build the seaway in order to bring in raw materials and maintain production in the Middle West.

Obviously the workingman in a large part of our country, from northern New York up to the Continental Divide, has a vital interest in a project that means so much to continuity of employment, job security, and improved wage standards. The exhaustion of iron ore and copper resources in the Middle West will drive industry toward the coastal areas on the Atlantic and on the Gulf coast, unless some means is provided to bring these materials into the present centers of production. None can face with disinterest the alternative of dislocation of industry and employment in this great area, least of all labor.

Let us enumerate some of the basic facts which make the St. Lawrence seaway a necessity: All present estimates of the remaining iron-ore resources in the Lake Superior region from which more than 80 percent of the country's iron ore has been derived for many years indicate that we have about a billion two hundred million tons left in the soil, of which only half, or approximately 600,000,000 tons, is in open-pit, easily mined ore. Although we use 80,000,000 tons of ore a year from this area, 50,000,000 tons of that comes from open-pit mines, which means that this source may be exhausted within 12 years.

What will happen to the steel industry and the many steel-fabricating plants and heavy-consumer-goods producers in the Great Lakes area if these sources dry up. Some say they will develop low-grade ores, but this will cost many more dollars per ton. Others say they will bring iron ore from Venezuela, transport it over 2,000 miles through the Caribbean and the Atlantic to Baltimore and send it into the Middle West by rail. This will cost more, too. The net result is that it will cost more to produce steel in the Middle West.

We produce and use 90,000,000 tons of steel a year. If the price of steel is increased for this one reason alone, say by $4 a ton, the country will simply have to pay $360,000,000 more per year for its steel. Thus in 1 year the consumer will have paid the equivalent of the total cost of building the seaway.

Under our competitive system it is not possible simply to increase prices, particularly if there are other places in the country where steel may be made more cheaply. With the exhaustion of the iron ore in the Lake Superior area, the east and the Gulf coasts, particularly between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and possibly in the Norfolk and Mobile areas in the South, will have an advantage over every other location because they can get ore cheaply by ocean navigation. Hence there will be a tendency to expand the steel production there and contract it in the Middle West.

This process has already begun as the Bethlehem Steel Corp. has announced the expansion of its steel plant at Sparrows Point, Baltimore, and the United States Steel Corp. has also announced the establishment of a new steel mill on the Delaware River between Trenton and Philadelphia.

Unless the low-cost iron ore can be brought to the Middle West this tendency to shift industry to the east coast will continue at an accelerated pace, affecting not only primary industries but also fabricated consumer-goods industries which need steel for their raw material. Everyone can visualize for himself the effect upon existing communities in the Great Lakes area—on its peoples and its working force—if, within the next 20 years, 40 to 50 percent of the steel industry is so affected.

Fortunately it is not necessary to go through such a painful readjustment because the iron ore resources necessary to keep midwestern industries going are available in Labrador and are now being developed. We only need a cheap water route by the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, a few canals and locks for the 113 miles distance between Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Montreal, Canada, to bring this raw material to the mills of the Middle West. Another aspect of the St. Lawrence project is that it will make available immense amounts of low-cost hydroelectric power. As we talk and argue the merits of this project, 13,000,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity go to waste every year. This is more than the total amount of production of electric energy by all of the twenty-odd dams in the Tennessee Valley in 1945.

The only reason why the St. Lawrence project has not been built heretofore is that the interests opposing it have been very powerful. These interests are centered in the economic groups around the eastern railway trunk lines and the power companies in New York State. It has been true unfortunately that organized labor leadership in the railway and coal-mining industries have lined themselves up with these groups. They have allowed themselves to be persuaded that the seaway would jeopardize their jobs. The eastern railway trunk lines and the power companies in New York are concerned about competition from this new source of power and transportation route.

Those of us who advocate this project in the national interest do so from the deep conviction that it will help rather than hurt these power companies and the railroads because it will not only retain existing industries in their present locations but will increase industrial activity in the areas which they serve and from which they derive their revenues. How can the eastern trunk lines benefit from a shift of the steel industry from Pittsburgh, Youngstown, and Cleveland to a seaport city on the Atlantic coast where the raw materials would be brought in by water and the finished products would find their way to market by water. Some of the transport and utility managements are sometimes slow in perceiving their own and the public's interest in issues of this kind, but labor which has a very concrete understanding of these issues as wage earners and consumers, sees that lower production costs gives them a chance to buy more things with their income.

One final point even more vital than all of those previously mentioned because it deals with a matter which may determine national survival—security and military preparedness. The steel industry just as the supply of electric energy is basic to industrial strength and mobilization. A constant supply of raw materials in times of emergency is vital. Any shift of a major industry to coastal areas goes contrary to present plans of our defense and security agencies. Any exposure of raw material supply lines to attack by submarine is dangerous, as was amply proved in the Battle of the Atlantic in 1942. As our potential enemies move their industries into the less vulnerable hinterland, it would be folly for us to allow willfully our major industries to move to more vulnerable locations. It should be obvious to anyone that a boatload of iron ore from Liberia or Venezuela will create additional burdens for convoy duty, at the risk of ships and lives on the high seas, whereas the transportation of iron ore from Labrador through inland waterways would be infinitely safer. For this reason the National Defense Department, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the National Security Resources Board unanimously recommend the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway.

It is not a matter of accident that most friends of labor in the United States have stanchly supported the St. Lawrence seaway project regardless of the views expressed by the railway and coal unions.

Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, the late Senator George Norris, Robert M. La Follette—father and son, Senator George Aiken, of Vermont, Senator Wayne Morse, Senator Humphrey, Senator Paul Douglas, of Illinois, the late Senator Wagner, and Senator Herbert Lehman, have all supported the project because they know not only that it will be in the national interest but also because they are convinced it will be in the interest of both the farmers and workers.

The Evil Good Men Do

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an editorial entitled "The Evil Good Men Do," published in the Concord (N. H.) Daily Monitor of September 19, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EVIL GOOD MEN DO

Senator JENNER used some strong language in opposing a change in the law which would prevent a military man from being Secretary of Defense within 10 years of active service, a change designed to permit the appointment of General Marshall to that post, and the delegation to General Marshall by the President himself of the duties of Commander in Chief, duties reserved to the President by the Constitution.

Senator JENNER said the performance was use of General Marshall as a cloak to shield traitors. What is and what is not a traitor these days?

The more temperate David Lawrence, writing in the United States News, uses different words. He says:

"The appointment of General Marshall under extraordinary circumstances is a desperate attempt to save the prestige and political standing of the Truman administration for fear the mistakes in defense planning will reflect on the Democratic candidates who are up for election November 7."

David Lawrence means the same thing, for he, like Senator JENNER, holds the President accountable for "a series of major blunders [which] can be made and the President of the United States can escape responsibility—he merely shifts Cabinet officers when public opinion is aroused, and remains serenely in office himself. This is what has long been known to students of political science as 'irresponsible government'." The President has had four Secretaries of State and three Secretaries of Defense in 5 years.

Both Senator JENNER and David Lawrence believe the American people should be able to hold not only the President but his political party responsible in time of crisis, as can the people of all the other important democracies in the world. That way the Members of the Congress, as well as the President, would have to stand for election when the policies of the government came into question, as have the policies of the present administration in connection with foreign affairs which have now led to a war in Korea.

As matters stand there is only one way that the administration can be made more responsible in the elections this fall. That is to change the complexion of the Congress from Democratic to Republican. That is not a satisfactory way, when the President remains Democratic, and it does not eliminate "irresponsible government." It is, however, the best we can hope for. The only other possibility is to impeach the President, impossible actually with a Democratic majority in the Congress, and even if accomplished this would merely substitute ALBEN BARKLEY for President, another partisan who has gone along with the administration in all its multiple blunders and who has been one of its most abject apologists.

In the circumstances men can be forgiven for using strong language. The times have been made desperate, largely by those who have so long administered our National Government. Even if the good intentions of these Federal administrators are not questioned they still can be guilty of very, very irresponsible government and of mistakes in judgment and blunders before which the Truman damnation of the Marines pales into insignificance.

The word "traitor" is a strong word, and probably is not applicable technically or legally to what has been happening. But it expresses the strength of the feelings of a great many Americans about what has been happening. Here in this State it expressed the feelings of those Republican voters who sought to hold Senator TOBEY responsible for his share in the blunders which have been made, the only practical way they had under existing law to express their strong convictions that a change is needed in Washington. It was expressed in the vote of Senator BRIDGES against changing the law to permit General Marshall's appointment as Secretary of Defense, a vote on which Senator TOBEY absented himself.

Don't think that we wish to vote Democratic this year, for the candidate for United States Senator or any other job. We do wish to vote for a responsible Republican, and what we are seeking to do is to indicate some of the ways in which the man we shall vote for can act responsibly. That man is Senator TOBEY, and if he gives aid and comfort to the present administration he is only helping to compound the accumulated errors of its nearly two decades of misrule.

White House-Labor Opposition to Senator Taft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The White House-Labor Gang-Up on Senator TAFT," published in the Philadelphia Inquirer of September 20, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE-LABOR GANG-UP ON SENATOR TAFT

It is hardly a creditable exhibition, in the midst of the war in Korea, for the Truman administration to throw the full weight of its political power and prestige into an effort to sway a purely local election.

In its determination to defeat Senator ROBERT A. TAFT for reelection in Ohio in November, the administration has joined hands not only with leaders of the CIO and the AFL, but with John L. Lewis—no friend of Mr. Truman in the past—to swing labor votes against the Republican candidate.

As the opening gun in this campaign, W. Averell Harriman, special assistant to the President, was assigned to deliver an unprecedentedly political speech at the supposedly nonpartisan convention of the American Federation of Labor in Houston.

That speech, ghostwritten in the White House and released to newspaper correspondents in Washington by White House press secretary Charles G. Ross, was an inflammatory affair declaring that had Congress followed Senator TAFT's opposition to the Marshall plan and the North Atlantic Treaty, "Communist objectives would have been furthered."

The boss of the United Mine Workers, John L. Lewis, has obligingly lent himself to the "get TAFT" campaign by warning coal-mine operators in Ohio to keep Senator TAFT out of their mines during the campaign, lest his presence "enrage the men" to strike.

Back of this alliance to dictate to the people of Ohio is, of course, the common hatred of the administration and the union bosses of the Taft-Hartley law and the Senator who sponsored it.

But it is up to the Ohio voters and no one else—including President Truman, Averell Harriman, and John Lewis—to decide who is to represent them in the United States Senate.

The White House is making a mistake to meddle in State politics in this fashion, regardless of its antipathy to Mr. TAFT. President Roosevelt ran into plenty of trouble when he essayed to tell the voters in a number of States who should and who should not be sent to the Senate.

The spectacle of forces from outside the State, directed by the Truman administration and Boss Lewis, trying to unseat their Senator is one that the people of Ohio are unlikely to find to their taste.

Texas Watchdog

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a timely and interesting article from the September 18, 1950, issue of the weekly news magazine Time, under the title "Texas Watchdog." It is justly complimentary of the public services of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] who is now making an admirable record as the alert, capable, and energetic chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXAS WATCHDOG

In the week that President Truman announced his program for mobilizing the United States economy, the Senate's new watchdog committee on United States preparedness uttered its first warning growl. After just a month's sniffing through the United States mobilization effort, Texas' sharp-nosed Chairman LYNDON JOHNSON has caught the strong scent of "business as usual" in some corners of the Defense Department's planning.

Government-owned reserve defense plants, JOHNSON reported, had been allowed to deteriorate. Such onetime surplus items as a synthetic-rubber plant, airplane engines, and radio equipment had been put up for sale while the United States was frantically mobilizing for Korea. Rubber stockpiling had slacked off while the need loomed greater than ever. "If we find in the other fields," said JOHNSON, "the same siesta psychology that we found in surplus disposal and rubber, our work is certainly cut out for us."

TRAINED FRESHMAN

The work that 42-year-old LYNDON JOHNSON had cut out for himself was just the kind that had lifted Missouri's Senator Harry S. Truman out of obscurity in World War II. Freshman JOHNSON was not unprepared for the job. During the war he had run an efficient House investigating committee which worked much like the celebrated Truman committee without drawing its headlines. JOHNSON believed that a congressional watchdog should be something of a seeing-eye guide for blind bureaucracy. His committee marshaled its facts in private, presented them to the appropriate Government officials, and usually received thanks for its suggestions.

LYNDON JOHNSON began learning his way around Washington in 1932 as secretary to Rancher-Congressman Dick Kleberg. Five years later he was back in Texas campaigning for a seat of his own. Franklin Roosevelt chanced to be fishing from a destroyer off the Texas coast at the time read and liked JOHNSON's hard-hitting New Dealing speeches. FDR saw to it that the freshman Congressman got a seat on the important House Naval Affairs Committee.

CAMPAIGN BY HELICOPTER

In 1941 JOHNSON tried the leap to the Senate; lost out to Governor "Pappy" O'Daniel by 1,311 votes out of more than half a million cast. Six months later, within 4 days of Pearl Harbor, he became the first House Member to go on active duty (as a Navy lieutenant commander). When the President ruled in mid-1942 that Congressmen might not serve in the Armed Forces, JOHNSON came back to Washington.

By 1948 he had decided to give up his House seat to run again for the Senate. He whirred across Texas by helicopter in a series of 18-hour campaigning days that won him a hairbreadth 87-vote margin over popular ex-Gov. Coke Stevenson. Since then, he has been a loyal, but not unquestioning, supporter of the Fair Deal; when it came to voting on labor and civil-rights bills, he lined up with the coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats to help defeat the administration program.

For his newest task, JOHNSON had set himself a commendable set of rules: Don't spend time looking for headlines; try to avoid politics; avoid second-guessing war strategy; be constructive and impartial. As a starter, the seven-man Johnson subcommittee planned to survey Alaskan defenses, examine weapons and manpower needs, and investigate foreign monopolies of strategic United States defense materials.

The Communist Threat to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the Honorable Martin Dies entitled "The Communist Threat to America." The Public Printer has advised me that the cost to insert this article is $287. As I believe that the information in this article is so pertinent, I ask unanimous consent to insert this article in the RECORD. It follows:

THE COMMUNIST THREAT TO AMERICA
(By Martin Dies)

Democracy and Christian civilization are more gravely menaced throughout the world than ever before. At long last, many of our people realize it but there are still millions of people in the United States who have no adequate conception of the methods, tactics and ultimate objective of communism. We cannot shape the future unless we understand what has happened in the past.

It has been a short time since World War II was over. At least we thought it was over. You recall that when we asked our people to serve in the Armed Forces our leadership assured them that this was a war to end all wars. They were told that when they defeated Hitler, we would establish a just and lasting peace.

Today, however, the dictatorship and military might of Joseph Stalin is a greater menace to our security and freedom than the dictatorship of Hitler. Hitler controlled a country with 70,000,000 people which was limited in natural resources and small in area. Stalin has a country whose territory is larger than the United States and Canada and possesses more natural resources than any country on earth and has a population of 200,000,000 people. He has succeeded, without firing a gun, in acquiring more than 650,000 square miles and 110,000,000 subject people in the Balkan States and 400,000,000 people in China. In short he has welded the manpower and resources of nearly one-half the earth into a single, unprecedented striking force. Now, how did it happen? Our people should be vitally and deeply interested in finding out what happened because never in the history of the world has one country made such tremendous strides toward world domination as the Soviet Union has made in the past 5 years.

Only a few years ago, Russia was regarded as a third-rate power. Today she has attained the status of a world menace and is the most powerful country on earth with the exception of the United States. Now, how did it happen? I propose to answer that question. And in answering it, I am going to tell you about some of my conversations and conferences with President Roosevelt and other leaders of his administration. I think that my experiences will shed some light upon the motives which actuated our leaders in reaching the agreements at Tehran, Yalta and Potsdam. They may help explain the enormous concessions which our Government made to Stalin and our strange behavior toward China. Many people are unable to understand why the United States, after having spent three or four billions of dollars to aid the Nationalist Government of China, suddenly decided that that Government was too corrupt to help and exerted continuing pressure upon the Nationalist Government to accept the Communists as equal partners in the Government of China. Few people can understand why our Government accepted our sector in Berlin without making any provision for ingress and egress. Why did our leadership surrender vital lands in Manchuria to Stalin as the price of his 1 week's participation in the war against Japan? These and many other questions can be answered and understood when the attitude of our leadership toward communism is understood.

My experiences with communism began in 1937. I introduced a bill which passed the House of Representatives to exclude and deport Communist aliens. The purpose of the bill was to cure the defect in the law under the terms of which Communists were not excludable or deportable as such. The administration killed the bill in the Senate. Another bill of mine, passed in 1937 to prevent illegal entries and to strengthen immigration laws, was likewise defeated by the administration.

On March 21, 1937, I introduced at the request of Vice President Garner, a resolution to investigate and condemn sitdown strikes. Mr. Garner assured me that, when the President returned from Warm Springs, he would issue a statement denouncing the sitdown strike method. When the President returned from Warm Springs, he not only did not issue any such statement, but he permitted his leaders in the Congress to defeat my resolution.

In May 1938, I got a resolution through Congress to investigate Communists, Nazis, and Fascists. The administration used its influence with the Accounts Committee to whittle down my request for funds to carry on the investigation to the paltry sum of $25,000 after the administration discovered that I was determined to investigate and expose communism the same as nazism and fascism. So I was compelled to begin our work with $25,000.

I recall that my uncle, Jack Dies, who is now dead, came to Washington on another matter and I discussed the situation with him. He said, "Martin, you know I hate to advise you to abandon this investigation but I have seen enough to know that you are now preparing to antagonize powerful forces in this country and that you will be harassed as few men have been in our history."

I told him, "Well, I have started it and I cannot back up."

One of the excuses given for the small sums placed at the committee's disposal was the provision in the resolution which requested the head of each department to detail to the committee such legal and expert assistance and investigators as the committee needed. It was argued that, since the committee could secure this outside aid from the various executive departments, we would not need more than $25,000. I immediately called upon the heads of the departments, and particularly the Attorney General, to assign to our committee investigators in accordance with the resolution. The heads of the various departments gave one excuse after another for their failure to comply with my request. While this was going on, Mr. Wohlforth, secretary of the La Follette committee, telephoned me that he had been advised that we were trying to secure some investigators from the executive branch of the Government and that he could get us some investigators. I suspected that his scheme was to pack the committee with Communist sympathizers but I let him send me several men so that I could show Congress that, while I could not get the departments to give us help, the secretary of the La Follette committee could get such help for me provided I would use the type of men he sent. I received an anonymous telephone call, shortly before these men arrived, telling me that both men were members of the Communist Party. I never knew who gave me that valuable information, but I acted upon it.

When they arrived, I questioned them very closely. As I recall this occurred in the presence of the committee and these men finally admitted enough facts to convince the committee that they were either Communists or Communist sympathizers. It was apparent from their admissions that someone very high in the administration wanted to plant these stooges on the committee for the purpose of sabotaging the investigation.

I knew what was in store for me when the administration was willing to plant two stooges of Moscow on my committee. I also knew that the administration was being influenced by Moscow propaganda.

On June 28, 1938, I received a letter from one of the leaders of the administration who is now the majority leader, enclosing a memorandum expressing certain views as to the kind of investigation our committee should make. Here is an excerpt from his advice: "For the committee to allow itself to be drawn into an investigation of a domestic organization, simply because some Communists are in it, or actively engaged therein, such as the CIO would be, in my opinion, a grave mistake." I believe that this instruction originated with the President because this is what the President told me in effect shortly after the receipt of this letter.

We began to accumulate evidence before opening public hearings. We secured a lot of evidence showing the infiltration of the CIO by Communist leadership. We discovered that a number of Communists went to Moscow and Leningrad at the expense of the Soviet Government and received special instructions in labor agitation, parliamentary procedure and class warfare and returned to the United States for the purpose of infiltrating labor unions. When John L. Lewis quit the American Federation of Labor and organized the CIO, he turned to these well-trained Communist agitators to form the rank and file of his organizers in many areas. We got their names and the evidence, which was clear and convincing, showing that thousands of them had joined labor unions and that some of them had wormed their way into strategic positions in the unions. They were intrenched in the leadership of 21 of the international unions affiliated with the CIO. Nearly one-half of the members of the executive board of the CIO, the governing board and the most powerful organization within the CIO, were members of the Communist Party.

Unions which vitally affect our whole economy and security were under the control of men and women who had been trained and educated in Moscow and Leningrad for the express purpose of returning to the United States, obtaining positions of importance in labor unions, so that they could promote the ideology and revolutionary program of Joseph Stalin.

When I got this information, I telephoned John L. Lewis and told him I wanted to talk with him. I went to his office a few days after the telephone conversation. When I walked into Mr. Lewis' office, Lee Pressman stood to his right. I knew that Pressman was a member of the Communist Party although he denied it then and thereafter until quite recently. He was the chief attorney for the CIO and Mr. Lewis. I said, "Mr. Lewis, I have received considerable information from reliable sources that many Communists have entered your union. They are shop stewards, presidents of locals, organizers, and so forth. It is our duty to investigate and expose them unless you are willing to cooperate with us to the end that we can get these people out of your organization. I have come to you to find out if you, as an American citizen, and labor leader, will be willing to cooperate with the committee without any publicity so that we can expel these agents and stooges of a foreign dictator from positions of leadership in your organization." Mr. Lewis was very angry. His face was flushed. He struck the desk with his fist and said to me, "Mr. Congressman, the CIO does not need you or anyone else to tell us how to run our organization. Yes; we have Communists in the CIO. We also have Baptists, and Methodists and we have Democrats and Republicans, but we do not need a committee of Congress to tell us who we are to hire and fire." I said to Mr. Lewis and those present: "Mr. Lewis, you have evidently overlooked the vast distinction between members of ordinary political parties and Communist stooges of a foreign power. All of our evidence, without exception, shows that Communists are disciplined to be servants of Moscow. They have no independence. They sacrifice their American citizenship when they become members of the Communist Party, and surely you will not compel us to expose these people publicly when you can get rid of them. We have their names and you can get them out of your organization."

The conversation was not very agreeable and I interpreted Mr. Lewis' attitude and language as an invitation to leave his office which I did cheerfully. I announced to the press that I intended to open hearings for the purpose of exposing communism in the CIO.

On August 12, 1938, we opened our public hearings on communism in labor organizations. As I recall, on the morning of August 12 before the committee's hearing began, I was at the White House to see the President concerning an important project in my district. Senator Sheppard was there also. At the conclusion of our discussion concerning the project, the President began in his magnetic way to persuade me to abandon my proposal to expose communism in the CIO. He said to me, "You know, Martin, I have been watching you for a long time. You have a promising future. You are an able speaker and a young man and I want vigorous and able young men in the New Deal Administration. You can go a long way working with me but not very far working against me." He continued, "You have to be loyal to me. I can't work with men that I can't depend upon. You have got to play ball with us." I asked, "What do you mean 'play ball'?" He answered, "You cannot go through with this investigation of the CIO and your proposed public hearings." I asked, "Why can't I go through with it, Mr. President?" Of course, I was somewhat frightened to tell the truth. The President is a powerful personage, especially when he happens to be the head of your political party and source of your patronage. And I must confess that the President's compliments sounded good to me. I am not going to represent myself as a hero because I was not. On the other hand, I had to keep my self-respect. Regardless of the consequences, I knew that I could not back up.

He said: "Well, if you expose the Communists in the CIO, the CIO will turn against the Democratic Party. If we lose the CIO in some of the Eastern States, we cannot win. Furthermore, you will antagonize the CIO and the Democratic Party and brand yourself as the foe of labor and liberalism. I said, "Mr. President, do you mean to imply that the Communists have so strongly intrenched themselves in the CIO that exposure of them will result in antagonism to the Democratic Party?" He said, "Yes, there are Communists in the CIO. Some of them may be in positions of leadership as you say. I think, however, you exaggerate the seriousness of communism. The Communists have just as much right in the CIO as anyone else. The point is that Mr. Lewis is considerably disturbed by your proposed hearings." I said, "Mr. Green, Mr. John Frey, and the leaders of the A. F. of L. are not disturbed. They have been cooperating with me by furnishing information and they have advised me that they will be glad if I will expose any Communists in the A. F. of L. so that they can get rid of them." "I have known Green, Frey, and the other leaders of the A. F. of L. a long time," replied the President. "They are reactionary. John L. Lewis is the most progressive and valuable leader in the trade unions today."

As I said, Senator Sheppard was present during the conversation. Later, however, he asked me not to mention his name in connection with the matter as he did not want to become involved. I thought a great deal of Senator Sheppard and during his lifetime I never mentioned his name in connection with this conference. However, I know that if it had become necessary, Senator Sheppard would have supported my version of the conference. However, since the President never denied the substance of what I am now relating it was never necessary to call upon Senator Sheppard.

One thing led to another, and finally the President became impatient and angry with me, and he turned to Senator Sheppard and said, "Senator, what are we going to do with Martin?" Senator Sheppard was a very genial and pleasant man and a good friend of mine. He said, "I don't know. I knew his dad and when a Dies makes up his mind to do something he usually does it. I am afraid you are going to have trouble trying to persuade him not to do it." As I recall, the interview lasted about 35 or 40 minutes and finally I looked at the watch and said: "Mr. President, I have to go, because the committee meets and I must be there to preside."

So I began the public hearings for the purpose of exposing communism in the CIO and our evidence showed very clearly that in the majority of the unions affiliated with the CIO the Communists were intrenched in positions of leadership. As is well known, the CIO retaliated viciously. It conducted a prolonged and bitter campaign against me and the committee. It is interesting to note, however, that in the past 12 months the CIO have expelled the very individuals and unions exposed by our committee in 1938. By their own actions, they have proved the truth of our findings.

I recall that a man by the name of General Krevitsky, who had served under Stalin for a long time, had fled to the United States when he became disgusted with the brutality of communism in practice as distinguished from communism in theory. I learned of his presence in this country and was determined to see him and have him testify. He told an amazing story of what he had learned about the plans and purposes of the Kremlin; how it had built secret armies in every country and had spent millions of dollars for propaganda purposes. He revealed that the ultimate goal of Stalin was the conquest of Europe, Asia, and the Americas.

I sent word to him to come to Washington and testify because the American people ought to have his information. I was informed that he did not want to come to Washington and testify for fear that the OGPU, which is now the NKVD, the secret police of the Kremlin, would assassinate him.

I said, "Surely, they are not that powerful in the United States." I was very skeptical about it. He said, "I was chief of the western division of the Soviet Intelligence, and I know that there isn't a country, there isn't an industry of importance and there isn't a town of industrial importance that members of the OGPU are not there gathering information and transmitting it to the Soviet Union. They have their agents in the Soviet Embassies and not even the Soviet Ambassadors know the identity of the members of the OGPU." Of course, I do not purport to quote the exact language of these conversations but I made notes and memoranda at the time and I know that my accounts of the conversations are substantially correct. As I recall, we finally prevailed upon General Krevitsky to testify upon the assurance that we would protect him and conceal his identity. It is my recollection that I called up the Secret Service and said, "I am undertaking a rather perilous thing. This man is fearful of his life. I want him to testify because his information is tremendously important but I do not want him harmed." I undertook to get a commitment from the Government that they would help me protect him but, of course, no one in the Government wanted him to testify. He did testify. As I recall, within a short time after his startling revelations which foretold so accurately the plans of the Kremlin, he was found shot in his hotel room in Washington, D. C. While his death was pronounced a suicide, I was never satisfied with this verdict and I have always believed that his appearance before our committee was the cause of his death.

Another former agent of the Soviet Union in New York had given us valuable information. Shortly thereafter, he was found dead. I was told that his death was caused by a heart attack but that another examination disclosed that he had been shot with a fine steel bullet through the eye which had entered his brain and produced instant death.

Still another informant was a victim of a hit-and-run driver.

I am telling you these things because I want to show you what happened in our country during these critical years which finally resulted in the sacrifice of the fruits of victory won by our boys on the battlefields. I am at a loss to understand why our public leaders are not now clamoring for publication of all the secret agreements made by our Government with Joseph Stalin. I have been surprised that so many people have been indifferent and unconcerned about the tragic consequences of our pro-Communist policy which robbed us of the fruits of our victory. I think I can show you why the men who fought and died in World War II were betrayed by the stupid attitude of our leadership.

They were betrayed because the Soviet Union built up in this country the greatest espionage and propaganda machine the world has ever seen. They spent millions of dollars to deceive and hoodwink Congressmen, Senators, and Cabinet officers. The brother-in-law of Molotov, Sam Carp, was operating a chain of filling stations in New Jersey. He was investigated by our committee. We discovered several hundred thousand dollars in $100 bills in his safe-deposit box and a letter of credit from Molotov instructing the Amtorg Trading Corporation to extend him a credit of $150,000,000 to be spent in the United States in order to obtain information about the construction of battleships. The Government of the United States never raised a finger against him although he admitted that several national Democratic committeemen had been paid cash by him. These committeemen admitted that they received the cash fees but contended that the payment was for legal services.

Think of it! Think of the stupidity and indifference of a Government that will permit a foreign power to spend money to influence our own officials. The facts were admitted but no one in authority appeared very interested.

Yes; they spent money and they spent it lavishly in the United States. For a time the Soviet Embassy in Washington operated on a 24-hour schedule and they were able to dupe such nitwits as Henry Wallace and CLAUDE PEPPER.

I shall not give you anything which is the result of surmise or opinion but information that I know to be correct. I had people watching the Soviet Embassy and they observed the frequent attendance of prominent New Dealers at Soviet Embassy functions. Obviously, the caviar and champagne that flowed in the Soviet Embassy had a profound effect upon some of the flaming liberals.

When Henry Wallace spoke in Madison Square Garden the Communists packed it; however, when anyone spoke there against communism he was usually booed and jeered and the police force of New York was required to maintain order. The difference lies in the fact that the Communists work at their business of revolutionizing the world and spreading their ideology while we sit idly by.

Our committee struggled on. Because of the attitude of many of the reporters who reported our proceedings and because they wrote so many false stories, I had them investigated to find out about their background and affiliations. You know what I discovered, the New York chapter of the newspaper guild was Communist controlled. Some of the reporters assigned to our committee were Communist sympathizers or to say the least befuddled and confused liberals, and, of course, they garbled the accounts to make the committee appear ridiculous and to discredit and undermine it, because they were working hand and foot with the administration in power.

However, we continued to give the American people the truth. Finally, we discovered that several thousand Communists, agents, stooges, and sympathizers were on the Government payroll, occupying in many instances key positions in the State Department, in the Justice Department, and in the Interior Department. So I telephoned President Roosevelt's secretary and told him I wanted to see the President and he said all right.

I went to the White House and saw the President. I said to him, "Mr. President, we must do something about this. Here is a list of many of these people. We have their membership records in a Communist-controlled organization. If you understand the Communists as I do, you will know that they are in the Government for one purpose and one purpose alone and that is to steal important military and diplomatic secrets and to transmit them to Moscow." The President was furious. I was surprised at his anger. He said to me—he called me Mr. Congressman—he had called me Martin before—he said, "Mr. Congressman, you must see a bugaboo under every bed." I said, "No; I never look under the bed, Mr. President." "Well," he said, "I have never seen a man that had such exaggerated ideas about this thing. I do not believe in communism any more than you do but there is nothing wrong with the Communists in this country; several of the best friends I have got are Communists." Mind you that is a truthful account. He made that statement.

Some of the things I am telling you about I told to the House of Representatives and published in magazine articles and in speeches throughout the country during President Roosevelt's lifetime and he did not deny them. Although I published a book in 1940, and wrote a series of magazine articles for Liberty in 1940, revealing many of the things I am telling you today, no one sued me for libel.

The President refused to discharge these people from the Government although our committee reported to Congress in 1941 that more than 1,100 Communists were on the payroll. Finally, we got Congress to appropriate $100,000 to defray the expenses of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate our charges against these Government officials and employees and we submitted to the executive department our evidence to substantiate our charges and findings. Despite this mandate of Congress, the Department of Justice refused to comply with this mandate and by a subterfuge got around the direction of the Congress. Then I induced Congress to withhold appropriations to pay the salaries of some of worst offenders. The executive department defied Congress and refused to fire them. They were kept on the Government payroll. They were there while we were working on the secret of the atomic bomb and still there are people in America so dumb that they believe Stalin doesn't have the secret of the atomic bomb. How could he have kept from getting it with stooges in nearly every department of the Government? They were able to learn some of the secret in Canada, and Canada was not one-twentieth as well organized by the Communists as the United States. We were taken in, lock, stock, and barrel by Communist propaganda and deception.

There was a perennial youth by the name of Joseph Lash, who was head of the Youth Congress. Joseph Lash had been very active in communism and we exposed him. One day I got a telephone call from Mrs. Roosevelt asking me to have dinner with her. Well, I knew something was up because I had heard that Mrs. Roosevelt was trying to persuade Naval Intelligence to give Joseph Lash an appointment. He had never been inducted into the armed services. I went to the White House and there seated in the anteroom were four or five young Communist youth leaders waiting for Mrs. Roosevelt. They sat at the table with me and Mrs. Roosevelt.

At the conclusion of the lunch, Mrs. Roosevelt said to me, "Mr. Congressman, I presume you know why I asked you to have lunch with me." I said, "Well, I have an idea. It is about Joseph Lash." And she said, "Yes." I said, "Mrs. Roosevelt, I have brought the record of Joseph Lash. He perjured himself before our committee." She said, "Yes; he told me he did but he is very sorry and I think he should have another chance." I said, "Well, maybe, but not in Naval Intelligence." I said, "Did he tell you he was a member of the Communist Party?" She said, "Yes; but he was just an idealistic venturesome youth who embraced communism impulsively and now he wants to repent." I said, "Mrs. Roosevelt, how do you know he has repented? How can you afford to ask that he be put in Naval Intelligence?"

Well, we sat around and discussed it pro and con. When I went back to the office, I called the committee together and told them about my conversation with Mrs. Roosevelt. The committee agreed to permit Joseph Lash and his counsel, who was a New Deal official, to appear before it so that he could make his confession and ask for forgiveness. Among other things, I asked him why he was not in the Army and he was unable to give a satisfactory explanation. Later the committee instructed the secretary to telephone the draft board in New York to find out why Joseph Lash had not been inducted. We were informed that it was because of White House intervention. Shortly thereafter, I saw Gene Tunney at the home of some friends and he said to me, "Martin, I have something that will be amusing to you." I understood him to say that at one of the Army camps where Joseph Lash was stationed, Mrs. Roosevelt drove up in a White House car and sent for Joseph Lash and that Joseph Lash broke rank and got in the White House car and was gone several days. It may be that Gene Tunney was relating to me what someone else had told him.

We had a member of the Secret Service who worked in the White House and who gave us weekly reports in regard to what happened at the White House. I learned that Communists had access to the White House and were using their influence to affect our domestic and foreign policy. I do know that in 1940, the President called me by telephone at my home in Orange, Tex., and asked me to come to Washington. I had an appointment with him at 12 o'clock but I cooled my heels in the anteroom for 1 hour before his door opened and out walked Gardner Jackson, whose record may be found in the files of our committee. I do know that my telephone conversation with the President was very friendly but that when I entered his office after Gardner Jackson left he had a very belligerent attitude. A White House reporter took down the conference and later the President refused to give me a copy of the interview. It would be interesting to the American people to read the conversation between President Roosevelt and me on that occasion because I warned him very clearly what was going to happen as a result of the Government's pro-Russian policy. Now, I know this is difficult for you to believe, but it is true. I am telling you these things so that you may have some idea of how thoroughly Stalin was able to dupe the United States of America.

Did it pay dividends to Stalin? The record speaks for itself. Stalin got billions of dollars of your money—not your money because you will never repay it. He got it from your great-grandchildren. By the time it is paid off, it will probably be twice as much if you count the interest and that wasn't all he got. He had built such clever political machines in this country that he greatly influenced, if he did not control, the CIO for a long time. Some of the most expensive and destructive strikes were caused by Communists in the CIO for Communist purposes. The CIO cannot now deny the truth of our 1938 findings. If they deny it, why is it they are now expelling the Communist leaders we exposed in 1938? Why did they wait 10 years to expel them and what is the answer of the administration? The truth is that some politicians are getting away with murder because too many people are indifferent. If you manifested one-tenth of the interest in your Government as you do in your business you wouldn't elect weaklings to important public offices.

When you get ready to hire a president of a gas company you are most careful to secure the services of a competent man, and you do get competent men, for the most part. But when you come to elect a politician, the majority of us are indifferent and we think anybody can govern a country.

So my fellow citizens, here was Moscow in full swing in the United States. It was influencing our domestic policy by preaching public ownership. It formed innumerable organizations which were lobbying actively in Washington for this purpose. Of course, they didn't say this was communism. They didn't say these organizations were controlled by Communists, like the American League for Peace and Democracy. There was an organization—2,000,000 gullible Americans—completely controlled by communism. And yet, 2,000,000 of our great, heart-bleeding idealistic public joined it and contributed their money and influence to the support of it.

Do you remember before the World War? People were parading, shouting that we intervene to defeat Germany? There wasn't a day that they weren't lobbying with Members of Congress to stop Hitler. Why stop Hitler? Because he has taken these little innocent countries. The newspapers were shouting it and the radio commentators were shouting it. That is all we heard, we Members of the Congress. Why? They wanted us to get in it 2 years before we did, to stop aggression. They said, "Why, America cannot sit idly by and permit Hitler to expand his empire."

Perhaps they were right. But where are they now? Why have they become so silent when Stalin has absorbed far more territory than Hitler ever absorbed? What has brought about the change of Henry Wallace and PEPPER and all that group? They were shouting for war to stop Hitler, but are they shouting for war to stop Stalin? It was bad for Hitler to seize Czechoslovakia and Rumania, but it is perfectly permissible for Stalin to seize them. Why?

One day I got an urgent call to go to the home of a friend of mine in Washington because Justice Murphy had to see me instantly. My wife was present when we went to the home. Murphy was prancing up and down in a high state of emotional excitement, and I was at a loss to know what he wanted with me. Finally, he opened up and said, "Mr. Congressman, I have sent for you to tell you that the Communists are going to take over this country. They are in our Government; they are all about us." He was highly agitated.

I thought, well perhaps we have a convert here, and I said, "Justice Murphy, I am acquainted with that situation and any help or any information you can give us I will deeply appreciate and will keep it confidential." He talked like an insane man. My wife will tell you, he would walk up and down the floor. His face broke into a sweat, and all the time I saw him I thought, "What is America coming to when that kind of a man can occupy a seat on the highest judicial tribunal in the land."

Yes; I want to bring you a picture, to show you how completely you have been duped, because you must pay the bill. Of course, some of you will say that is "spilt milk," "water over the dam." Well, maybe so, but if you are going to fight another war, you must know how to preserve the fruits of victory. And you lost this war. You think you won it, don't you? But you didn't win it. Oh, you whipped Hitler, but you didn't whip the idea of a powerful central government controlling and dominating your lives and your business and political thought, did you? Now, why didn't you win it? Why is it when General Patton advanced to the borders of Czechoslovakia, he received an order from the White House telling him to hold his army, and why did his army stand there cooling their heels for 3 weeks, waiting for the Russian Army to advance and take over Czechoslovakia and to be hailed as the liberators of Czechoslovakia? Why was it that we sat in conference in Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam and entered into secret agreements delivering to Stalin the great bread basket of Europe? Why? Why did we agree to a clause in the Potsdam agreement that gave to Stalin all of the industries in the occupied area that belonged to the Nazi Government without investigating the fact that when the Nazis had taken over those countries by official decree, they had seized all property. By our own solemn agreement, we gave to Stalin all of the properties of the peoples of those countries, and now we must feed them.

I hate to talk this way because I know it sounds pretty bad, but the time has come for frank discussions, and I tell you from my personal information and knowledge that I know that our Government was completely duped by Stalin, that Stalin influenced our foreign policy.

Now, what are you going to do about it, friends? Well, you are in a bad shape, aren't you? There are some nitwits that tell you we can whip Russia in 3 weeks by using the atomic bomb. You may believe that. The northern boys said they were going to whip the South in 3 weeks. It took them 4 years. I remember we had an assistant secretary of the Navy who said we could whip Japan in 3 weeks. Well, my boy served all through the Pacific and he can tell you that we didn't whip the Japs in 3 weeks. And I am here to tell you we can't whip Russia in 3 weeks or in 3 years, and I will tell you why you can't. Napoleon thought he could, and he had a great military machine. He was the greatest military leader the world had ever seen, up to that day. He didn't take Russia. The Russians retreated and he froze his troops—the carcasses of horses and the corpses of human beings literally strewed the retreat of the French Army.

Hitler tried to take them. You know Hitler wanted to do business with Stalin, and for 3 years they were working together. At the very time that Roosevelt thought that he was doing business with Stalin, Stalin was doing business with Hitler.

To show you how completely the President was deceived—and I say that not in exultation—the President for his first 2 terms was a magnificent leader. I sat close to him when he made that memorable speech in which he said, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself." And, as a young legislator, I looked upon his face and said, "God has given to America a great leader." But the President loved power.

When he got through Tehran and Yalta, he was not the man he had been when he took the oath of office in his first term. He was completely duped, and you and I must now pay the price.

It is important that you and I understand that if we fight Russia, we have a long war which will leave America exhausted. Oh, we have the idea that we can spend indefinitely. I know, we throw money away so much in this country that there are actually respectable people who think you can keep on issuing paper money and get by with it.

Well, I have known young men who thought they could get by by getting drunk every night, and they did get by for 10 years. They finally ended up with cirrhosis of the liver, the palsy, and the DT's. You will come out of the next war exhausted, and, furthermore, my fellow citizens, this Government is going to regiment you up to the hilt next time.

You think you knew what war was last time. Why, that was a picnic for some who stayed at home, if it wasn't for our sons. We made a lot of money out of it, didn't we? Of course, we did. Well, I will tell you it won't be that way again. It is going to require sacrifice and unselfish citizenship and courageous leadership. Americans everywhere must begin to emulate the enthusiasm and zeal which the Communists manifest throughout the whole world.

You cannot defeat this flaming ideology, this new religion based on atheism and materialism, with an indifferent and selfish citizenship. The Communists mean business, and they are prepared to make every sacrifice to extend their ideological religion through the world.

Not since the days when the Mohammedans threatened Christianity have we been confronted with so great a menace. Our America can only survive in this age and time when you and I revitalize democracy, rededicate ourselves to the fundamental principles that made our country great.

You think we can buy peace and security. We are to the point where we think whenever an emergency arises in America, all we have to do is to appropriate $10,000,000,000 of our great-great-grandchildren's money. We are down now to about the tenth generation to be born. I say to you that you will never defeat Russia by those tactics.

For instance, Russia will avoid open warfare as long as possible. Her strategy is to win nations without firing a gun, and she has done a good job. If you think for one moment that this clever, shrewd Joseph Stalin and his lieutenants intend to commit the issue to a trial of arms, you are mistaken. He will take every country he wants to take without firing a gun—he takes them from within. Why, he only got 16 percent of the votes in Bulgaria, but within a few months, he took Bulgaria. He only got 37 percent of the votes in the free election of Czechoslovakia, but within 2 months he took Czechoslovakia. No, he doesn't need to use guns. He is too smart; his propagandists are too smart. He can infiltrate our Government; he can influence our foreign policy; he can dupe and deceive our leadership.

The only answer is for you and all America to awake. You have been asleep, my fellow citizens. You must drop the scales from your eyes and realize that no one can be happy or prosperous or secure under a bad government. The first business of every citizen is the business of self-government, and unless we in this generation make a success of our business of government, we will have miserably failed. You and I must become zealous citizens of America. Let us arise, my fellow citizens, and shake off sloth. Let us say that no longer will we tolerate open treason against our country—the idea of permitting 200,000 so-called Americans to enjoy the protection of our flag when we know that they are traitors to that flag. Since when have we come to the time that we cannot deal with known traitors in America? Every man whose primary allegiance is to Russia or any other foreign power ought to have his citizenship revoked and he should be branded for what he is.

That, my friends, is the challenge to you, a real challenge. No longer can you sit idly by. You, as American citizens must come to love your country with all your heart and all your mind. You, as American citizens, must put aside the selfishness that holds to your business, day in and day out. You must realize that the gas industry wouldn't be worth a dime to you under totalitarian government. Your industry can only survive and serve humanity under a free economy.

Your business is government, my friends. Are you carrying out that business? Do you ever speak out against the frauds that hold public office throughout our land, or are you afraid to do it? Are you afraid that if you get active in a campaign that it will hurt your industry in Austin or Washington? If you are afraid, then you are not a good citizen of these United States. I say to you we must fight. We Americans who value this great heritage won by the blood of brave men and the tears of devout women, we want this America preserved for our children. We must band ourselves together as American citizens and say to the Henry Wallaces and the Claude Peppers and all of the other aggregation of individuals who want to substitute Russian totalitarianism for American freedom, we must say to them, "You have gone far enough. We Americans are determined to preserve this heritage. If you want Russia, then we are going to give you an opportunity to go there."

My friends, I could talk to you another hour, but I know you want to eat. I have enjoyed this opportunity to deliver this message. I hope that I have said something that will make a fighter out of you so that when you go back home you will take your coat off and the first time a mealymouthed lying, hypocritical politician comes around to you and tries to carry water on both shoulders and tries to utter platitudes and avoid controversial issues, I hope you will stand up in your Legion Hall or your Rotary Club or wherever you are and say, "I am an American citizen and I stand for the preservation of my country. I am prepared to fight and die for it if need be."

Effort To Scare Senator Jenner From Attack on General Marshall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an article entitled "JENNER Tells of Effort To Scare Him From Attack on Marshall," written by Walter Trohan, and published in the Washington Times-Herald of September 22, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JENNER TELLS OF EFFORT TO SCARE HIM FROM ATTACK ON MARSHALL—DISCLOSES DEMOCRAT GAVE WARNING OF REPRISALS IF CHARGES WERE MADE

(By Walter Trohan)

Senator JENNER, Republican, of Indiana, was warned he would be cut to ribbons in most of the American press if he assailed General Marshall as unfit for the office of Defense Secretary. JENNER revealed this yesterday.

On the floor of the Senate, a few minutes before he analyzed the career of the general, a Democratic Senator sought to prevent JENNER from delivering his speech.

"Are you going to deliver the speech released to the press?" the Senator, a southern Democrat asked.

"I am," JENNER replied.

"You better not," the Senator said, "you will be destroyed utterly."

"I am expendable," JENNER answered, "but I am going to help my country by telling the truth."

SMEAR WARNING GIVEN

"They will cut you up in almost every paper in the country," his colleague said.

"It would be a sorry thing if the time has come that a man in public life can't tell the truth for fear of newspapers which are involved in a conspiracy to conceal the truth," JENNER said.

Colleagues said the face of the Democratic Senator reddened and he turned away.

How the southern Senator learned the contents of the speech is something of a mystery to JENNER. JENNER gave the speech to the press 3 hours before delivery, for release when he obtained the floor. He was not sure when he could get the floor.

Evidently some reporter gave a copy of the speech to the Democrats, JENNER said. JENNER'S colleagues believe that Senate Democratic Leader LUCAS, of Illinois, sent the southern Democrat to JENNER in an attempt to stave off the attack on Marshall.

ATTACKED, AS PREDICTED

JENNER was attacked as the Democratic Senator predicted. Part of the attack JENNER regards as below the belt because it was based on remarks he never delivered.

"As the speech was prepared, some material was discarded," JENNER said. "Through error, stenographers included discarded material in the mimeographs prepared for the press. These sentences were discovered before delivery of the speech. Wire services and newspapers were called and asked to strike the sentences which were not delivered on the floor of the Senate.

"Yet these undelivered sentences were not stricken. They were carried in the eastern internationalist wing of the press. They formed the basis of an attack on me by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. I will stand on what I said. However, I do not believe I should be assailed for revised remarks."

HIT BY INTERNATIONALISTS'

JENNER noted that the heaviest barrage was leveled against him in the wing of the press which has striven to hide the facts of the attack on Pearl Harbor and works to stifle any criticism of internationalism.

"This section of the press has ignored books which have disclosed facts unfavorable to the administration or internationalist point of view," he said. "They have pumped for books supporting their cause. They have built myths around their sacred cows and blasted anyone who has disagreed with the picture they would present."

At JENNER'S office it was reported that the Senator's mail on his attack against Marshall is overwhelmingly in support of the Senator. A secretary said the ratio of favorable mail is 20 to 1.

Transportation of United States Mail

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in view of the great importance of the question of transportation of United States mail, I have devoted considerable thought to various phases of this matter. Hearings held by our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on Senate Resolution 50 have revealed facts which are at variance with statements made elsewhere.

It is because I feel that it would be for the best interests of the general public and in the aid of the national transportation system that I ask unanimous consent to place the following statement in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

Having read critical comment in the press and elsewhere concerning payments to railroads for the transportation of mail, I have followed with great interest the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on Senate Resolution 50. The charge that the Government was subsidizing the railroads for this service, particularly, seemed worthy of investigation.

Certain facts were developed at the hearings which in the interests of the public, the Post Office Department and the railroads generally, should be known.

First, the railroads are required by law to transport the mail and have no choice in the matter. The Postmaster General is empowered to specify the manner and means of transporting mail, including the designation of which trains shall be used.

The law also deals with railroad compensation for mail carrying. Some years ago Congress, on the recommendation of the Post Office Department, tentatively established a space basis of payment in lieu of the weight basis theretofore existing. At the same time, the Interstate Commerce Commission was given the authority to determine which of these bases or combination of them should be applied for the future. The Commission was also authorized to fix the rates of payment after both the Post Office Department and the railroads had been given the opportunity to be heard.

In 1919 the ICC decided to continue the space basis of payment advocated by the Post Office Department and opposed by the railroads. Since that time, I understand, mail has been the only commodity transported under that basis. The space basis, being unique, posed some novel questions. For example, the movement of mail is not evenly balanced in both directions: there may be three carloads of mail moving from Baltimore to Washington daily whereas only two may be returning. However, the railroad must, under penalty of fine for failure to provide needed equipment, return all three cars to Baltimore promptly so that they can be reloaded. The difference, which is the rule rather than the exception—is called directional unbalance. A round-trip rate would, therefore, be the fairest method of compensating all railroads.

The railroads are required to carry mail in specially designed cars rather than in the less costly freight cars except during the Christmas rush. No commodity other than mail may be loaded in these cars which are made to travel in fast passenger trains.

Mail is rarely, if ever, moved in freight cars, except during the peak of the Christmas rush. Railway post office cars, and cars for transporting storage mail or express, are much more costly to construct than ordinary freight cars. Under regulations of the Post Office Department, no commodity other than mail may be loaded by the railroads in a railway post office car, and such cars unless used by the Department in both directions must be returned empty. Storage mail cars are equipped with special running equipment such as wheels, automatic brakes, and so forth, so they may meet the requirements necessary for them to move in fast passenger trains. These cars must be kept in passenger service and moved in passenger trains and returned to origin promptly. Were they permitted to enter freight service, prompt return to origin would be impossible and efficiency of the mail service would suffer.

The present railway mail rates were fixed by the ICC upon evidence of the actual cost of the service. So long as the total compensation to the roads does not exceed the total cost to the roads of providing the service, there certainly is no railroad subsidy from the Government. As a matter of fact, the present rates do not meet the cost of service. In 1947 upon evidence that the cost was $1.54 for every $1 of compensation received, the ICC authorized a 25-percent increase in the rates which had been set in 1928. It is common knowledge that in the last 3 years numerous wage increases and rises in the cost of materials have occurred.

The rate paid by the Post Office Department is 50.62 cents per mile for a 60-foot car and two-thirds of that, or 33.75 cents per mile, for a 40-foot car even though the latter holds more mail because of higher ceilings. These rates may be compared to the average rate on freight commodities of 39.75 cents per mile for a 40-foot car which figure projected would mean 59.25 for a 60-foot car.

There are additional facts relevant to the question: A shipper of freight loads and unloads his freight whereas all mail must be loaded and unloaded by railroad labor. Wage increases in recent years, together with the 40-hour week which became effective September 1, 1949, have increased the cost of handling mail at terminals, so that I am advised that such cost is more than 40 percent of the total railroad revenue for mail transportation. It should be realized that the revenues received is properly chargeable for railroad equipment for handling the mail and for land, buildings, and other facilities (in the District of Columbia more than 25 percent of the space is used for mail purposes). An allowance of only 10 percent for this factor would mean that about 50-percent compensation is spent before anything is earned in the actual carriage of the mail.

In addition there are train crews engaged in transporting the mail over the rails, plus the many experts in rail movement who must be paid. In unloading parcel post the railroad employees must read the address on each package and reload "beyond" mail in another car. No compensation other than the mileage rate is made for this service.

Let me point out that at the end of the year 1948 (December 17) an Emergency Board appointed by the President of the United States, after considering the demands of the nonoperating railroad brotherhoods, recommended that a 40-hour week, with 48 hours' pay should be established effective September 1, 1949. The railroads accepted this Board recommendation and arrived at full agreement with the nonoperating brotherhoods so that the 40-hour week became effective on September 1, 1949, as recommended. I do not criticize the Board, the nonoperating brotherhoods, or the railroads in any way. On the contrary, I commend them all for the fine American spirit of cooperation shown. Labor is entitled to fair and just compensation, and so are the railroads. But the Post Office Department did not and has not yet increased the rate of pay to the railroads for transporting the mail to assist them in meeting this added wage cost for railroad employees who are engaged in loading, unloading, and sorting the mail at terminals. On the other hand, this additional wage expense consequently further depleted the railroad revenue for transporting mail.

Indeed, I find that statistics show that the increase in the straight-time railroad rate of pay to railroad employees increased 92.8 percent from 1939 to 1949. The establishment on September 1, 1949, of the so-called 40-hour week of course required the employment of more men because the railroads must operate and the mail must move 7 days per week. I find that in October 1949, 1 month following the inauguration of the 40-hour week on September 1 of that year, the straight-time hourly rate of pay to railroad employees had increased 112.4 percent over 1939. Thus, if the labor cost of more than $63,000,000 for handling mail at stations in 1948 were increased by 19.6 percent, and assuming the volume of mail had not increased, the portion of railway mail revenue paid directly to platform labor alone would be almost 40 percent.

Of course, the railway mail revenue was higher in the calendar year 1949 than it was in 1948 because of a greatly increased volume. But the rate of pay to the railroads had not been increased, and the heavier the mail the more labor required to handle it. Therefore, the fractional ratio of platform labor cost to revenue would remain approximately the same, regardless of volume, although in dollars, the railroad losses from mail transportation would be heavily increased.

I have no means of ascertaining the precise total costs incurred by the railroads in transporting mail for our Government. But obviously the cost of labor to load, unload and sort the mail at railroad terminals for the Post Office Department must be but a small portion of the total cost. The rolling stock used to carry the mail is expensive—more so than ordinary freight cars. The railroads must provide and maintain their own right-of-way and tracks and pay taxes upon them. They must pay their operating crews and other employees fair and reasonable compensation.

To summarize, I point out again that the law requires that the railroads be fully and adequately compensated. The Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to fix the rates upon a compensatory basis. One increase of 25 percent in 1947 is the only increase in mail rates since 1928.

As I have already stated, the question of whether or not a railroad should be compensated for transportation of mail on a one-way or on a round-trip basis is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. This issue was committed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commission by Congress under the 1916 act. The Commission, by letter of May 25, 1949, from its Chairman to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, stated specifically that "The Commission has complete authority" to provide for railway mail rates other than on a round-trip basis "if the evidence justifies it." The Commission Chairman stated incidentally, however, that there "appear to be sound reasons for the provision that compensation should be on a round-trip basis."

The point is that in the Mail Pay case, Docket No. 9200, now pending before the Commission, the issue of round-trip versus one-way rates has been specifically raised by the Post Office Department. The hearing on that issue, and the other issues involved in the case, is now assigned for hearing next month. It may be expected that the Post Office Department and the railroads will present their respective views and will support them by sworn testimony, in accordance with the rules of evidence and procedure which Congress has established.

The Interstate Commerce Commission will determine the cost of the service and adjust the compensation fairly. That is the administrative body to which we have delegated that duty. It is an expert body properly equipped to discharge that obligation in the best interests of the Post Office Department and the railroads. The point I wish to emphasize is that the mail revenues of the railroads must meet the full costs of the service, or the railroads, will be faced with deficits and uneconomical operation. Where the portion paid to labor for loading and unloading, before and after the actual transportation requires approximately 40 percent of the revenue received, the charge of mail subsidy to the American railroads has a hollow sound indeed. Money flowing from the Government through the railroads to the forces of railway employees has a most direct and beneficial effect upon our national economy. That effect, however, will be neutralized if the railroads through which it flows are not compensated fairly for the services they perform.

I believe that we may rest assured that the confidence heretofore reposed in the Commission will not be abused and I should prefer to entrust the matter entirely to the well-tested processes of that expert and well-qualified body.

Legislative Responsibility for Judicial Reorganization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the text of an address prepared by Hon. Tom C. Clark, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, for delivery at the judiciary dinner of the United States on September 19, 1950.

The title of this speech is "Legislative Responsibility for Judicial Reorganization."

The dinner in question was so long that this address could not be made.

Having been granted the courtesy of seeing this advance copy of the speech, I cannot but feel that it would be a loss to the bar of this country if the text of this address should not be made available in a public record. The thoughts of Mr. Justice Clark are so cogent, and his expressions are at once so forceful and so timely, that I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of this address may be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE RESPONSIBILITY FOR JUDICIAL REORGANIZATION

(By Tom C. Clark)

I am most grateful for the opportunity to share this rostrum with the distinguished representatives from our sister English-speaking democracies and with our own honored chairman of the Conference of Chief Justices and the able president of the American Bar Association. As one of the most recent judicial appointees present, I am almost reluctant to discuss the subject of judicial reorganization before this gathering of eminent lawyers and jurists, many of whom bring here a richer experience and greater wisdom than my own. I feel somewhat like the brigadier general whose position in the hierarchy of field officers was described by an old top sergeant as "the lowest form of general." However, I am reassured by my discovery this past year that justices of the Supreme Court, popular belief to the contrary, never have the last word. My mistakes and oversights, while not available as reversible errors, are not likely to go unchallenged, if only by the omniscient student editors of our law reviews.

The French philosopher of democracy de Tocqueville has long been a favorite of American judges. This, I am confident, is not solely because of his flattering toast that "The peace, prosperity and the very existence of the Union are vested" in the judges. But that tribute at least establishes his qualification as an authority so that I may mention more seriously the observation in his brilliant study of American democracy a century ago that judicial power "is * * * peculiarly adapted to the wants of freedom. * * * The strength of the courts of law has always been the greatest security that can be offered to personal independence; but this is more especially the case in democratic ages." In the period since de Tocqueville wrote, the relation of the judicial function to the other processes of the law has in some respects been modified: Legislation rather than judicial law-making has become the principal source of the law's growth, and the administrative process now accounts for much of the total volume of adjudication. However, these developments, when considered in the context of judicial review, have confirmed the relation as de Tocqueville saw it between the strength of the judiciary and the security of our republican form of government. Courts that lack for courage and independence make a mockery of the democratic principle. This precept has persistent timeliness. In the perspective it affords, your efforts to strengthen the judicial function are of the greatest importance to the future of democratic institutions.

Today our concept of freedom is being hammered by a new tyranny which is all the more menacing because by infiltration it attempts to destroy us. Our courts for some time have been under strong and persistent attack, our procedures ridiculed, our motives falsely represented, and our decisions derided. Despite this infamous world-wide campaign we have proudly seen our judges magnificent in their adherence to duty. However, we must not compound our troubles by failing to improve our judicial process. We must not be indifferent to opportunities for the improvement of the judiciary merely because it is under attack or because we also have urgent international responsibilities.

Indeed ours are favorable times in which to promote a general program for advancement of the administration of justice. The strengthening of our institutions for the impartial vindication of individual rights will further challenge alien systems and support our policy of a free and peaceful world. Such an objective should appeal to the high patriotism of our citizens and reinforce our allegiance to the institutions of democratic government. Moreover, the administration of the courts is an area of government in which progress is favored by wide general agreement as to objectives among the public and their legislative representatives on the one hand, and the Bench and Bar as proponents of judicial reform on the other. All of us demand a system of just, inexpensive, and prompt determination of controversies by courts whose independence and efficiency will promote the general security and protect and preserve individual rights.

To say that our State ccurts are seriously in need of modernization is not to minimize our appreciation of the high standard of performance which they have maintained. But the operation of our courts must be adapted, as we would adapt any other institution or business, to the progress, the ever-changing needs, and the growing experience of a free people. Anachronisms in our judicial organization and management must be excised, and the elements of permanent value retained. The problem was clearly indicated by a Minnesota committee several years ago:

"The explanation of the inadequacy of our present judicial system lies in the fact that it was adopted to meet the needs of an earlier day having a simpler civilization and very different economic and social conditions. It has never been adjusted to the tempo of the present day, with all of its economic and social complexities. * * * Little attention has been paid to coordination or the orderly development of what could properly be called a judicial system. Rather lack of system became the rule."

Modernization has been effected to a large degree in some States, and their notable progress affords a pattern for action in jurisdictions in which the existing court structure is not yet geared to perform the heavy demands imposed upon it. In the latter States the telling symptom of the strain on judicial organization is the inability of the courts to dispose of the business before them with reasonable promptness. For example, the last report of the Judicial Council of New York State reflects alarming delays in cases filed in metropolitan centers. In New York County there was a delay of 32 months between the docketing and the trial of a jury case; in Kings County it was 27 months; Queens was somewhat better with a 21-month delay, while the Bronx had the relatively good record of 18 months. Likewise, the Judicial Council in Connecticut in its most recent announcement reported that delay in the trial of jury cases in the more populous counties had resulted in almost three times as many suits remaining on the docket as in 1946. In Wayne County (Detroit), Mich., the delay between the time a case is ready to be tried and the trial was reported to have skyrocketed from a minimum of 10 months in 1938 to 20 months 10 years later. In Texas at the time of the most recent report 94,949 cases had remained on the dockets untried for over a year, and 66,625 for over 2 years.

I have referred to these four States only because they are among the few for which statistics are available. Seventeen States, perhaps because they are reluctant to verify that delay exists in their courts, have failed to provide statistics showing the condition of their dockets. The disturbing fact is that only five States have complete statistics available, although such information is requisite to evaluation of the judicial needs of a jurisdiction. However, there is strong reason to believe that in most of the States there are unreasonable delays.

Generally speaking the difficulty is not that there are too few courts or judges. Although judges in metropolitan areas are often overworked, judges of comparable jurisdiction in other districts are hardly kept busy. This difference is not the doing of the judges, for all of them would prefer to stay busy; it results from a failure of administration that prevents the full utilization of judicial manpower. The chief difficulty is the lack of central control over the judiciary by a responsible administrator with authority to assign and transfer judges and cases from court to court as conditions require. As Chief Justice Vanderbilt's monumental survey has disclosed, there are 11 States in which neither the State supreme court nor any central agency has control over lower courts; seven States in which the highest court possesses such power but has not exercised it; 10 States in which there is a minor degree of administrative control, limited, however, to courts within a narrow geographical district and not exercised on a Statewide basis; 16 States which have some partial measure of control through a central State authority; and only four States which have a central State court or agency with the degree of effective control over court business which is necessary to administer properly the affairs of the judicial branch.

Another factor handicapping the courts in many jurisdictions is the absence of judicial authority to adopt rules of procedure. The principle of judicial responsibility for rule-making has been accepted as to civil proceedings in only 23 jurisdictions and as to criminal proceedings in only 14. Legislative occupation of the rule-making field has made it impossible for courts to replace time-consuming and excessively technical procedures with simple, easily applicable rules designated to facilitate the conduct of lawsuits.

Further inadequacy in many of our judicial systems results from the unsatisfactory organization of the inferior courts. Characteristically in our States there are minor courts of concurrent jurisdiction without sufficient business among them to justify multiple units. Often courts which combine the functions of chief executive of the county are administered by persons chosen for their business or administrative skill rather than for their knowledge of the law. Probate and other matters are subject to almost interminable delay because retrial is permitted after the decision of the inferior court. Juvenile and family matters which are of primary importance for the very existence of our society are not infrequently sandwiched in at times when they receive only summary consideration. Justices of the peace and similar courts handling minor offenses such as traffic violations are in many communities influenced by political considerations, and in all but two States there is no requirement for professional training of the magistrates which preside over them. Yet these are the courts in which one in five of our citizens appears every year and which shape in large measure the popular impression of the administration of justice. The picture they present is one of costly and prolonged proceedings and of judicial determination with all too often a meager quality of justice. Consolidation of the jurisdiction of the inferior courts, improvement of the professional qualifications of their judges, and the integration of those courts into a unified state judicial system are essentials.

The improvement of judicial organization and administration in the various jurisdictions must be supplemented by revision of the methods of selecting judges, and of the conditions of their tenure and compensation. In 35 States there is a requirement of popular election of most judges; in only 6 States are both trial and appellate judges appointed, and in only 3 of these do they hold office during good behavior. Moreover, in 23 States the justices of the State supreme court are paid $10,000 a year or less and in 10 more States the salary does not exceed $15,000 a year. The necessity for expensive or distasteful political activity, the brief tenure of office, and existing constitutional or statutory limitations on compensation have discouraged many persons of high ability from judicial service and have undoubtedly made it difficult for many of those who have served to maintain an impartial attitude.

Improvement of the administration of justice in our courts depends upon the fulfillment of three objectives—unity of administration, simplicity of organization, and integrity and ability of the judges. The advancement of our State judicial systems requires that these objectives be recognized as of coordinate importance, that no one of them be neglected or sacrificed. The problem was put well by Dean Pound with characteristic vision many years ago: "Things are done by the combined working of men and machinery. * * * Our ideal must be the right men with the right machinery."

In a notable address last year on the occasion of the first meeting of the Conference of Chief Justices, the Chief Justice of the United States related to you the successful work of the bench and bar in securing the adoption by Congress of the administrative program now followed in the Federal courts. Our distinguished Chief Justice pointed out that in a short dozen years the program has assumed first importance in maintaining the Federal courts on a sound and business-like basis. He suggested this conference consider the desirability of establishing comparable administrative organizations auxiliary to the State courts. Chief Justice Vinson then declared significantly that those to whom State judicial officers "must turn for authority—the legislatures—have not in most cases sanctioned programs as ambitious as * * * are necessary." He counseled that "You must convince * * * the legislature in your State that continuing improvement in court administration through adoption of business-like methods is vital to public confidence in and respect for the courts."

The present responsibility of our State legislatures is as broad as the needs of their people for an independent, competent and efficient judicial process. The task of advancing the necessary legislative and constitutional proposals is one not only for the bar but particularly for the judges. In some jurisdictions, judges have been counted among those favoring these recommendations. Further progress, however, will be difficult, if not impossible, unless the outspoken support of the judiciary is forthcoming. If the judges of a State do not take front-line positions in behalf of these fundamental proposals, the lawyers can hardly be expected to stand vigorously for changes in the structure of the courts before which they practice. But the interest of the judges should be expressed in recommendations made jointly with spokesmen of the bar and the public, preferably through judicial councils or other representative bodies.

The responsibility that rests upon our legislatures will not go unperformed when the needs of our democratic judicial process are brought before them by the united appeal of lawyers, laymen, and judges. The leadership of the lawyers and judges of this Section on Judicial Administration has been instrumental in the progress that has been made. It continues to be needed for completion of the task so ably begun.

Responsibility of Labor Unions Under Antitrust Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a short news item from the New York Times of today stating that the American Bar Association has adopted a resolution favoring legislation to make labor unions which enjoy a monopoly subject to antitrust laws when their activities jeopardize the national economy, health, or safety. That is in line with Senate bill 2912, which I introduced last January, which was unanimously reported by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to the full committee, and is still pending before the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUST CURBS ASKED BY BAR FOR UNIONS—LABOR GROUPS "MONOPOLISTIC," SHOULD BE UNDER SHERMAN ACT, REPORT DECLARES

(By Lewis Wood)

WASHINGTON, September 21.—A resolution asking that labor unions be made responsible under the antitrust laws when their activities "jeopardize the national economy, health, or safety" was approved by the house of delegates of the American Bar Association today. The resolution said that the unions should be brought within the scope of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The association is meeting here jointly with the Canadian Bar Association.

Holding that unions are "monopolistic" by nature, a committee report on the resolution said that they were generally free from antitrust law control.

"It now seems apparent," said the report, "that some restraint should be imposed upon the monopolistic power of labor unions when such power is exercised to imperil the national welfare. Most fair-minded people will agree that some power should be vested in the Federal Government to protect the public interests where the whole national economy is threatened by a strike in an essential industry."

Recent events indicate, said the report, that injunctions were not effective in stopping critical strikes.

RESOLUTION REFERRED FOR STUDY

"It seems appropriate," the report went on, "that the labor organizations, just like the business organizations, should be subject to criminal sanctions of the Sherman Act."

Report of Tydings Committee Investigating on Certain Charges Against the State Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Senate Whitewash Is a Black Mark," published in the Huronite and the Daily Plainsman, of Huron, S. Dak., for July 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE WHITEWASH IS A BLACK MARK

The report by Senators TYDINGS, MCMAHON, and GREEN denouncing Senator MCCARTHY'S charges against the State Department is one that is purely political in intent.

The aim of the three Democrat Senators who made up the majority of the five-man TYDINGS committee investigating (?) MCCARTHY'S charges of Communist influence was not so much to prove the State Department innocent as it was to criticize MCCARTHY for a "sinister campaign."

It was obvious in the conduct of the investigation that the purpose of TYDINGS was to whitewash the administration. To that end, the President denied access to the loyalty files and TYDINGS several times made deliberate misstatements to the press that he and his fellow committee members had seen certain files and that nothing had been taken from them. FBI Chief Hoover publicly had to say that TYDINGS was wrong in quoting Hoover that the files had not been rifled. And despite the fact that a week ago MCCARTHY produced signed affidavits from a former FBI man and three former State Department employees that they had been employed at one time to clear out of the loyalty files in the State Department any embarrassing material, the committee declared in the majority report that the files were okay, had not been tampered with, and revealed nothing unfavorable.

The amazing part about the majority report is the manner in which it castigates scathingly Senator MCCARTHY. They hesitated not one bit to criticize bitterly and calumnify a United States Senator who started life a relatively poor boy, worked hard, became a circuit judge in Wisconsin, saw lots of action in the Pacific theater as an officer in a Marine fighter squadron, who went on missions as a gunner and intelligence officer, and was elected United States Senator.

That man they tried to crucify with the help of many proadministration columnists, while they gave a clean bill of health of MCCARTHY'S targets. And who were the heroes to whom the committe gave a clean bill of health? These are some.

1. Owen J. Lattimore, who wasn't proved to be a member of the Communist Party, but who certainly was proved by documents, pictures and testimony to have been a close friend and confidante of proved Communists while he was supposedly working for the United States. He was also the man who advised the State Department in October 1949 to abandon Korea to the Communists and to let the Communists have a freer hand in Japan and Indochina. Those facts are in the record.

2. John J. Service, a career diplomat in the State Department and supposed expert on the Far East, who transported out of the office secret files and papers on the Far East to Philip Jaffe, Communist editor of Amerasia magazine, a small magazine devoted to far eastern affairs. That fact he admitted himself on the witness stand. A lot of people knew Jaffe was a Communist. If Service was the expert the State Department said he was, he also certainly knew. So he gave him secret documents. He did not give them to the AP or UP reporters, or the New York Times or Washington Post. He gave them to a man pretty well known as a Communist. MCCARTHY had a longer list of charges against Service, but that one Service himself admitted and that one alone should condemn him as the bad security risk MCCARTHY said he was. But the TYDINGS majority overlooks Service's own confession, slapped him on the wrist for indiscretion, and said that he was not either a bad risk.

3. The Department of Justice and other administration officials who completely botched the 1945 Amerasia stolen-documents case. The TYDINGS majority committee report gave the Government a clean bill of health in the Amerasia case, and that is absolutely amazing, if not downright disheartening and disgusting to every intelligent American. For it was very obvious from the surface facts of the case that the Government failed to punish traitors and spies and protected some people, although the evidence was unmistakable.

On March 12, 1945, Office of Strategic Services, (cloak-and-dagger) agents raided the office of Amerasia and found hundreds of Government documents there—all of them from State Department secret files and many of them marked top secret and containing top level military information on the war. How did those hundreds of secret and top secret documents get from State Department files in Washington to Amerasia office files in New York? Nobody ever explained it and the Tydings committee hushed it up just as the Department of Justice did in 1945 when it got indictments for only three out of six persons arrested (one of them a naval lieutenant) and the judge fined editor Communist Jaffe a paltry $2,500, a second one $500 and dismissed the charges against the third. The story of the raid and what was found made headlines in March 1945. No group—and least of all the Tydings committee—investigated to get the full explanation of just who was the traitor in the State Department. Or traitors.

And the TYDINGS' committee blasts MCCARTHY for his "sinister campaign" in asking questions about it and reports that the Government—meaning the State Department and the Department of Justice—gets a clean bill of health for the way it handled the Amerasia case.

These facts add up to nothing more nor less than an official condonement of treachery in the Amerasia case, a pat on the back for the man who is obviously a bad security risk in the Service case and a posy for the man who advised his country to take the exact course the Communists wanted, to the disadvantage of the United States, and a course which has now been directly reversed, in the Lattimore case. In truth, the Lattimore line of "we should not defend Korea" undoubtedly encouraged the Red attack there.

Not only does the report whitewash those things but it then proceeds in an attempt to crucify an American who wanted the whole double-crossed American public to know about them!

The Tydings committee is truly bad tidings, and, to paraphrase its description of MCCARTHY'S charges the report itself is "a fraud and a hoax" upon the American public.

Republicans-for-Lucas League

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, recently in a press conference the President of the United States recalled that often in the Senate I vote with the Republicans. It is true that I do vote as I see questions regardless of political party sponsorship. Consequently I get great satisfaction out of the knowledge that Illinois Republicans have formed the Republicans-for-Lucas League to support actively the majority leader and my revered friend, SCOTT W. LUCAS, in his campaign for reelection to the United States Senate. On September 22, Paul Potter, cochairman of this league, presided on a radio program in which numerous Republican leaders paid down-to-earth and warm tribute to the distinguished statesman from Illinois, SCOTT W. LUCAS.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD, a copy of that program so that Congress and the country may know the affection and respect in which Republicans in his home State hold SCOTT W. LUCAS.

There being no objection, the script was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LUCAS. My friends in Illinois, this will be my last broadcast sponsored by a group of Republican citizens and independent voters who are strongly supporting me for reelection to the United States Senate this year. Next week I will begin a series of broadcasts in which I will discuss the major issues of the 1950 campaign.

In these reports from Washington I have discussed with you important legislation affecting the foreign policy of America and the future of the free way of life. I have tried to be completely objective in these broadcasts, because I am a firm believer in the principle of bipartisanship on all matters which affect the fundamental safety and security of our country and our civilization.

The Republican voters and independent citizens who have sponsored these radio reports have done so because they feel that I have made a consistent effort to place the welfare of my country above any considerations of political advantages. I am deeply grateful to them for their confidence and faith in me.

I can assure all the people of Illinois that I have never cast a vote on any piece of legislation affecting the national defense or the foreign policy of America with any thought of playing upon the political passions of the people. When I am relected to the Senate on November 7, I pledge to you that I will continue the steadfast course I have pursued during my years of public service.

For this closing broadcast, I have with me several members of the Republicans for Lucas League. I want you to hear from Paul Potter, cochairman of this league, a bona fide registered Republican and prominent businessman from Lake County, who is working enthusiastically and vigorously for my relection. Here is Mr. Potter.

Mr. POTTER. I am pleased to participate with many other staunch supporters of the senior Senator in Illinois, SCOTT W. LUCAS, and work for his reelection by an overwhelming majority on November 7. I know that there are thousands of businessmen in this State who are deeply concerned about the future of this Nation, of their business, and the welfare of their families. Much depends upon the leadership in the Senate in the next 6 years in guiding whatever administration is in the White House along the lines that will be for the best interests of the American people. A large number of us feel that we are not in any way deserting the Republican Party in forming the Republicans for Lucas League. Rather, we feel that the Republican Party leaders in Illinois have in fact deserted the voters of this party in attempting to sidetrack the avowed foreign policies on which the last Republican Presidential campaign was conducted. The American bipartisan foreign policy, authored by Senator VANDENBERG, Senator LUCAS, Senator CONNALLY, and others, is vital as a bulwark for freedom and peace among the nations of the earth.

Six years ago thousands of good Republicans took this same action at the polls. Such action followed the voluntary and spontaneous formation of a State-wide movement, called the Republicans for Lucas League. We campaigned in our own districts and communities, for the man we feel best qualified for the important Senate seat, regardless of party. We want the State of Illinois up in front on all vital questions of both foreign and domestic policy. SCOTT LUCAS, as majority leader in the Senate, has done just that. Speaking fearlessly and showing qualities of leadership in the Senate, he reflects favorably on this great State of Lincoln's training for leadership.

Now, with vital problems of world concern before us, why should Illinois risk a change that would put this State down the list in important Senate committees and influence? Seniority and experience are needed now as never before in Congress. SCOTT LUCAS is revered and respected on both sides of the floor, in Senate debate and in reconciling important differences. He stood up for the Anderson plan, when his State's farm interest were paramount, just as he opposed the packing of the Supreme Cour' in a previous Congress. He is capable. He is hard working and conscientious. He has qualities of leadership that befit a Senator from Illinois. That's why so many will disregard party politics this November, and vote for Senator LUCAS again.

You can help by signifying your willingness to vote for SCOTT LUCAS on November 7 and ask many others to do likewise.

I would now like to call on the co-chairman of our Republicans for Lucas League in Illinois, Mr. Oakley Adkins, who is a farmer in Mason County, the home county of Senator LUCAS, and is also Republican member of the board of supervisors. Oakley Adkins.

MR. ADKINS. Senator SCOTT LUCAS and I live in the same county. I have known him for 25 years, and I have watched him develop from State's attorney of our county to his present position as majority leader of the United States Senate.

The people of his home county have a warm affection for SCOTT LUCAS, as well as a great admiration for his ability and his achievements. He has many friends in both political parties.

Although I am a Republican and Senator LUCAS is a Democrat, I am supporting him for reelection to the Senate this year, as I did in 1944, because I believe that he has served all the people of Illinois during his years in the Senate. He has been one of the leaders in creating and maintaining our bipartisan foreign policy. I have backed that policy because I know that it offers us a constructive program for attaining an enduring peace in the world.

As a farmer, I know that SCOTT LUCAS deserves credit for helping to establish the national farm program which has brought us such tremendous prosperity to the farmers of Illinois. I know that the Republican candidate for the Senate tried to cripple the soil-conservation program, the rural-electrification program, and other programs vital to all farmers regadless of party. Senator LUCAS has a splendid farm record and his opponent has a very bad record.

So my belief in our successful farm program is another reason for my strong support of Senator LUCAS. We know that Senator LUCAS is opposed to the Brannan plan.

As cochairman of the Republicans for Lucas League, I am very pleased and happy about the enthusiastic response of Illinois Republicans to the league's call for bipartisan backing for Senator LUCAS. It is a source of great satisfaction to know that in this grave hour of history independent Republican citizens all over our country are rising above party considerations to express their faith and confidence in the wisdom, the high ability, and the sound integrity of our senior Senator, SCOTT LUCAS. Messages of support have come to me from Republicans all over our State who realize that Senator LUCAS is one of the foremost leaders of America today.

These Republicans share my conviction that it would be a tragedy for our State and for our country to lose his splendid services at a time when the fate of civilization despends upon wise leadership.

Senator LUCAS has worked in harmony with Senator VANDENBERG to keep America in the forefront of the free world. He deserves to be reelected because he is a statesman who has earned the respect and honor of his fellow Americans.

MR. POTTER. Thank you, Mr. Adkins. Now, I would like to call on Mr. David Garrick, a businessman in Streator.

MR. GARRICK. I am happy to be on this program as an independent Republican here in Streator. I am proud that I was permitted to introduce SCOTT LUCAS at a luncheon in his honor here in Streator today, given by independent voters and Republicans. I wish that every Republican in Illinois who is interested in independent thought and action could have heard the frank, patriotic, and independent speech the Senator made to the large audience assembled. It is a further pleasure and distinct honor to appear on this program sponsoring the Senator's reelection.

MR. POTTER. Thank you, Mr. Garrick. I would now like to call on Mr. Chester Wonderlin, a businessman in Bloomington, Ill., secretary of the Republicans for Lucas League in Illinois.

MR. WONDERLIN. As secretary of the Republicans for Lucas League, I am delighted to participate in this program. I want the people of Illinois to know that we independent Republicans have wholeheartedly sponsored and paid for this movement to reelect Senator LUCAS on November 7.

MR. POTTER. Now, I would like to call on Mr. Ken Braendle, of Havana, Ill., the home town of Senator LUCAS, who is editor of a paper there and who has volunteered to be an executive director of the Republicans for Lucas League in Illinois—Mr. Braendle.

MR. BRAENDLE. A few weeks ago at the Abraham Lincoln Hotel in the capital city of Illinois, it was my pleasure and privilege to become affiliated with the Republicans for Lucas League, an organization brought into being for the sole purpose of helping to reelect SCOTT W. LUCAS to the United States Senate.

My reasons for becoming identified with this movement are substantially the same as those which motivated the other Republicans present, and here, please let me interject that although Senator LUCAS is a resident of Havana and Mason County and the folks there are mighty proud of him, that is perhaps the very least of my own reasons for advocating his return to the Senate at the election this fall. There are many reasons which to me are much more important than the mere fact that SCOTT LUCAS lives in my home town.

For instance, it is important to me and to every farmer-citizen of the great Midwest, that SCOTT LUCAS is a friend of agriculture. He has proved that, time after time by his vote on legislation affecting the lives and fortunes of the American farmer. This record is written not in words alone, but in the twinkling lights of thousands of farm homes right here in Illinois; in the labor-saving devices, the comforts of life, the convenience and added efficiency that only electricity can bring. The Illinois farmer and his family remember that SCOTT LUCAS was their stanch friend in the fight for funds to electrify the American farm.

And what a boon it was for the businessman who provided the farmer with the thousand-and-one electrical contrivances now in common use—motors, refrigerators, ironers, radios, washing machines, stoves—the modern conveniences so essential in the American way of life, that only a few short years ago were unavailable to those living more than just a short distance from a town or city. The manifold benefits of electrification to the farmer, the businessman and the laborer, are simply incalculable.

Add to this record that Senator LUCAS has always been in the vanguard of those who have battled for equitable prices for the products of agriculture, for soil conservation, the benefits of which are becoming apparent as our Nation grows older, and you will agree with me that SCOTT LUCAS is indeed one of the greatest friends of the farmer in the United States Senate.

Another principal reason convincing me that there is something far more important than voting Republican in the senatorial race at this time is the record of this great American liberal, who with scant regard for his political future, has persistently and courageously waged a determined battle for adequate American defenses, for the bipartisan foreign policy, the world's last remaining hope for an enduring peace. With vision and fortitude, he has labored hand in hand with the other patriotic statesmen who created the bipartisan foreign policy and placed the welfare of their country above partisan politics. Certainly America cannot revert to primitive isolationism. We cannot retreat from a bold program to defeat communism. We cannot abandon our friends in Europe and Asia to the Kremlin and its satellite. America and the world needs stalwart men like SCOTT LUCAS and ARTHUR VANDENBERG in the United States Senate.

Illinois needs Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS. Illinois can lead with LUCAS. Illinois can render a monumental service to the American farmer, the American laborer, the American businessman, and the world by returning him to the United States Senate.

MR. POTTER. Thank you, Mr. Braendle, and now, Senator, we would like to hear from you again.

Senator LUCAS. Gentlemen, I thank you from the bottom of my heart for these kind and generous words, the confidence you have reposed in me. And I assure you it will never be abused. With such independent help, victory is assured on November 7.

The McCarran-Wood Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, the President's message vetoing the McCarran-Wood bill will go down in history as a truly great American statement. It should be studied by every American.

It is the duty of the Congress and the President to maintain internal security, but it also is their duty to preserve the rights and privileges and freedoms of the American people.

Those who have used the Korean crisis to enlarge their wave of fear and panic that they might force through legislation to fetter the mind and spirit of America are sapping the well springs of our strength.

The President is not indifferent to communism or the dangers of espionage and sabotage by Communist agents. He has asked for legislation to strengthen those laws necessary to fight communism, and in this I have fully supported him.

Today I have introduced a bill which, in my opinion, would deal adequately with the problem of maintaining our internal security without impinging on the rights and freedoms and privileges of the American people, which the Wood-McCarran bill undoubtedly will do.

The Wood-McCarran bill which the President has vetoed would not deal accurately and realistically with the dangers of Communist action. Instead, it would undermine those American freedoms that make our fight against communism essential.

All of us want to do everything that is really necessary to protect ourselves from the evil of communism. But it would be tragic indeed if we were to undercut the freedom of our own people, and detract from our leadership in the world fight for freedom against communism in the process of doing so.

I have voted against the Wood bill in the House of Representatives because I felt that this particular bill would be entirely ineffective to prevent Communist espionage and sabotage, while undermining fundamental liberties guaranteed under the Constitution. I have voted for every measure which I felt was genuinely aimed at making America strong against Communist attack from within and without our borders.

I feel that my reasons for opposing the Wood bill have now been upheld by the President's veto. That decision of the President to veto was reached after consultation with the security and intelligence agencies of the Government. The Department of Justice, the Department of Defense, the Central Intelligency Agency, and the Department of State all concurred that the bill would seriously damage the security and intelligence operations for which they were responsible.

We must be secure in this Nation from the work of traitors, but our greatest danger is not treason; it is the fear and hysteria which jeopardize those freedoms which are our greatest weapon and our greatest treasure.

Hon. Alexander Wiley's Educational Motion Picture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a release which I have issued on the subject of a 16 mm. educational motion picture which I have prepared and which I am releasing among Wisconsin civic organizations.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this release be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WILEY INVITES ORGANIZATIONS TO BORROW HIS NEWLY PRODUCED 16 MM. MOTION PICTURE; AN EDUCATIONAL FILM, DESCRIBING AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AMIDST KOREAN CRISIS

Production and release of a 16 mm. sound motion picture on the problems of American Government amidst the Korean emergency, have been announced by Senate ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Chippewa Falls).

Arrangements are now being made for lending free prints of the educational, nonpartisan film to Wisconsin civic organizations requesting their use.

"I have prepared this 22 minute film entitled 'America in Crisis' at my own expense in order to show the American people some of the problems which we face at home and abroad in this midcentury," Senator WILEY said. "This film is one more means by which I feel a legislator can report to his constituents. In this modern age, it is essential that Congressmen use the most modern type of communications available."

GOVERNMENT AGENCIES FURNISHED PART OF FOOTAGE

The Wisconsin Senator has long been keenly interested in motion pictures as a powerful medium of information.

He has expressed his appreciation of the cooperation shown to him by the United States Signal Corps in making available documentary footage, the United States Corps of Engineers in enabling him to use motion picture sound studio equipment at the Engineers Research Development Laboratory, and several other Government agencies which also cooperated in furnishing brief film clips for the project. Costs for commercial processing of the film, etc., were paid out of Senator WILEY's pocket, however.

THEME OF FILM IS WISCONSINITE'S VISIT TO CAPITOL

The theme of the picture is Senator Wiley Reports To Bill Jones, an Average Wisconsinite. The preface shows Bill Jones, an amputee veteran (played by a serviceman who had actually lost an arm in combat) coming up the Capitol steps in order to "find out what it is all about."

One of the opening scenes shows the United States Capitol on which have been superimposed battle scenes of American Infantry in action, thus symbolizing the fight of GI's to preserve American freedom.

The main emphasis of the film is on the crisis of United States foreign policy arising out of Communist aggression. The background to the Korean war is shown in scenes of the signing in 1928 of the Kellog-Briand Peace Treaty, scenes of destruction in World War II, the explosion of the first atomic bomb in New Mexico, the activities of the United Nations, as well as Signal Corps footage of Dictator Joseph Stalin.

The home front is not neglected in that there is extensive footage also showing scenes of America's basic freedoms as well as her problems—industrial justice, dust bowls, and other key issues of the past, present, and future.

WISCONSIN CIVIC ORGANIZATIONS INVITED TO REQUEST FREE LOAN OF FILM

The Senator has issued an invitation to all Wisconsin civic organizations to write to him to obtain a free print of the film. The prints will be loaned without charge to any public-spirited organization—veterans' groups, farm, women's organizations, service clubs, youth groups, schools, churches, forums, and any other civic-minded organization which wants to show factually what Congress' work is like and how our two other branches—executive and judicial—work.

PROCEDURE FOR BORROWING OF PRINT

An organization president or secretary desiring to borrow a print should write to: Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Senate Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

The following data should be furnished to the Senator: (a) Organization before which the picture will be shown; (b) approximate number of people expected at showing; (c) date of showing.

The print will be promptly forwarded from Washington. All that the organization need do is exercise care in the print's handling and pay the slight postage for promptly forwarding the print on to the next group in that area which has requested it. The next recipient's name and address will be forwarded by the Senator along with the print.

"In order to have as many folks as possible see the film, we will try to schedule the mailing of the limited number of prints as carefully and tightly as possible, rather than allow the prints to lie around unused."

DOCUMENTARY FILM IS FIRST OF ITS KIND BY A LEGISLATOR

It has been pointed out that although a few Members of the Congress have made 16 millimeter motion-picture films, those films have usually been exclusively devoted to stock shots of the Senate and House, or of Washington statues and memorials. "America in Crisis" is the first legislator-produced motion picture which actually shows some of the basic problems in current affairs, like the problem of military preparedness and other issues, and which attempts, moreover, to use the motion-picture medium in a modest, semiprofessional way with a varied musical soundtrack.

Work on the nonpolitical film was performed during evenings and in a few afternoons when the pressure of Senate activities permitted.

AIM OF FILM TO STIMULATE THINKING

Senator WILEY narrates only a brief portion of the film and is himself seen on the screen for but a few feet. "My aim was to stimulate interest in our Government and to encourage thinking about its problem and the only way to accomplish that was by showing the key issues of our times themselves," the Badger Senator stated.

"I hope to tour much of Wisconsin, showing the film myself. But since I am necessarily limited as to the number of audiences I can personally reach, I hope many organizations will write in for a print—and that they will, if necessary, borrow a 16-millimeter sound projector from some local source in order to show it."

Federal Tax Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this tax bill—H. R. 8920—which provides for increasing personal and corporate income taxes by $4,500,000,000, but I want to go on record as doing so under protest. I feel that the Congress has done a great injustice to the American people by its failure to include a tax on excess profits at this time.

Today corporation profits are running at the rate of $23,500,000,000 after taxes, which is the highest profit level in American history. These profits are the easiest and most accessible source of new revenues, and yet the excuse given for not levying an excess-profits tax is that "We have not time to take up such legislation."

I refuse to buy this "we haven't time" argument. The House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee have found time to increase income taxes—they have found time to increase the tax burden on the worker, the farmer, and the average citizen. But they just have not time to levy a tax on the bloated profits of the great corporations and monopolies. So the excess-profits tax has been postponed until after November.

This income-tax increase—and the failure to tax profits—has the effect of further breaking down the progressive nature of the Federal tax structure. It represents a continuation of the trend that began back in 1941 involving a shifting of a larger share of the tax burden from the corporations to the individual taxpayer, and from the big taxpayer to the low-income groups.

I will illustrate with a few statistics. In 1939 individual income taxes accounted for 25 percent of all Federal revenues, and corporation taxes accounted for 24 percent. Today, individual income taxpayers are furnishing 53 percent of Federal revenues—an increase of 28 percent—while corporations are paying only 23 percent, which is a drop of 1 percent. In short, the individual is paying an ever-greater part of the taxes, and the corporations are having their percentage share reduced.

Now, let us look at it from another angle. In 1939 those individuals with annual incomes below $5,000 paid only 10 percent of the income tax revenues. In 1949 those with incomes under $5,000 paid about 60 percent of income-tax revenues. This means that the tax burden has been shifted from the upper to the lower-income groups.

So I find it rather tragic that this Congress now insists on taxing incomes at increased rates but postpones action on excess profits. It is the same old story of selfish interests influencing the deliberations of Congress. I condemn this double standard whereby Congress soaks the little fellow but spares the profiteers and the corporations. I say that if there must be sacrifice, let there be equality of sacrifice. I cannot appreciate this kind of skullduggery—and our boys fighting in Korea—and their families who must wait until December 1 before receiving their allowance checks—are not going to appreciate it, either.

The Giant Awakens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. KRUSE, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, America is today forcefully and determinedly fulfilling its role as the leader among free nations of the world. In this connection I wish to call the attention of the House to a significant and splendid editorial which appeared in a recent issue of the Fort Wayne Journal Gazette.

The editorial reads as follows:

THE GIANT AWAKENS

The spirit of the benevolent giant among nations which America displayed during World War II is awakening again.

We see it in the daring landing of United States troops far behind the enemy lines in Korea.

We see it in the various moves which are being taken to strengthen the Nation's defenses.

The frustrations which have been evident for the past year or two will soon begin to disappear as potential energy is harnessed in a mighty effort for freedom.

Would-be world conquerors in the Kremlin should not underestimate the toughness and resourcefulness of the American people once they set themselves to a major task. There has never been another nation like the United States since the dawn of history.

There is something different in the air of this New World. Perhaps the magic element is freedom. From that, all other distinguishing characteristics seem to flow.

We have been slow to rise to the challenge of Russian totalitarianism, hoping that the madness would somehow abate.

But the Korean aggression set off the burglar alarm and in the past few weeks we have done very well, for a nation which was supposed to have nothing to fight with except atomic bombs, in a situation where those weapons were not effective.

The anvil chorus of defeatism has been heard in every great cause in which America has ever participated. That is the poorly behaved minority, which is always with us.

Washington heard it during the Revolution, but he paid no attention to it. It was music in the ears of George III until the tide turned.

Lincoln heard it during the Civil War, but it did not sway him from his firm purpose. Jeff Davis counted too much on it.

Defeatism is not in the true American spirit. The spirit is to buckle down to do the job, and the bigger the job the better the effort.

We say that the United States is the benevolent giant among the nations, slow to arouse, but invincible in great actions worthy of its ideals.

Now we are mobilizing in defense of freedom and we say to Stalin "Stop, look and listen."

America has never bowed to the dictates of a tyrant and she never will.

It's against her principles.

Slandering Government Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, over the years it has been a partisan Republican pastime to not only ridicule and abuse the faithful and hard-working Federal employees but to slander indiscriminately and to vilify them without any cause or reason. Ofttimes it appeared to be for the sheer delight of doing so, a form of official sadism.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the printed hearings of the purposeful investigations reek with uncomplimentary references and sly innuendoes leveled against public officials, but more often with abuse of the subordinate Government employees innocent of any wrongdoing and helpless to defend themselves. It is a fact that Government personnel are generally employed at wages and salaries lower than are paid for comparable work in private industry, and work harder too.

They have progressively been called worse names as time went on. Thus in the early thirties the Federal employee was called an idler or a boondoggler, but later and more boldly, he was referred to as a bureaucratic chiseler to whatever degree his vilifier chose to malign him.

It seems that a competitive spirit of abuse and intimidation prevailed and extended throughout the entire Republican campaign organization in and out of season and included candidates from Congressman to constable, and not excepting the Republican Presidential nominee, who in his repertoire referred to Government employees as morons whom he promised to chastise and clean out in the greatest sweep ever to be undertaken in Washington. He failed to reach the opposite shore. He was swamped in the sea of ballots that saved the faithful Government worker from partisan vengeance, and for a while therefore the name calling and abuse subsided. In recent months, however, the campaign of vituperation reached the lowest depths of degradation when unfounded disloyalty charges and the brand of traitor, the lowest possible name, was applied to officials and employees without naming individuals, thus characterizing and placing all under suspicion.

It is a common and everyday occurrence to smear the Federal service with charges of socialism and vile communism, then adding insult to injury labeling the men and women as sex perverts.

Mr. Speaker, the pay-off comes once every 2 years, but it comes. Then the tables are turned, and then the immunity of the vilifier is meaningless. The Government employee whether in the Post Office, the Internal Revenue Bureau, or any other agency or department can and will strike back with the most effective secret weapon wielded behind the curtain of the election booth. All the ranting of the paid political commentators and of the "presstitutes" and other similar influences will not prevail against the retribution which is due and follows the sinful and indiscriminate slander just as sure as day follows the darkness of night.

Certainly it is the duty of officials and of plain citizens alike to help ferret out subversives and the inefficient and idle in Government, but honesty, sincerity, and decency must stand the test of specific charges being leveled against particular individuals who should be named. To do otherwise is unjust, false, and hypocritical. The American sense of fair play will not condone continuance of such practice.

A Summary of the Actions of the Eighty-first Congress on National and International Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. KRUSE, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, the second and final session of the Eighty-first Congress has not yet been concluded, but for all practical purposes the record has been made and I feel it very much in order to briefly review the accomplishments of this Congress. I therefore wish to set down the more outstanding measures of importance, without at the same time detracting therefrom by indulging in any considerable comment concerning the various legislative enactments. The record speaks for itself, and the Congress will be judged on such record regardless of partisan comment. It cannot be disputed that the Congress as a whole has been a very independent Congress; it has, generally speaking, been a Congress subservient to no one except the people of this great Nation. This Congress has on several occasions over-ridden Presidential vetoes and has on other occasions taken action directly contrary to the wishes of the Executive. It has also taken action in accordance with the position of the Executive, and the sum total of its accomplishments is indeed substantial, regardless of whether or not one may happen to disagree with certain of the legislative enactments.

It is interesting to note that the Eighty-first Congress is the tenth Democratic Congress since 1900, there having been 13 Republican-controlled Congresses since that time. In the House of Representatives of the Eighty-first Congress there were initially 262 Democrats, 171 Republicans and 1 American Labor Party Member. There were 118 new Members, 103 of whom were Democrats, and 15 of whom were Republicans. There were 9 women Members. The Senate consisted of 54 Democrats and 42 Republicans; there having been 18 new Senators, 14 of whom were Democrats and 4 Republicans.

It is obvious that this has been a Congress which weighed carefully the vital legislative issues brought forth for its consideration. This has unquestionably been a healthy condition for the country. I cannot help but again point out the fact that article I, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States places the legislative power of our Government in the Congress of the United States. Certainly there should be cooperation between the respective branches of our Government, but there never must be subservience. Our system of checks and balances constitutes in large measure our foundation of strength through which our future freedom and independence as a people and Nation may be maintained.

Mr. Speaker, having made the foregoing brief comment concerning our Congress and Government, I wish at this time to set forth the leading accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress:

GOVERNMENTAL REORGANIZATION

The Eighty-first Congress enacted the Reorganization Act of 1949, which authorized the President to reorganize executive departments in line with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. The act itself provides for the submission of reorganization plans to the Congress by the President, each of which would become effective after 60 days of subsequent continuous session of Congress, unless a concurrent resolution expressing disapproval of the plan be passed by a constitutional majority of either House prior to the end of the 60-day period. A few of the plans submitted occasioned some dispute as to whether or not such plan actually conformed to the original recommendation. As a result, a few of the reorganization plans submitted were rejected. It might be mentioned further that the Congress become aware of the fact that some people wanted economy only when it did not affect their own department or their own personal affairs.

The first session of the Eighty-first Congress approved on August 19, 1949, six out of seven reorganization plans submitted in 1949. In addition, during the first session, unification of the armed services was accomplished, although it should be mentioned that certain modifications still need to be made. During the second session 16 additional plans of reorganization were submitted and become effective on May 23, 1950. Our efforts toward governmental reorganization have not met with 100 percent success, but some substantial progress has been made. Certainly it is incumbent upon all responsible officials in both the executive and legislative branches of Government to devote themselves unceasingly toward achieving greater economy and efficiency in all respects in the operation of our Government.

SOCIAL SECURITY, LABOR, HEALTH, AND WELFARE

Among the leading accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress in this particular category may be listed the following legislative actions: The passage of the Social Security Act of 1950, which extended coverage to over 10,000,000 additional persons for benefits of the old-age and survivors benefits program, increasing payments as much as 100 percent in some cases, plus various other changes and improvements; the passage of a new and revised minimum-wage law which increased the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour—Fair Labor Standards Act of 1949; legislation clarifying overtime-pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and outlawing retroactive claims; revision of Classification Act and including increased pay to classified employees; legislation improving working conditions and providing pay increases of postal-service employees; the appropriation of $1,500,000 in emergency funds for crippled children; legislation continuing for 1 year Federal aid for schools with war-swollen populations and for education of children on Federal reservations; the extension of the present Federal-aid program for hospital construction until 1955, combined with a provision for increasing the amount of said aid from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 annually; passage of the public housing law of 1949 providing, among other things, for the construction of 810,000 public-housing units to be built in the next 6 years; expanded and liberalized Federal housing assistance; establishment of a National Science Foundation; authorization of disaster relief grants by the Federal Government to States and local governments; authorized the United States Public Health Service to support research and training in rheumatism, arthritis, multiple schlerosis, cerebral palsy, and epilepsy.

AGRICULTURE

The Eighty-first Congress authorized United States participation in the International Wheat Agreement; authorized continuance of 90 percent support of farm prices through 1950, thereafter providing for revision of such to a sliding scale and new parity; revised the charter of the Commodity Credit Corporation so as to permit the Government to provide and construct adequate crop storage facilities, and provided for exchange of surplus commodities for strategic and critical materials; authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to make production disaster loans to farmers; provided emergency appropriation for relief loans to farmers whose crops were destroyed in the severe western blizzard of 1949; extended and broadened the crop insurance program. This Congress further enacted the rural telephone legislation and authorized the Rural Electrification Administration to make loans for construction of rural telephone lines; repealed the tax on oleomargarine; authorized continuing appropriations for research, rural electrification, reforestation, soil conservation, school lunch program, extension program, Farmers Home Administration, and appropriations for the prevention of certain diseases in crops and animals.

I wish to point out in connection with the REA program, that in the 14 years of REA's existence, the number of farmers in the United States having this very important service has increased from a little over 10 percent to over 75 percent of all the farmers in the country. It is also significant to note the value of our investment in REA; less than six-tenths of 1 percent of REA borrowers are delinquent as much as 30 days in their repayment of loans. It has been my pleasure to have served on the Agricultural Appropriations Subcommittee, which committee is not a legislative committee, but rather is a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

In conclusion, and in connection with the agricultural programs of this country, I wish to state that the overwhelmingly important thing is to recognize that agriculture is basic. The problem is not political. An agriculture program must be soundly conceived and in the public interest, and must be such as to preserve the dignity of the farmer himself. Our attention must be given to the continued conservation of our natural resources, as such is vital to the continued welfare of the Nation.

INTERNAL SECURITY

The Eighty-first Congress enacted legislation authorizing the summary dismissal of employees for security reasons, by the Attorney General, the Secretary of State, Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of Defense, Secretary of the Army, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Air Force, Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics; made it a criminal offense and provided penalties for revealing information about official secret codes; tightened the Foreign Agents Registration Act; provided the President with power to control the number of and to search foreign vessels in United States waters. Finally, and of momentous importance, the Eighty-first Congress passed the strongest law in the field of internal security ever enacted by a United States Congress, the omnibus Communist control bill which was passed overwhelmingly by the Congress. Briefly stated, it is an omnibus antisubversive act to protect internal security, and requires registration of Communist members and authorizes their confinement in wartime. Certainly the Congress has acted in an enlightened and constructive manner in enacting the foregoing legislation, thereby strengthening America's hand in dealing with the menace of communism here at home.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The Eighty-first Congress authorized the continuance and financing of the European recovery program; aid to Greece and Turkey, and relief of occupied areas; the Senate ratified the Atlantic Pact; the Congress restored and extended the reciprocal trade-agreements program; enacted the mutual defense-assistance program, thereby authorizing military aid to western Europe, Nationalist China, Korea, Iran, and the Philippine Republic; enacted legislation permitting national and State banks in Federal Reserve System to deal in securities in the International Bank for reconstruction and development; authorized aid to underdeveloped nations needing technical assistance under the President's point 4 program. The Eighty-first Congress further amended the Displaced Persons Act to remove certain discriminatory provisions and liberalized other provisions of the law.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Eighty-first Congress immediately following the outbreak of the Korean war appropriated over $17,000,000,000 in additional funds for the armed services and for military assistance to our allies. During the years immediately preceding the outbreak of the Korean war approximately 13½ billion dollars per year was being spent on the armed services alone. The Eighty-first Congress further passed legislation furthering unification of the armed services; extended the Selective Service Act and authorized the President to call up the National Guard and Reserves; authorized the induction into military service of certain doctors, dentists, and allied specialists, and established priorities as to order of induction; enacted legislation providing allowances to dependents of men in the service; authorized a 2-year, $596,000,000 program of public-works construction in Armed Forces installations in United States and abroad; authorized a construction program of armories and related facilities for National Guard and Reserves; removed limitation on size of Armed Forces; authorized a $350,000,000 naval ship-construction program which included the modernizing of submarines and construction of the first atomic-powered submarine. The Eighty-first Congress further passed legislation modernizing the internal organization of the Army; established a uniform code of military justice for all branches of the Armed Forces and the Coast Guard; provided military-pay increases totaling $300,000,000; defined the authority and powers of the Central Intelligency Agency and provided certain improvements in operation and administration; authorized the establishment of a guided-missile proving ground for the testing of rockets and similar weapons of warfare; authorized the construction and equipment of a guided-missile research laboratory for the National Bureau of Standards; authorized the construction of a supersonic wind tunnel and engineering center; authorized construction of permanent military public works in Alaska and Okinawa.

VETERANS

The Eighty-first Congress, as of September 1, 1950, devoted a considerable percentage of its time on deliberations affecting veterans; the records indicate that nearly 20 percent of the well over 600 laws passed by Congress, as of the aforementioned date, related to veterans and their dependents or the Veterans' Administration. Among the more prominent actions in this regard are the following: Legislation permitting payment to veterans of retroactive benefits during hospitalization; legislation extending the time for filing in certain cases for benefits and compensation, legislation increasing from 75 to 100 percent the rates of payment for presumed service-connected disabilities and providing liberalization of certain other benefits; legislation granting additional allowances for veterans who have been paralyzed from service-connected brain injuries; legislation defining authority of Veterans' Administration in carrying out veterans' education program under GI bill of rights. In addition, it should be pointed out that the appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year 1950 will approximate $6,500,000,000. Assistance to veterans was rendered in many regards in certain provisions of housing legislation enacted by the Congress. As of the present time, over $60,000,000,000 has been spent on benefits and services for veterans of all wars.

NATIONAL ECONOMY

The Eighty-first Congress, prior to Korea, strongly resisted efforts to increase taxes and in fact the House of Representatives adopted a bill reducing in some respects the citizens' tax bill, in particular as regards excise taxes. Following Korea the Congress immediately went to work and passed a tax bill increasing taxes so as to better be able to meet the costs of the Korean war and further related contingencies. The Congress has of this date gone on record indicating overwhelmingly that action shall be taken at this session of Congress on an excess-profits tax, and action is expected to be taken in the near future. The Eighty-first Congress amended the Federal deposit insurance law so as to authorize Federal insurance of bank deposits on accounts up to $10,000. The Eighty-first Congress created a Small Business Committee in both the House and Senate and authorized an investigation of crime and racketeering in interstate commerce. Finally, in view of the international situation, the Eighty-first Congress enacted the Defense Production Act which authorized price, wage, and credit controls, covers assistance to defense plants, a system of priorities and allocation of materials essential to the national defense effort, and provided certain penalties for hoarding.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing record does not profess or is not meant to be all-inclusive, as it definitely does not contain all matters acted upon by the Eighty-first Congress. The foregoing does, however, contain the leading measures of national and international significance upon which action was taken during either the first or second session of the Congress. Perhaps no individual would agree as to the wisdom of enacting all the foregoing matters, but the accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress taken as a whole are substantial and in many respects have contributed to the well-being and security of not only the Nation but the entire free world.

It should not be overlooked in our attempts for peace and security in the world today that the present titanic world struggle is essentially one for men's minds and concerning in many respects diametrically opposed ways of life. It is not enough in this day and age to be simply anti-Communist; it is necessary that we think affirmatively and go forward in our quest for a better world with firmness and determination to do that which reasonable men feel is in the best interests of our country and mankind.

The significant development of the past 2 years has been the President's firm and historic decision, in accordance with a resolution of the United Nations, to stand fast against armed aggression by those forces who are avowedly committed to world domination. This action has in itself far overshadowed all other developments of the past 2 years, and I, therefore, welcome this opportunity to set forth the over-all picture of the past 2 years.

In conclusion, I wish to state that it is easy to criticize the actions of those who have the responsibility of rendering decisions day after day on matters of grave import. Surely it is far better for all of us to join together in a constructive and enlightened manner to mutually solve our common problems in the interests of one and all.

Employers Have a Patriotic Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, it is high time that many employers throughout this Nation realize that they have a patriotic duty to the young men who may soon be called upon to defend our Nation's liberties. This statement is made as a result of numberless cases which have been called to my attention of young men who cannot obtain employment even in this time of a scarce labor market because they are of draft age.

What are these young men—many of them combat veterans of World War II who have just finished their college education—thinking when they go out to find a job which they know are so plentiful and are told "we are not hiring anybody subject to the draft"?

The parents of some of these boys have told me that they have been shocked by the remarks some of them have made as they came home after a weary round of job hunting. While, therefore, we are so busy devising laws against subversives, it seems to me that employers could certainly not help in creating a climate in which subversive tendencies can take root among bitter and dispirited young men.

It is true that an employer suffers some inconvenience when a young man he has trained for some particular job is suddenly snatched away by one of the armed services. Coping with such inconveniences is, however, a small price for that employer to pay for his security as against the sacrifice which is being asked of the young man who marches off to war. It is sad enough when young men who have been fighting for their country come home after a war and cannot find employment. It is worse than tragic when young men who may possibly be called upon to fight a war learn that this possibility debars them from sustaining the life which they may soon be asked to lay down for their country. This is a shameful situation which cannot be cured by legislation. I can only appeal to the conscience and patriotism of employers, and I hope that appeal will not fall upon deaf ears.

Report on House Concurrent Resolution 64 To Strengthen the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following letter written by Hon. WALTER JUDD and myself in regard to the status of House Concurrent Resolution 64, to strengthen the United Nations:

It has been impossible to have a personal discussion in recent weeks with each of the cosponsors of House Concurrent Resolution 64. But each of us has talked with a number of you and believes that in general there is wide recognition that the Korean crisis has increased the importance of our resolution.

Naturally, we are all absorbed at this time in the task of backing up General MacArthur and his UN troops with the mobilization measures which the situation requires. The forces of aggression must be put down in Korea and wherever they dare to strike.

We must build foundations for a long-range solution at the same time that we fight in Korea and other possible targets of aggression. If we fail to elevate our cause in the world's eyes to the lofty plane which it merits, we can lose the battle for the world's confidence and approval.

Events have propelled us faster than our deliberations. In this particular crisis, the United Nations was able, due to the absence of Russia from the Security Council and the presence of United States troops in Japan, to assume some of the strength with which we sought to endow it. Our sons are today fighting on distant battlegrounds for the United Nations as an organization to repel aggression and maintain peace. Should we not now formalize this position by adopting House Concurrent Resolution 64 as an expression of national policy? Should we not gain credit for our exertions by making it clear to the world that the United States fights, not for its own aggrandizement, but for a world organization adequate to preserve peace and prevent aggression through the enactment, interpretion, and enforcement of world law?

Here are some specific advantages to be gained by United States adoption now of the policy set forth in House Concurrent Resolution 64:

1. Reinvigorate the United Nations by revision of its Charter: It is clear to the world that the action of the Security Council on Korea was possible only because of Russia's action in absenting herself from the council table. Such a situation cannot be expected to occur again. Another act of aggression might find the UN hamstrung by the veto.

2. Seize the ideological initiative from Russia: The Communist Stockholm Petition has had a tremendous appeal to millions of people. We must offer a positive and sound road to peace which can arouse popular support and expose the insincerities of the Communist peace offensive.

3. Reassure and win over the undecided world: Important segments of the Far East and the Near East are not yet firmly committed to cooperation with the west in opposing Communist aggression. We must tell them that the United States is seeking not a western-dominated world but peace with honor and independence for all nations. The enunciation of a policy favoring a strong world organization would strike a responsive chord, for leaders in the east have been advocating such a step for years.

It is now apparent that we cannot hope for passage at this session. We hope, however, that you will give careful consideration to this problem during the recess so that we can take the matter up if we return later in the fall, or so that the matter can receive early consideration during the next Congress. Nothing is more urgent than the promulgation of a foreign policy which will maintain for the United States a position of world leadership. We do not feel that House Concurrent Resolution 64 is the only answer—indeed, we welcome discussion and hope that you will keep us advised of your thinking on the subject so that the best possible bill can be brought forth when we reconvene.

WALTER JUDD.

Airlines Fight Subsidy Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to provide my colleagues with an important and illuminating statement made in the Washington Daily News last night over the signature of James Daniel. It is entitled "Airlines Fight Subsidy Bill." It is as follows:

The Nation's mail-carrying airlines are lobbying to block House passage of a bill to compel separation of air-mail subsidies from earned air-mail pay,

At present only airlines certificated by the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) to carry mail are eligible for Federal subsidies. The subsidies themselves are concealed in "air-mail pay" paid to the lines by the CAB, which has a blank check on postal revenues for this purpose.

CAB officials say they have no way of knowing how much of the annual $125,000,000 air-mail payment is earned and how much is subsidy. Outside estimates, however, set the subsidy payments as high as 40 percent. Some airlines are comparatively self-supporting; others depend on the Government for half or more of their income.

The Hoover Commission set the ball rolling to separate earned air-mail pay from subsidies. On August 31 the House Commerce Committee reported out the Heselton bill, which carried the endorsement of the Hoover Commission.

The airlines blocked it in the Rules Committee. But the bill's supporters have succeeded in getting a rule for it to come to the floor, if and when Speaker SAM RAYBURN is willing.

Meanwhile, ex-Representative Robert Ramspeck, who is vice president and lobbyist for the Air Transport Association (ATA), representing the mail-carrying lines, has urged House Members to take no action on the Heselton bill. He points out the Senate Commerce Committee has $200,000 to spend on advice on how to carry out subsidy separation.

Originally, Mr. Ramspeck announced that the ATA was neutral on the separation issue. But today Mr. Ramspeck, whose pay from the ATA is $23,000 a year plus expenses, said his outfit is opposed to the bill because of two features.

One is a provision that air-mail pay shall not exceed each airline's cost of carrying mail plus a reasonable return on that part of its investment attributable to carrying mail. Anything above that would be frankly labeled a subsidy and paid by the CAB out of a special fund appropriated by Congress.

Mr. Ramspeck said this would establish a "new principle" for the Government in its relations with transportation companies. He also objects to the provision which would require the CAB to demand that airlines receiving Government funds allocate their costs to the four main types of traffic. These are passenger service, mail, freight and express.

Such a provision would be a boom to the non-mail-carrying air coach and freight lines. They now complain that the mail carriers are able to undercut their rates because the mail carriers can ask the CAB to make up any losses sustained in this way by increasing air-mail pay.

But Mr. Ramspeck said this cost-accounting procedure—which is the heart of the Hoover Commission recommendations—would require the scrapping of a new accounting system recently set up by the airlines.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will be read with great interest by the Members and that it will throw considerable light upon the activities of some of our airline officials since September 15 when the Rules Committee reported out a rule making H. R. 9184 in order for consideration.

Communist Activities in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a statement prepared by me, together with a list of selected important events relating to Communist activities in the United States from 1948 to 1950.

There being no objection, the statement and the list were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF EXPOSURE OF COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

(By Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY)

The Communist problem at home and abroad is one of the crucial issues of the November 1950, election campaign.

It is obvious that the Democratic Party has been coddling the Reds abroad and coddling them here at home. In foreign policy, it sought to appease Dictator Joseph Stalin, to give him country after country.

In domestic policy, the Democratic administration for 17 years has been honeycombed with Reds and Red sympathizers—with the Coplons, the Hisses, the Pressmans, etc. Why in heaven's name the American people should have to pay the salaries of these traitors is beyond me. It is outrageous that the average taxpayer should sweat to earn a living to pay the taxes for the salaries of disloyal employees.

Every day that one picks up the newspaper he finds more evidence of Red activities. We of Wisconsin have known at first hand the damage that communism can do. We have seen how millions of dollars in wages have been lost because of strikes fomented by Reds. We have seen how men have been beaten up by Red goons. We are sick and disgusted over the coddling of Reds.

Now, Mr. President, the average man in the street is busy with a thousand and one things, and it is naturally difficult for him to try to keep up with the news as it breaks at home and abroad. For that reason, I am listing below what I humbly feel to be an important summation of some of the leading news on the anti-Communist front during the last 3 years beginning in January 1948.

This listing shows how, under the persistent Republican efforts, we have been able in case after case, to expose Red traitors. The Democratic administration has hardly given us its support in this crusade; on the contrary, it has fought at every turn Republican efforts to expose the Reds. The Democrats have tried to ridicule our fight—they have sneered at the chase after so-called red herrings, to use the term of the President of the United States. But it was no red herring when the shocking news came that Klaus Fuchs revealed practically every last secret of the hydrogen bomb to the Reds.

The vile revealing of those secrets did more damage to America's security—more damage to the life of our people than did perhaps any single event in recent years. What a national catastrophe. One single Red in effect jeopardized the lives of 150,000,000 Americans—one single Red who sold his soul to the Communist devil, deliberately told the Reds secrets with which to produce a bomb possibly to exterminate the lives of millions of Americans. That shows the danger we face. That is no red herring. That is the brutal hard fact.

As you read down the list below, remember that what we have discovered in the past is but a token of what we can discover in the future. That is provided the Republican Party is given the means by which to continue its exposures. So, I say to the people of our country, vote Republican Tuesday, November 7. Vote to stamp out the Communist menace at home and to curb Red aggression abroad.

Vote American.
Vote against communism.
Vote Republican.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the leave of absence unanimously granted to me by this House, I was not in attendance at the session yesterday.

I desire that the Record show that if I had been present at roll call 285, I would have voted in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] that the House concur in the Senate amendment to the supplemental appropriation bill of 1951 with an amendment providing that ECA funds may be withheld from any country whose trade with Soviet Russia or its satellite countries, including Communist China and Communist Korea, is found by the National Security Council to be contrary to our national security.

War and Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to insert in the Congressional Record, an editorial which appeared in the Daily Times, Mamaroneck, N. Y., August 16, 1950, entitled "War and Politics." The editorial follows:

WAR AND POLITICS

The rather naive theory has been advanced by national spokesmen of the Democratic Party that it is somehow unpatriotic to make the present war an item for political discussion in the fall campaign. The theory is, presumably, based upon the flimsy assumption that any criticism of the administration for its failure to keep us out of war would give aid and comfort to the enemy, namely, Russia.

We find it difficult to follow this type of reasoning. What are campaigns for except to review the accomplishments and by the same token scan the failures of the administration which asks to be retained in power. What are elections for except that the public may approve or repudiate the steps taken by those in authority for the national welfare as they saw it?

And certainly there can be no issue of greater personal import to the families of our citizens than the series of decisions which have led to armed conflict with a deadly enemy and the taking from homes of millions of young men for combat duty. Surely these decisions are subject to review as to their wisdom, and certainly those who made the decisions must be prepared to explain why they were taken. That is the way of democracy.

All of this, we emphasize, is based upon the understanding that criticism is to be constructive, and above all that united support is to be given the administration in its prosecution of the war, now that we are undeniably plunged into it. This may seem a fine point, but we believe there can be honest criticism of what mistakes have happened in the past and at the same time unqualified backing of all measures taken to win the war, and get us out of the mess into which the administration has taken us.

It is in our political campaigns that through verbal controversy we segregate facts from propaganda and separate actuality from claims. It is in the give-and-take of heated partisan battle that the real truth finally emerges. And that is what the American public is entitled to.

What did we give away at Yalta and at Potsdam that we should not have surrendered?

How were we deceived into a childlike trustfulness and credulity toward promises by Russia now proven empty?

Why have we witnessed reverses in policy by the State Department which have produced such tragic consequences?

Were the billions appropriated and spent for our national security wisely or foolishly used?

These and similarly important questions should be fairly put and fully answered during the coming campaign. For it is only when we have the light that we may march forward with assuredness that the same mistakes will not recur.

This Is How It Started

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Daily Times published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., under date of July 13, 1950, entitled "This Is How It Started." The editorial follows:

THIS IS HOW IT STARTED

American parents whose sons are being called upon to answer the draft may not remember clearly the gradual steps by which we were brought into this conflict.

It dates all the way back to Yalta. There, to induce a pledge of Russian cooperation in our war with Japan, President Roosevelt in 1945 promised Joseph Stalin certain territorial concessions. One of these was North Korea.

Then came in rapid order President Roosevelt's sudden death, the explosion of A-bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the surrender by Emperor Hirohito. By a military decision, Korea was divided at the thirty-eighth parallel. The Soviet sent 100,000 soldiers into North Korea and America sent 72,000 into South Korea.

An attempt was made at setting up a Korean government for the entire peninsula. It was doomed to failure, for it broke quickly on the rocks of Russian refusal to permit any opponents of communism to hold office in the proposed Korean government. Thereupon, two governments were established, the Communist People's Democratic Republic of North Korea, and the anti-Communist Republic of Korea in South Korea.

By agreement, when the two governments were established, both Russian and American occupation forces were withdrawn between December of 1948 and June of 1949. But small military forces remained behind in each Korean sector to train the respective armies. Then came the sudden invasion of South Korea by North Korea. And the world knows the rest.

Why, it may be asked, did America agree to withdraw, if we had knowledge that invasion might follow? And if we did not know this to be likely, what was the matter with our intelligence groups?

For that matter, if we are to start asking questions, we might go all the way back to Yalta 5 years ago and ask why President Roosevelt turned his back on the Atlantic Charter and granted to Russia control over territories on which it had absolutely no valid claim whatsoever?

The answer might conceivably be that the exigencies of war at that time demanded substantial concessions in order to insure Russian participation in the war against Japan. But President Roosevelt had personal knowledge of our A-bombs manufacture. And as events later proved, Russian participation in the war with Japan was largely of a token character, of less than a week's duration before Hirohito's offer to surrender.

Perhaps no real benefit can be expected from a resurvey of the historical past. Merely to locate the blame for the mess in which we now find ourselves may serve immediately useful purpose. Nevertheless, an indirect byproduct might conceivably be the realization by Washington that we fight best when we are kept informed of the reasons for our fighting. And if this induces greater frankness on the part of the administration, if it brings better teamwork between Government and public, then something will have been accomplished through public realization of the background of this war.

Give the people the truth and they will make the right decisions. That the full truth was not given us about Yalta and subsequent diplomatic events should not be a precedent for future mistakes of a similar nature.

We are in for a hard war and it can and will be won. But we must know exactly why we are fighting and for what we are fighting. That kind of partnership between those in authority and those who take their orders is absolutely essential.

Armed Services Committee Legislation, Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL VINSON
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include below a list of the legislative items considered by the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives which have become law or which are, at this time, awaiting the signature of the President.

There are 117 of these items, which is an impressive record of legislative activity on the part of the committee, the total representing approximately one-seventh of the total number of Public Laws enacted by the Eighty-first Congress as of this date.

I must point out that this tabulation excludes the very active investigative program of the committee in this Congress. There was, for example, the committee's thorough examination of unification and strategy in the fall of 1949, which resulted in Public Document 600 of this Congress, a report which is generally considered to be one of the most objective and thorough studies of national-defense problems rendered by any committee of Congress in recent years. There was also an exhaustive investigation of the Air Force B–36 program in the late summer of 1949, an investigation of the Army's tank program a few weeks ago, an investigation of the guided missiles programs of the various Armed Forces, an investigation of the services' hospitalization program the services' post exchange and commissary programs and activities, allegations respecting the administration of the Army finance center at St. Louis, Mo., service clothing purchasing policies, the state of the Nation's stockpile of strategic and critical materials, and a number of other such studies and investigations relating to the efficiency and morale of the Armed Forces.

As regards the legislation, more impressive in my opinion than its quantity is its significant character. Rather than an aggregation of trivia, these legislative items are, in many instances, of signal importance to the Nation and of the greatest complexity. Taken together they represent the statutory framework created by the Eighty-first Congress to assure a state of readiness and efficiency in our Armed Forces.

Personnel legislation considered by the committee in this Congress has been especially far-reaching and difficult. Previous to the Korean crisis, the committee obtained favorable congressional action on the Career Compensation Act which completely revised and reconstructed, for the first time in 40 years, the pay and allowances structure of the Armed Forces and the services' disability retirement systems. This measure, tremendous in scope, fundamental to the morale and efficiency of the Armed Forces, is one of the most significant pieces of military legislation enacted by the Congress in many years and required many weeks of concentrated effort and detailed study by the entire committee.

The Korean crisis brought on a number of additional legislative items of a personnel nature, the impact of which is being felt throughout the Nation today. The extension of the Selective Service Act of 1948 for an additional year, with the added authority to order into Federal service members of the civilian components of the Armed Forces, is easily the most significant of these, but collateral thereto and derived in part therefrom was such legislation as the one-year involuntary extension of enlistments in the Armed Forces, the lifting of the Services' personnel ceilings, the granting of authority to induct doctors and dentists into the Armed Forces, and the granting of dependency allowances to men being taken involuntarily into the Armed Forces. All of this legislation is, of course, fundamental to the readiness of our fighting forces; and the committee takes pride in the fact that while much of this legislation, being of a compulsory nature in application to our citizens, could have been very controversial, the committee was unanimous in its support of every one of these bills.

Also in the field of personnel legislation were such items as a bill authorizing States to establish home guard units when National Guard units are withdrawn from the States for Federal service, a bill authorizing the Regular Army to accept the enlistment of 2,500 nonresident aliens, and a bill authorizing

Gen. Omar Bradley to be appointed to the grade of General of the Army—the so-called five-star grade.

A committee measure continuing Government control over the Nation's synthetic rubber plants, thereby insuring continuance of a dependable supply of rubber for the Nation in the event of a national emergency, is in a category all of its own. This legislation, committee written and sponsored, is becoming of steadily increasing importance to the national security as time goes by, its value to the Nation already having been demonstrated repeatedly since its enactment.

Two important bills relating exclusively to the Navy were considered in this Congress. One authorized a large-scale, new shipbuilding program for the Navy; the other authorized the Navy to build certain experimental types of submarines. Both of these measures are premised on the need for keeping the Navy modern and will have a continuing impact on the fleet's readiness for years in the future.

In these early days of unification and during this readjustment period after World War II, it could be expected that much legislation of an organizational nature would be considered. By far the most important of this type of legislation considered by the committee was a complete rewriting of the unification act, in the "National Security Act Amendments of 1949." This legislation created for the first time in the Nation's history a "Department of Defense" composed of the military departments of Army, Navy, and Air Force, and great power was vested in the Secretary of Defense. Such new Government positions as Deputy Secretary of Defense, Assistant Secretaries of Defense and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were created by this important legislation.

Other legislation, generally of an organizational nature, were such item as the Army-Air Force Authorization Act of 1949, which gave the Army and Air Force statutory organization characters for the first time and also authorized by law, for the first time, a peacetime strength of 70 air groups in the United States Air Force. The "Army Organization Act of 1950," another very important and complex measure, modernized the old War Department and Army organization for the first time in many years, and legislation was also approved to give the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, a highly important aviation research agency, a statutory basis for the first time. Legislation granting to the Central Intelligence Agency statutory authority enabling it to perform its function of evaluating and correlating intelligence information throughout all Government agencies was also enacted, and early in the first session the committee invested prodigious labor in revising and improving the services' entire system of military justice, creating for the first time a uniform code of justice for the three armed forces.

At the very end of the session, the committee approved legislation authorizing General of the Army George C. Marshall to become Secretary of Defense despite certain statutory barriers to the holding of such office by men with a background of service in the Regular Armed Forces.

In the field of military construction, the committee has been very active. A tremendous public works program, involving highly secret projects and large-scale construction activities of the greatest military importance, was thoroughly studied by the committee and passed through the Congress. Legislation authorizing the construction of armories for the National Guard and other civilian components was approved, as was legislation authorizing the construction of a far-flung radar fence for the protection of America, a guided missiles proving ground, an Alaskan communications system, and certain wind tunnel construction of major proportions. Every one of these military construction measures is of great military importance and required many hours of committee study and examination of service witnesses.

Such items as these I have mentioned, plus the many others of a similar nature listed below, point up how tremendously complex legislation relating to the Armed Forces has become, and how significant much of this legislation considered in this Congress has been to the defense program. It is a legislative record reflecting great credit on the members of the Committee on Armed Services, collectively and individually; and, as chairman, submitting this legislative record, on behalf of the committee, to the House of Representatives, I wish to express my deep appreciation and gratitude to each member of the committee for the splendid cooperation, counsel, guidance, and great industry that made possible this fine record of accomplishment. The afore-mentioned list follows:

Water Resources in the Central Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to draw your attention, and the attention of the Congress, to the significant progress being made under democratic leadership to expand the development of our huge water resources, especially in connection with the great Central Valley of California.

In many parts of the country, people take their water for granted. Many areas are fortunate in having all the water they need to supply their industrial, agricultural, and domestic needs. However, there are a number of other areas, including the Central Valley, where there is not enough water readily available to supply the constantly growing demand.

The Central Valley contains some of the richest farm land in the United States. However, two-thirds of the water supply of the valley is located in the Sacramento Valley to the north, while two-thirds of the agricultural land is located in the San Joaquin Valley to the south. In 1939, the Central Valley supported 59,000 farms, covering 2,720,000 acres and produced a gross farm income of $220,000,000. If the water resources of the valley are fully developed, through the Central Valley project, the valley could support 110,000 farms, covering 6,580,000 acres, and produce a gross farm income of $420,000,000, or almost double the 1939 income.

However, because the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress sharply curtailed progress on the Central Valley project, the San Joaquin Valley does not have enough water to supply its ever-increasing demands. In the city of Coalinga, in the heart of the valley's rich oil fields, approximately 5,000 people receive their drinking water by way of Southern Pacific Railroad tank cars. Think of this in 1950. In Chowchilla, a few years ago, many farmers were ready to sell their land because they could not get the water they needed to cultivate their farms.

Today, thanks to renewed progress on the Central Valley project under a Democratic-controlled Congress, farmers in the Chowchilla water district will get the water they need. A contract was signed July 5 of this year between the Chowchilla water district and the Bureau of Reclamation, providing Central Valley project water to Chowchilla for 40 years under the 160-acre limitation.

This contract represents years of hard effort on the part of farmers and landholders in the area, and represents a real victory for those who were determined to see that the water resources which are the birthright of every American were utilized for the benefit of the greatest number for the greatest good.

The Chowchilla contract is one of 13 contracts completed between water districts in the Central Valley and the Bureau of Reclamation. The Bureau has now completed contracts for approximately 75 percent of the dependable water from the Millerton Reservoir at Friant Dam, and enough applications have been filed with the Bureau to more than exhaust the remaining water supply expected to be developed in the project. Here, then, is the answer to those obstructionists who have fought progressive development of our water resources on the shaky ground that demand for water would never match the supply.

I would like to include in the RECORD the following clippings from the Fresno Bee for July 6, 1950, and the Chowchilla News for July 6, 1950, which refer to the signing of the Chowchilla water contract. I would also like to introduce another clipping from the Fresno Bee, dated August 25, 1950, referring to the resolution adopted by the California Democratic Central Committee with respect to power development. I commend these articles to Members of Congress who still have any doubts as to the need for full development of our water resources. The above-mentioned clippings follow:

[From the Fresno (Calif.) Bee of July 6, 1950]

CHOWCHILLA SIGNS PACT, GETS CVP WATER SUPPLY

CHOWCHILLA, July 6.—Chowchilla water district and United States Bureau of Reclamation officials signed a 9 (e) type repayment contract for some 132,000 acre-feet of Central Valley project water annually at ceremonies held in the water district office yesterday afternoon.

The contract provides for 55,000 acre-feet of class 1 water not to exceed $3.50 an acre-foot and up to 77,000 acre-feet of class 2 water, when and if available, not to exceed $1.50 an acre-foot.

The historic occasion, which climaxed years of determined effort on the part of about 30 farmers and landholders to form the present 65,000-acre district, brought about the signing by the Bureau of its tenth Central Valley project contract and completion of Bureau contract negotiations with a total of eight water districts.

SIX CONTRACTS APPROVED

In addition to these, six contracts have been approved in final form and negotiations are under way with 11 other districts. Nine of these districts have given tentative approval as to the form of the contract terms.

Addressing district and Bureau officials during a luncheon which preceded the formal contract signing, District President Frank Justin complimented the Bureau for its splendid cooperation in consummating contract negotiations in record time.

"This is a great moment in our lives. The Bureau of Reclamation has made possible a dream which few of us present today thought possible 25 years ago," Justin added.

EQUAL TO WATER RIGHT

Duval Williams, district vice president, pointed out the contract not only gives the district a priority for project water along with other districts who have signed contracts but assures the district water users of what amounts to a riparian right to an improved supply.

Denslow Green, counsel for the district, supported Williams' view of the contract by commenting that "if the cooperation exhibited by the Bureau and district officials continues as it has up to the present stage of negotiations, there will be no need to look at the contract again."

H. V. Eastman and Howard A. Stoddard, district secretary and engineer, pointed out to the luncheon group that the project water is vital to the economic life of the district.

"Our water table already has begun to rise and after initial operation of the Central Valley project next year, we can anticipate a rise of several more feet," Stoddard said.

Eastman pointed out the earlier completion of the project would have saved local water users millions of dollars in pumping costs.

"Like many other areas, our national water supply amounts to only 50 percent of our actual needs. Only a few years ago many of us here in the Chowchilla area were ready to sell our land because without water we were unable to cultivate and farm it," Eastman commented.

Richard L. Boke, regional director of the Bureau, who signed the contract for the Government, explained that rapid completion of Delta-Mendota Canal, Tracy pumping plant, and other Central Valley project initial features, will make possible an improved water supply by this time next year.

SEES MORE COOPERATION

Jack W. Rodner, local bureau district manager, expressed his belief that "the progress made and confidence exhibited by the Chowchilla water users in the Bureau would lead the way to greater cooperation and progress with water users throughout the valley."

Other speakers reviewed the history of the district, which became a legal entity as recently as November 25, 1949.

Efforts to establish the district began in 1947. Its final formation became possible when permission was granted for exclusion from the Madera district of 45,500 acres and for a division of Central Valley project water allocated to the Madera district under a contract executed in 1939.

Some 20,000 acres of lands not included in any distirct were added, bringing the district acreage total to about 65,000 acres, of which 54,173 are irrigable.

FORTY-THREE PERCENT IRRIGABLE

A land classification survey by the Bureau of Reclamation shows that 43 percent of its total land is irrigable. The land classification is as follows: class 1, 11,309 acres; class 2, 16,278 acres; class 3, 27,543 acres; class 4, 5,476 acres; class 6, 2,697 acres, and Chowchilla townsite, 784 acres.

Cotton is the principal crop, occupying 18,513 acres. Alfalfa is second with 12,024 acres, and irrigated pasture third with 10,511 acres. These three crops occupy about 90 percent of the district's cropped area.

Others present at the signing ceremonies were board members Mark Van Elswyk, H. P. Dower, and Charles Bialock, and district officers Legion School, Donald Cardwell and C. L. Chastain.

Bureau officials attending included Ralph Brody, assistant regional counsel; James H. Stamler, settlement chief; and T. R. Thompson, water supply head.

Murdo Campbell and M. G. Hughes also were present.

CONTRACT SIGNED YESTERDAY GIVES CHOWCHILLA 40-YEAR SUPPLY OF WATER—RICHARD L. BOKE, REGIONAL DIRECTOR FOR BUREAU OF RECLAMATION, WAS HERE TO BIND GOVERNMENT TO PERMANENT WATER CONTRACT

Chowchilla's permanent water contract with the United States Bureau of Reclamation was signed yesterday afternoon.

This event was big news to farmers of the Chowchilla water district. The signing of the contract culminates nearly 4 years of energetic work on the part of the members of the board of directors, their advisory committee and numerous others.

The contract calls for the annual delivery of 55,000 acre-feet of class 1 water and 77,000 acre-feet of class 2 water by the Bureau. The water district is obliged to pay the Bureau for the water received by it. The contract is for a term of 40 years. The district accepts the 160-acre limitation of the Reclamation Act.

The 27-page document may not be as simple as that. It is a flexible document and provides for a trial period of 15 years during which time adjustments can be made. It gives the board the right to sell a portion of the class 1 water to other districts, or interim users should it not be required or if the charges become too burdensome.

CONTRACT GIVES PRIORITY

Chowchilla's contract is one of five already signed by water districts for CVP water in the San Joaquin Valley. It has been pointed out that had the contract been signed 6 months ago, Chowchilla could have had the full amount ordered for this season. The district ordered 125,000 acre-feet of water for the season. When it appeared the amount of water to be available to water districts served by Friant would not equal the demand, the Bureau cut the Chowchilla order to one-half. It is understood this condition will not exist next year. The five districts holding permanent contracts with the Bureau will have priority on the water stored in Lake Millerton. After their requirements are filled, any water left will be allocated among water districts who have yet to sign permanent contracts.

The contract was signed in the office of the water district at about 3 o'clock yesterday. Some 30 farmers and others witnessed the event. Richard L. Boke, regional director of the Bureau of Reclamation of Sacramento, bound the Bureau to the terms of the contract when he signed the instrument. Bob Thomas, publicity man for the Bureau, of Fresno; a Bureau photographer; Ralph Brodie, Bureau attorney; and Jack Rodner, district manager of the Bureau at Fresno, were officials who were present for the occasion.

Frank Justin, president of the Chowchilla water district, was the first to sign for the district, other directors, Duval Williams, vice president; H. V. Eastman, secretary; Charles Blaylock, H. P. Dower and Mark Van Elswyk affixed their signatures to make the matter legal. Denslow Green, attorney for the district, and Howard Stoddard, district engineer, observed the proceedings with interest.

Prior to signing the contract, parties to the agreement had luncheon together and were in a jovial mood for the main event of the afternoon.

STATE DEMOCRATIC RESOLUTION URGES CVP COMPLETION

CHOWCHILLA, August 25.—Duval Williams, Chowchilla, a member, said today the California Democratic Central Committee, meeting earlier in the month in Sacramento, unanimously adopted his resolution regarding power development.

It urges completion of the Central Valley project, the Cahuma project, and the Solano project, and endorses the White-Douglas bill which would integrate the North Fork of the Kings River into the CVP.

ONE AMENDMENT

Williams said a single amendment added to his resolution read:

"We endorse authorization and construction of such lateral highways connecting major features of Central Valley and the coast, such as the highway project known as Winnemucca to the Sea."

The original "resources" plank, which, with the amendments, cleared the resolutions committee, then was adopted on the convention floor, read:

"We urge in particular the appropriation of the adequate funds and the immediate completion of the construction of the authorized transmission lines and substations and Delta steam plant, of the Central Valley basin which was submitted to the Congress with the approval of the President on August 29, 1949.

CONFIDENCE IN PROGRAM

"This committee expresses its confidence in the program being carried out by the Bureau of Reclamation in the 17 Western States, by urging that the California constitutional delegation join with the congressional delegations of the other Western States to promote the development of water and power resources to their fullest extent, for the benefit of the Nation.

"We endorse and urge the United States Congress to enact into law as soon as possible the White-Douglas bill to integrate the North Fork of the Kings River into the Central Valley project.

"We endorse authorization and construction of such specified projects in the Central Valley as the Feather River Dam, the East Side and West Side Sacramento Valley Canals, and the West Side San Joaquin Valley Canal."

ADL Rips Fake Red Peace Bid

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to commend to the attention of my colleagues an item which appeared in the September 1950 issue of the Metropolitan Star, the official publication of the Metropolitan Council of B'nai B'rith. The article is as follows:

ADL RIPS FAKE RED PEACE BID

Ten major Jewish organizations, including B'nai B'rith and its Anti-Defamation League, have denounced the Stockholm appeal and characterized as a "despicable divide-and-conquer tactic" the circulation of a version of the pro-Communist petition directed specifically to Jewish groups.

In a statement, the Jewish organizations called upon "all who wish to serve the peace of the world and the preservation of freedom to reject, with calm and common sense, the Stockholm Appeal." The organizations charged that "those who assist the unscrupulous Communist aggressors in advancing this instrument of their destructive purposes make use of every device of confusion and distortion."

Organizations which signed the statement were American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, Anti-Defamation League, Association of Jewish Chaplains in the Armed Forces, B'nai B'rith, Jewish Labor Committee, Jewish War Veterans of U. S. A., National Community Relations Advisory Council, National Council of Jewish Women, and Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

The statement of opposition to the Stockholm appeal follows:

"At the very time when the peace of the world has been shattered by Communist aggression in Korea, a spurious peace petition, the appeal of the World Congress of Partisans of Peace, generally known as the Stockholm appeal, is being circulated by Communist and pro-Communist groups. The falsity of this misleading petition has been exposed by President Truman, by Secretary of State Acheson, and repeatedly by religious, labor, and other organizations genuinely devoted to world peace, including the undersigned organizations. On August 2 the officers of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Synagogue Council of America joined in a denunciation of the deceptive Stockholm appeal and correctly designated it 'a camouflage designed to confuse the free societies.'

"Those who assist the unscrupulous Communist aggressors in advancing this instrument of their destructive purposes make use of every device of confusion and distortion. In this connection, our attention has been called to the issuance and circulation among Jewish groups of copies of the petition containing alleged endorsements of some religious leaders and public figures in European countries and Israel.

"It is a well-known ommunist technique to make special and divisive appeals to the various religious, nationality, and racial groups in the United States. We resent this despicable 'divide and conquer' tactic. The falsity of the version of the Stockholm appeal directed toward Jews is transparent; the endorsements obviously come from pro-Communists, from those behind the iron curtain who had no choice, or from innocents who have been duped by the spurious appeal, if, indeed, the endorsements are authentic.

"We, the undersigned organizations, hereby denounce all versions of the false petition, and call upon all who wish to serve the peace of the world and the preservation of freedom to reject, with calm and common sense, the Stockholm appeal.

"The presentation of the deceptive Stockholm appeal has in some instances provoked groups to violence directed against those who would deceive them. By circulating the Stockholm appeal, the Communists are attempting to provoke the American people to violence, threat of violence, mob action, and disruptive disturbances. We urge the American people to avoid this trap. American democracy can and must be preserved not by abrogating the cherished principles of civil liberties but by confident reliance upon lawful processes and the appropriate governmental agencies."

Television As an Instrument of World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. KRUSE, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, the tremendous potential of television has perhaps not been fully realized, and I am therefore glad to have this opportunity to place in the RECORD certain remarks made by Philo T. Farnsworth, vice president in charge of research for the Capehart-Farnsworth Corp., concerning the possibility of television as a means toward world peace. Mr. Farnsworth is the inventor of the first practical system of electronic television, and his statement is therefore of considerable significance.

His recent statement reads as follows:

Television, despite the tremendous strides it has already made here as a medium of home entertainment, holds a far more important promise not only to this country but to the entire world, that of implementing universal peace, and universal understanding through its ability to present to the peoples of all lands understandable pictures of their respective ways of life and standards of living.

Despite the many fine educational programs our Government has broadcast into foreign lands, the sharp difference in languages has been a decided barrier to their full effectiveness.

Television, on the other hand, is, in a sense, a universal language. It can be a powerful tool for preventing misunderstanding. It is a picture more convincing than any words, by which ideas, experiences, and facts can be convincing and intelligently presented to the world's millions. Thus can we tie peoples together through common knowledge of each others ways.

The concept of international television is particularly important now, both in view of chaotic world conditions, and because the art is still in its compartive infancy.

Television will always be judged by its programs. The more it can broaden its scope of service, or education, and the more it can widen its sphere of interest, the more meaningful and worth-while it will become. International television is a means to this end.

The accomplishment of a practical system of international television is faced with tremendous technical difficulties, but these problems can, and will, be overcome in the not-too-distant future.

The benefits to be obtained from this service are so great that we must dissolve our technical difficulties as quickly as humanly possible. I believe that the day we can do this is not too far off.

Mining and the Harold L. Ickes Episode in Our Country's Mining Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, this country still has vast mining resources waiting development. Most of these undeveloped mineral deposits are located in the rugged inaccessible mountain ranges of the West. Practically all of the land containing these mineral resources has been withdrawn from settlement and set aside as national forests under the administration of the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management.

To assist the prospector and miner in opening these inaccessible areas and have access to their mining properties, I have introduced a bill to provide necessary roads—a bill that was modeled as closely as practical to the Canadian law that has done so much to place Canada in the forefront in mineral production and developed the Dominion's mining industry, an industry that has contributed in such a large measure to Canadian prosperity.

This mining road construction program met with determined opposition by the Government departments. A copy of the mining-road bill and the report on the bill made by the then Secretary of the Interior, together with my correspondence with the Secretary, taken from the Government archives is inserted here for the information of my colleagues:

A MINE ROADS BILL AND ICKES EPISODE TAKEN FROM THE FILES OF THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES

[H. R. 6098, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

(In the House of Representatives, February 21, 1935)

Mr. WHITE introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

"A bill to assist and promote the development of the mineral resources located within the national forests of the United States, authorizing the construction of roads by the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the owners or operators of mining properties, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That, when an application is made to the Secretary of the Interior by any owner and/or operator of any mineral or placer claim, or group of mineral or placer claims, located within a national forest of the United States, for the construction of a road and bridges necessary for the transportation of mineral products of, or supplies for, such mineral or placer claims, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause an examination of said mineral or placer claims by a qualified representative of the United States Geological Survey, and when it is shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that development on a mineral or placer claim or group of claims situated within any national forest of the United States has proved the existence of mineral or ore bodies in quantity and commercial value sufficient to warrant the expenditure of public moneys for the construction of roads and bridges to facilitate the operation and development of such mineral or placer claims, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to provide the construction, reconstruction, or repair of roads, trails, and bridges within the boundaries of any national forest in aid of the development and operation of such mineral claims.

"SEC. 2. Any road, trail, or bridge constructed or reconstructed or repaired as provided in section 1 of this act shall be available for the use of the general public, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sums of $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, to be expended for carrying out the provisions of this act."

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, April 15, 1935.

Memorandum for the Secretary.

The Geological Survey has prepared a favorable report on H. R. 6098. This bill provides that when the owner of a mineral or placer claim, located within a national forest, makes application to the Secretary of the Interior for the construction of a road necessary for the transportation of mineral products, such mineral or placer claim shall be examined by a representative of the Geological Survey and if such examination shows that the claimant has proved the existence of mineral or ore of commercial value sufficient to warrant the expenditure of public moneys for the construction of these roads to facilitate the operation of such claim, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to provide for such road construction.

Mr. Duncan, mineral attorney in the Solicitor's office, believes that we should report unfavorably on this bill, and Messrs. Thomas, Wiener, and Kirgis are of the same opinion. Mr. Duncan has rewritten the report, and both his and the one prepared by Dr. Mendenhall are attached.

Mr. Duncan takes the position that such roads should not be constructed to increase the profits of mine owners, and he points out that such action may also have the effect of placing unnecessary ores on a depressed market and that economically the mineral deposits may not justify the cost of the road construction.

Dr. Mendenhall points out that these roads are to be constructed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, and the duties of the Department of the Interior are confined to geological surveys. He doubts the propriety of extending our report to activities which are not proposed by this legislation to be performed by this Department.

I am submitting both proposed reports to you herewith.

RUFUS G. POOLE,
Assistant Solicitor.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 17, 1935.

Memorandum for the Secretary.

In accordance with your decision, an adverse report on H. R. 6098, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to construct roads in national forests to facilitate mineral development, is submitted herewith. A copy of the favorable report prepared by Dr. Mendenhall is attached in folded form.

RUFUS G. POOLE,
Assistant Solicitor.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 24, 1935.

Hon. RENE L. DEROUEN,
Chairman, Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DEROUEN: I am in receipt of your letter of February 25 requesting a report on H. R. 6098, a bill to assist and promote the development of the mineral resources located within the national forests of the United States, authorizing the construction of roads by the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the owners or operators of mining properties, and for other purposes.

In the language of the bill, there is the plain implication that the proven presence of mineral or ore bodies in quantity and of commercial value is sufficient in itself to warrant the expenditure of public money to provide ways for their transportation, and upon the disclosure of such conditions alone, the applicant is entitled to the grant of his application.

In a broad sense, if ores are of commercial value, they can be mined, transported, and marketed at a profit, and if they can be so mined, transported, and marketed, no reason is seen for the use of public funds to increase the profits of the owner of the mine.

But assuming that what is meant is if minerals exist in quantity and commercial grade they can be produced at a profit, provided that the Government constructs and maintains roads and bridges to transport them within the forest, still I do not see the warrant for the expenditure of public money for such purpose unless a satisfactory showing is made that there is a public demand for the mineral from the mine to which the road is to be built, and like assurance that the road would be used for the transportation of minerals and supplies for a sufficient length of time to justify the cost of construction thereof.

Many factors, besides mere mineralogical conditions, would have to be considered as a basis for intelligent decision. Among these may be mentioned an inquiry whether the operator of the mine has the capital, the capacity, the mining facilities, and the bona fide purpose to mine and market the deposit; whether the existing market conditions would probably justify the throwing on the market of the additional product, or, stated differently, whether it is in the interest of sound conservation of mineral resources and economic policy to promote the mining of the particular resource at public expense, for it is not believed that any good purpose would be subserved in dumping unneeded mineral on a glutted or depressed market. An inquiry would also be pertinent, whether the contemplated scale of operations at the mine justified the cost of the building of the roads and bridges, which would entail the formulation and comparison of estimates of cost of the road and probable production of the mine.

It may be doubted whether the bill confers upon the Secretary the latitude of discretion above indicated and thought necessary for its proper administration. But unless such discretion can be exercised, there is a high probability in many instances that roads and bridges would be built for mines that would not be found economically practicable to work and the use for the purpose for which the roads were built would not be commenced or would be shortly abandoned, and that deposits that might be minable in a different situation or under different market conditions, would be used as a pretext for obtaining contracts to build roads.

Even if the bill confers authority upon the Secretary to consider all the factors necessary to justify the expenditure of public funds, the bill, if it becomes a law, is difficult of administration, requiring the determination of facts not easy to ascertain certainly, that are subject to controversy and change, and requires the Secretary to speculate upon the success of a proposed mining venture, and may result in the expenditure of public funds in private interest, without any compensatory benefits to the public interest.

The bill also further operates to give undue advantage to those having mineral deposits in the forests over others having like deposits similarly situation outside the forests.

For the reason stated, I do not look with favor on the bill.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE OF IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1935.

Hon. HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ICKES: Reference is made to your report on H. R. 6098, a bill introduced by myself "to assist and promote the development of the mineral resources located within the national forests of the United States, authorizing the construction of roads by the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the owners or operators of mining properties, and for other purposes," which you disapproved.

In considering this matter, let me bring to your attention the fact that vast undeveloped mineral deposits are located within the boundaries of the national forests in the Western States; that in these national forests many mining locations have been made and mining properties have been acquired by companies and individuals in good faith; that the owners of these mining properties are devoting their time and money to the development of these properties; that under the rules and regulations governing the administration of the national forests the owners and operators of these mining properties are entirely dependent upon the Federal Government for the construction of the necessary roads to afford transportation to the mining districts in which the properties are located, and that, pursuant to the policy that is being followed by the Forest Service in the construction of roads, the needs of the mining properties are met only so far as may be incidental to the program of road construction for forest administration and fire protection.

As stated in a letter recently received from an executive of the Forest Service:

"Under the policies heretofore governing the use of forest highway funds, money has not been available primarily for the purpose of constructing roads needed by miners to develop their properties or to open up areas of assumed mineral values. * * * There are relatively large demands being made by owners of mineral properties to have the Forest Service build roads into these properties or to have the Forest Service extend roads into particular sections of the national forests where minerals in paying quantities are alleged to exist. Obviously, all these demands can be met only to the extent that the program of forest roads needed for the protection and utilization of the Government resources of the national forests may incidentally serve the purposes which the miners have in mind." And, again at a later date:

"The road fund, as now made available to the Forest Service for the construction of truck trails and roads, does not permit the allocation of such funds for roads required primarily for the development of mining properties. Prior consideration must be given the roads needed for the protection and administration of the national forests."

From information that is available in the numerous geological reports on file in your Department, doubtless you are aware of the extent and value of some of the mineral deposits located in areas covered by the national forests. (See USGS Circular No. 9, 1934—Mendenhall—Geology and Ore Deposits of Idaho County.) Many of these mineralized areas have not as yet been examined and reported upon by the Geological Survey.

While I am aware of the valuable and extensive mineral deposits of our Western States, located largely within the boundaries of the national forests, I am more particularly conversant with the mineral resources of our State of Idaho and its record of production of the precious metals—gold and silver—produced from a region which, according to a statement made by Dr. Finch, Director of the Bureau of Mines, is the "greatest undeveloped gold area in the United States."

The importance of the gold deposits of this area (almost wholly within the national forests) has long been recognized by mining authorities. In the October 4, 1929, issue of the Engineering and Mining Journal there appears a treatise by Dr. Francis A. Thomson, now president of the Montana School of Mines, on the gold deposits of central Idaho. I quote from Dr. Thomson's article:

"The Idaho batholith is probably one of the best-known geologic features of the Pacific Northwest. * * *

"From gold veins in the batholith and in its roof were derived the placers of Boise Basin, in south-central Idaho, and of Elk City, Florence, Pierce City, and other camps of north-central Idaho, all of which were so abundantly productive in the sixties and seventies. * * * (Accredited by the United States Geological Survey with a gold production of $250,000,000.)

"The principal ore deposits of the country are steeply dipping fissure veins carrying principally gold and silver in a quartz gangue. * * *

"Such veins compare favorably, so far as size is concerned, with the gold veins of Australia, California, and Cripple Creek. The so-called dike deposits are purposely omitted from the tabulation given above. * * *

"The lack of suitable highways is such that, under existing transporation conditions, only placer mining and the working of bonanza gold viens could be expected to show a profit."

The bill H. R. 6098, under consideration, is designed and has been introduced to construct mining roads in the national forests, to facilitate the development of the mines and the utilization of the forest resources, not otherwise obtainable, similar to a plan that has been followed by the Canadian Government, which is a large factor in the success of the Dominion in increasing its gold production, which has expanded from 1,928,308 ounces in 1929, valued at $39,858,026, to 2,972,000 ounces, valued at $104,020,000 in 1934, and placed Canada for the first time ahead of the United States in gold production.

The Canadian Government has a very liberal policy in assisting miners to develop their properties. I quote from the Mines Development Act of British Columbia, chapter 164:

"2. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of Mines that development-work on a mineral or placer claim or group of mineral claims in any mining district has proved the existence of minerals or ore bodies in quantity and of commercial value sufficient to warrant an expenditure of public moneys for the construction of trails, roads and bridges to facilitate the operation and development of such mineral or placer claims, the Minister of Mines may authorize the expenditure of so much of the public moneys as may be required by the Minister of Public Works for the construction of such trails, roads and bridges."

The importance of the development of our gold resources has been emphasized by recent legislation which increased the value of gold $14.33 per ounce. One of the effects of this legislation has been to increase the value of gold mined annually in the British possessions, $225,000,000.

It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of developing the gold deposits in this country. When we consider the benefits to be derived by the increase in gold reserves, permanent employment in the mining industry, the stimulation to general business, by the development of these mining areas, and, of particular interest to the Government, additional sources of taxation revenue, by the payment of county, State, and Federal taxes, including capital stock taxes, corporation taxes, and income taxes, the Government, as has been stated by successful mine operators in California, takes about 50 percent of their revenue in the form of taxes. In view of these facts, it is apparent that the development of our mining resources, now isolated within the national forests, is of paramount importance to the whole Nation.

Turning to the statement made in your report, disapproving the bill: "If ores are of commercial value, they can be mined, transported, and marketed at a profit, and, if they can be so mined, transported and marketed, no reason is seen for the use of public funds to increase the profits of the owner of the mine," it is difficult to reconcile the position taken by your Department in this case with liberal policy that has been followed by our Government in the past, in providing means of transportation by the construction of roads, digging canals and harbors, improving waterways, subsidizing the construction of railways, and the operation of steamships and airways, which has contributed so largely to the development of our national resources and our national prosperity.

It is a fact that many mining properties located within the national forests contain ore deposits of commercial value "that can be mined, transported, and marketed at a profit," if the Government will do for these miners what it does for industry everywhere outside of the national forests—provide the necessary roads for transportation. Surely, the Federal Government will not evade the responsibility to provide the necessary roads for mining development, assumed when these areas, containing vast mineral resources and embracing many mining properties privately owned and acquired in good faith, were withdrawn from public domain and placed in the national forests where they are barred from receiving the assistance of the local government of the counties and States by the construction of the necessary roads.

Referring to the contention raised as to the conditions to be considered in approving an application for the construction of mining roads, it is assumed that you have in the personnel of the United States Geological Survey, or will employ, qualified representatives to examine and report on the merits of the property covered by these applications, similar to the plan followed in Canada, and that discretion will be exercised in approving these applications, which is provided for in the bill.

Instead of the bill giving "undue advantage to those having mineral deposits in the forests over others having like deposits similarly situated outside the forests," experience and comparisons will demonstrate that the opposite is the case, and thousands of valuable mining properties—in some cases entire mining districts—are lying idle and inaccessible due to the indifference and neglect of the Government to construct the necessary roads to open up the districts.

In view of the conditions affecting the development of mining properties located within the national forests, and the importance of the development of these mining resources to the prosperity and welfare of the country as a whole, I urge that your report on this bill be reconsidered and that your Department report the bill favorably.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 6, 1936.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WHITE: I have had under consideration your letter of July 27, 1935, urging reconsideration of my unfavorable report of April 24, 1935, on H. R. 6098, introduced by you, entitled "A bill to assist and promote the development of mineral resources located within the national forests of the United States, authorizing the construction of roads by the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the owners or operators of mining properties, and for other purposes."

As your letter came just before the adjournment of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress and laid considerable stress on certain publications relating to the mineral resources in Idaho, considerable areas of such resources being in national forests, early reply was deferred pending a study of these publications.

The issue of October 4, 1929, of the Engineering and Mining Journal, as well as issues preceding and following that date, were searched for the treatise referred to by you, written by Dr. Francis A. Thomson, but without success. A treatise on the geology and gold resources of north and central Idaho by Dr. Thomson and Samuel A. Ballard was published as Bulletin No. 7 of the Idaho Bureau of Mines in 1924, and has been examined as well as the publication of the Geological Survey of 1934, relating to ore deposits and geology in certain parts of Idaho, to which apparently you referred.

Conceding, as these publications disclose, the existence of great potential wealth of the lands in Idaho, and in the national forests in that State, for gold, and that development thereof may be to some extent impeded by lack of suitable roads, I am unable to see that these facts present a persuasive argument for the bill presented.

The owners and operators of mining properties in the national forests are not absolutely dependent upon the Federal Government for the construction of roads to afford transportation to the mining districts in which the properties are located, if what is meant is that they are dependent on national forest roads constructed at the expense of the Government and out of the appropriations made to the Secretary of Agriculture for that purpose in order to have access to their mines from without the forests. The act of March 3, 1889, chapter 427, section 1 (30 Stat. 1233, U. S. C., title 16, sec. 525), provides that: "In the form provided by existing law the Secretary of the Interior may file and approve surveys and plats of any right-of-way for a wagon road, railroad, or other highways over and across any national forest when in his judgment the public interest will not be injuriously affected thereby."

Under these provisions the owners of mining properties, or a group of them, may obtain rights to construct roads within the forests, and I am not convinced that the only or the principal factor contributing to idleness of mines or mining districts is due to the indifference and neglect of the Government to construct the necessary roads to open up the district.

The liberal policy you refer to of the Government in the past in providing means of transportation by the construction of roads, digging canals and harbors, improving waterways and subsidizing railroads, the construction of railroads, and the operation of steamships and airways, which have contributed so largely to the development of our national resources and our national prosperity, do not seem to afford sufficient precedents for constructing roads at Government expense for the sole benefit of individual mine owners upon the finding that development on a mineral or placer claim "has proved the existence of mineral or ore bodies in quantity and commercial grade." It is not apparent that the subsidizing or financial aid of the Government authorized under these conditions would contribute to the prosperity and welfare of the country as a whole, as my previous report sought to point out.

Without further comment, my conclusion is that your letter does not meet or remove the major objections assigned heretofore by me to the enactment of this legislation in its present form, and I, therefore, adhere to my previous conclusion.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

SECRETARY ICKES' VIEWS 10 YEARS LATER

[From the American magazine, November 8, 1945]

THE WAR AND OUR VANISHING RESOURCES

(By Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior)

(America today is out on a limb, says the custodian of our natural resources. Five years of war have made us a have-not nation in vital minerals. * * * A timely warning to those who feel overconfident about the "inexhaustible" wealth of the United States.)

We may have peacetime conscription. We may retain a tremendous peacetime Navy. But the plain fact is that we cannot afford another prolonged war in 20 or 30 years.

Not that we haven't the men; not that we haven't the will to fight again if we have to; not that we haven't the cash—we just haven't got the oil, the copper, the zinc, and the mercury, which are so vital to the machines and munitions of modern warfare.

The prodigal harvest of minerals that we have reaped to win this war has bankrupted some of our most vital mineral resources. We no longer deserve to be listed with Russia and the British Empire as one of the have nations of the world. We should be listed with the have nots, such as Germany and Japan.

The overwhelming significance of this change from a "have" to a "have not" nation lies in these facts: Without mineral resources, the United States could never have built the ships, the planes, and the guns which have made us the greatest military power in the world. We could never have been more than an agricultural country. We could never have been able to support, at a standard of living that is the envy of the world, the 135,000,000 people now living within our borders.

Does this change in status mean that we are about to become a pushover for other countries, that our standard of living will be greatly reduced, that we shall all become farmers, and horse-and-buggy farmers, at that? This, in fact, is the future that we are now carving out for our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren by our do-nothing policy.

It should be burned into our consciousness that we do not have an inexhaustible supply of minerals—the sinew that makes this country mighty. Our minerals are not inexhaustible and irreplaceable. Unlike wheat and corn, new crops of minerals do not appear from year to year. Further, the faster we grow in industrial strength and military potency, the more rapidly we dissipate our mineral resources—the very basis of our military and industrial power.

To prevent the decline of the United States as a major military and industrial power, and to maintain our high standard of living, we must take immediate positive action to increase our known mineral resources. We must begin at once:

To stock-pile minerals;

To explore our country more extensively than ever before;

To hunt for better methods of recovering metals from scrap;

To have access, in common with other peacefully disposed nations, to minerals in the lands that have been conquered in the recent war, for from now on we shall be increasingly dependent upon imports for our minerals.

The bountiful heritage of minerals and oil with which the United States was originally endowed has tended, unfortunately, to make most of us complacent about these resources, and our time has been spent in patting ourselves on the back for mining such great quantities of them. This puts us in the position of the man who was so happy about the speed at which he was sawing off the limb that he forgot that he was sitting on the limb.

How close we are to cutting off the limb that supports us can be seen by casting up our accounts to ascertain the cost of this war to our mineral resources, and inventorying how much we have left.

Between January 1, 1940, and January 1, 1945, we tore from the earth some 5,000,000,000 tons of minerals. Included in this total are 516,158,500 tons of domestic iron ore, the most astonishing amount ever produced by this or any other nation in a similar period. During this period we mined 3,061,060,000 tons of coal, or enough to cover the whole city of New York with a blanket of coal 12 feet thick.

Here are some figures which will give an idea of the variety and quantity of our mineral resources that have been sacrificed on the altar of the god of war. In the 5-year period from New Year's Day, 1940, we mined:

	Tons
Coal	3,061,060,000
Iron ore	516,158,500
Lead	2,278,000
Zinc	3,642,000
Copper	5,000,000
Bauxite	14,169,000
Tungsten	20,750
Molybdenum	112,000
Sulphur	17,118,000
Salt	68,000,000
Potassium	3,155,000
Petroleum	1,000,000,000

Into the war machine and domestic economy also went 15,700,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas. The tonnage of petroleum mentioned about equals 7,325,000,000 barrels. Some idea of the demands upon our petroleum resources may be measured by the fact that the United States has 36 percent of the known oil reserves of the world, but has been furnishing approximately 60 percent of the petroleum used in the war.

These figures do not encompass our total mineral production during the war; we have also mined large amounts of other minerals, but they do show how great has been our dependence upon our minerals and what great quantities of these limited resources we have used.

If we are to continue as a dominant industrial and military power, the big question is not so much what we have used, but what we have left.

The fact is that some of our "blue chip" minerals have been depleted to the critical point. On the basis of known usable reserves, we have in this country only nine major minerals which, at the 1935-39 rate of use, may be expected to last 100 years or more—nitrogen, magnesium, salt, bituminous coal and lignite, phosphate rock, molybdenum, anthracite, potash, and iron ore. And a hundred years is nothing in the life of a nation.

We have less than a 35-year peacetime commercial supply of 21 minerals. The significance of this is that 35 years are but little more than the usual interval between wars, and among these 21 minerals are petroleum, copper, lead, and zinc, in the production of which we have led the world for many years. The others are sulfur, natural gas, fluorspar, cadmium, gold, lead, silver, bauxite, vanadium, antimony, tungsten, platinum, asbestos, manganese, chromite, nickel, and tin. Our automobile and electrical industries, to mention only two, would not have made the advances that they have made, had they been hampered by shortages in any of these minerals.

So far, I have mentioned coal, iron ore, and petroleum only briefly. Their prime importance—imagine the United States trying to get along without the products made possible by coal and iron and petroleum—merits special consideration, however. Coal is the Nation's No. 1 mineral asset. Iron ore ranks second, and petroleum third.

Just how important coal is to a nation's economy is shown by the fact that the five great centers of industrial and military power—the United States, England, Russia, Japan, and western Europe—have developed on the basis of large coal resources.

Coal is the stuff that spins the wheels of most of our industry. It would appear that we have plenty of coal, but already our reserves of high-grade coking coals, without which it is difficult to make steel, are none too plentiful, and their lack may compel us to seek different and perhaps more expensive ways of making steel, within a comparatively few years.

Despite their fundamental importance, we don't know enough about coking coal resources. In mining almost any bed of coal, a third or more of the coal in that bed is irrevocably lost. Some of this loss is unavoidable, but much of it could be prevented if the cutthroat competition in the industry did not force the mine owners to take the easy pickings and turn to new coal beds, instead of getting all of the coal that there is out of any particular seam. Further, there is no wisdom, from a national viewpoint, in consuming our limited reserves of high-grade coking coals to generate steam for power plants, when these coals are so vital to the making of steel. Steam plants can use lower-grade coals. We have plenty of them.

Iron ore is an outstanding resource in four of the five great centers of industrial power. Much to her regret, Japan is notably deficient in iron ore, and attempted to overcome this weakness through aggression. Our reserves of iron ore do not match those of coal by a wide margin. Originally, some 6,000,000,000 tons of usable ore were to be found in the good earth of this country. About two-thirds of the original cache remains, but, in true American style, we have already licked the icing off the cake, and much of the ore that is left will be harder and more expensive to get.

The high-quality ores which are found in the Mesabi Range in Minnesota will soon be only a rusty memory. This ore is the cream of our resources, because it can be mined cheaply and because it is so free of other minerals that it can be used directly in the blast furnace, without prior treatment. These high-quality ores account for 50 percent of the total iron production of the country. At the prewar rate of extraction, the remaining tonnage will be exhausted in 22 years.

We must develop our lower-grade ores, and we shall have to build large plants to treat them. Such plants will limit production capacity and will be costly. But to maintain our position of self-sufficiency would justify some extra cost to the public, although the consumer cannot be expected to assume an unreasonable burden, such as paying $10 for an iron frying pan.

As to oil, the daily newspapers give evidence that supplies are far from ample to meet all demands. The American Petroleum Institute estimates known or proved reserves of oil at 20,000,000,000 barrels. Last year we produced 1,700,000,000 barrels of crude oil.

Thus, if future discoveries fail to bring in enough oil, we shall shortly—in 15 to 20 years—be faced with the need for developing sources of oil supply outside of the continental boundaries of the United States. Under peacetime conditions, substantial quantities of oil could be obtained from the Caribbean area and, if necessary, from more distant sources, such as Saudi Arabia and Bahrein. This would seem to be the cheapest solution.

Secondary recovery of domestic supply from apparently depleted oil fields has begun already, and could be increased considerably at higher prices.

Synthetic liquid fuels also offer a feasible, though more costly, solution. Synthetic motor fuel can probably be made from coal at 18 cents a gallon in large plants. The Bureau of Mines of the Department of the Interior is experimenting in the production of synthetic gasoline in commercial-sized plants. Costs of from 12 to 15 cents are possible after the techniques have been fully developed. The costs of producing gasoline from crude petroleum are approximately 5 cents a gallon.

If we exhaust our readily available domestic reserves of minerals—what experts call our commercial reserves—the car owner, manufacturer, or housewife is directly affected. The consumer's automobile, his electric iron, and his refrigerator will cost more, because we shall be forced to pay the extra cost of shipping these minerals in from abroad, and it will cost more to extract what we call our submarginal resources.

Our submarginal resources of today may be, and frequently are, our commercial reserves of tomorrow, because almost all of the earth which covers the United States contains minerals which could be used if we were willing to pay the price for extracting them. This, of course, could be tremendously expensive and might run the cost of some minerals up to several hundred dollars a pound.

Already technological advances indicate that this possibility is not too remote in some fields. Before the war the aluminum industry, for instance, would not attempt to use bauxite which contained more than 8 percent silica. Bauxite deposits found to have more silica than this were rejected as unfit for use, and this constituted our submarginal supply. New processes have been developed whereby bauxite containing 20 percent silica is being used, and bauxite containing a greater proportion of silica constitutes our submarginal supply. Tomorrow, with improved technology, bauxites containing even more silica may be used.

Because most commercial companies hesitate to spend money in this field, federally financed research along this line would pay big dividends. In inventorying the Nation's mineral resources, I have, however, discounted the possible enlargement of our sources of supply by the discovery of new methods of extraction for two reasons: first, these methods have not yet been found or perfected; and, second, in some cases we just haven't the minerals in submarginal supply.

But, if we are willing to pay the price for them, our potential reserves of iron ore, phosphate rock, molybdenum, potash, and all forms of sulfur are ample for many years to come. Resources of nitrogen, magnesium, and salt, for practical purposes, may be regarded as limitless as the sea and the sky from which they are drawn. There are large submarginal resources of bauxite, manganese, and vanadium. How our submarginal resources of uranium stand will have to await further exploration.

But of such vitally necessary minerals as copper, lead, zinc, tin, nickel, and chromite, little is left. We shall have to import these minerals in larger and larger quantities. Otherwise, we shall be faced with the prospect of a civilization without all of the necessities (batteries, paints, washtubs, plumbing supplies, tin cans, shiny automobile radiators) with which these minerals now provide us.

Even more alarming than the fact that we are coming to the end of some of our known resources is the fact that we are uncovering few, if any, unknown deposits of minerals.

The failure of petroleum discoveries to keep pace with the rapid rate of depletion has received much attention during the war. Discovery of other mineral deposits has declined alarmingly for half a century. No major metal-producing district comparable to Butte, Bisbee, Homestake, or Coeur d'Alene has been brought into production in the United States since 1916. There have been few important copper discoveries in this country during the twentieth century. Most of the large producing deposits were known before 1900. The largest discovery since then has been the United Verde Extension mine at Jerome, Ariz.

New discoveries now depend upon the development of effective and economical means of finding deposits not recognizable from surface indications alone. Large quantities or ore hidden deep in the earth have been found by underground exploration conducted in active mining areas. Geophysical methods have been very successful in locating petroleum deposits. New findings of concealed resources by a combination of these methods are looked for, but we have come to the end of the good old days when digging for water might produce an oil gusher or a gold mine.

In view of our impending "have not" position, should we shut down our mines and preserve the scarce resources remaining in the ground for future emergencies? No. The cost would be too great. It would be wasteful, because much of the unmined portions of developed deposits probably could never be recovered after prolonged shutdowns. The abrupt shut-down would strand thousands of miners and their families in isolated mining areas. Huge capital losses would be incurred. For these reasons, the proposal does not seem to merit serious consideration.

Then what can we do?

Stockpiles should be built up, for this is one of the surest ways of assuring our basic security in minerals in time of need.

A large-scale stockpiling program would provide a reservoir into which domestic materials might be placed in times of depression. This would mean that the Nation would benefit from low costs and the miners would have employment. Such a stockpiling program during the last depression would have given us a substantial inventory that would have eased greatly the job of producing minerals during the war years.

Such minerals as we lack entirely, or whose supply here is insignificant, should be imported and added to our stockpiles.

Our second line of defense is our marginal and submarginal resources. Exploration for new deposits should be carried on vigorously, and plans made for emergency production.

Private industry alone cannot be expected to carry this burden. Since the defense of the Nation is involved, the work of private industry should be aided by Government research and by Government-sponsored explorations. Such a program might lead to the development of new peacetime industries. Interesting possibilities in this direction are offered by our large deposits of manganese-, vanadium-, and aluminum-bearing materials.

We should never again be so prodigal as we have been in the past in bestowing our precious scrap upon nations that may send it back in the form of bullets and bombs. Further, we should spend time and money in seeking new and better ways to recover metals from scrap.

As our mineral resources grow smaller, and as we are compelled more and more to seek raw materials outside of our borders, we must keep our military forces—our Army, Navy, and air arm—strong enough to do our share in maintaining the peace of the world—a peace that is necessary if we are to bring in what we require for our own economy. Without a strong military force, we would be laying open the life lines of raw materials to the first aggressor who could gather a sizable military force about him.

We must encourage and support, morally and financially, the investigations of our research workers and scientists.

If followed, the program that I suggest would prevent or postpone for many years the loss by the United States of its dominant position and its high standard of living.

Such a program would cost money, and, as a Nation, we have been willing to talk a great deal about conservation, but unwilling to put up much cash for it. We have preferred to see millions of cubic feet of an irreplaceable resource—natural gas—flared off—burned up—rather than spend money to store it. We have preferred to waste millions of tons of coal, rather than halt cheap but wasteful methods of mining.

The time has come to face the fact that we can no longer afford to keep our present nonconservation policy. The need in war for modern weapons made from metal and propelled by mineral fuels, mineral shortages that have at times threatened serious repercussions on the battlefront, the scarcity of the modern conveniences to which we have become accustomed, and fuel and gasoline rationing ought to have brought home to us the tremendous importance of minerals in modern life. The situation calls for positive action on a long-range program that will guarantee the Nation's future mineral supply.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD of September 15, 1950, roll call

276 shows that I had a general pair. That was the bill authorizing the appointment of General of the Army George C. Marshall to the office of Secretary of Defense.

I desire that the RECORD clearly show that I favored that appointment and would have voted for the legislation.

Greater Sobriety Will Be Needed To Win World War III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted me by the House, I am including an article by Dr. J. Raymond Schmidt, editor of a magazine entitled "The Civic Forum."

The article is entitled "Greater Sobriety Will Be Needed To Win World War III." It follows:

Everyone remembers how the brewers capitalized on World War II. For proof of this we quote the Brewer's Digest of May 1941, as follows: "One of the finest things that could have happened to the brewing industry was the insistence of high ranking officers to make beer available to Army camps. The opportunity presented to the brewing industry by this measure is so obvious that it is superfluous to go into detail. Here is a chance for brewers to cultivate a taste for beer in millions of young men who will eventually constitute the largest beer consuming section of our population."

From the above we see how the young men in the armed services were placed at the mercy of the brewers by the military officers in charge of their training. That was the basest sort of betrayal of the parents who had entrusted the moral training and welfare of their sons to the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines.

The brewers are always seeking new business. Without an increasing army of guzzlers profits might go into a decline. Of that there is no immediate danger according to an address delivered before a convention of brewers by Kenneth Laird, advertising expert, and reported in the Brewer's Journal of March 1947. Here is what Mr. Laird told the brewers: "Consumers demand is in a healthy condition. Ten million GI's have learned to know and to like beer much earlier than they would have done as civilians. Beer has an increased social standing. These factors combine to make good business in the future. For 5 years there has been no need to sell. Uncle Sam has been your sales manager and the best you ever had."

The Army has already opened bars in Alaska—one of America's most important outposts. There could be a second Pearl Harbor in Alaska. Let us learn a lesson from the attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. It is now generally conceded that drink was largely responsible for our forces not being on the alert in that hour of crisis.

The outbreak of the Korean War resulted in the extension of selective service for 1 year. Within the past 2 months steps have been taken to induct into service an ever-increasing number of young men registered under the draft law. Many of these will be only 19 and 20 years of age.

The future success of these men as soldiers and later as civilians may depend upon their being shielded from the greedy designs of the brewers, distillers, and vintners. But America's big stake in any war in which she may be engaged will be to win it. Men in battle, especially officers, need clear brains and steady nerves. Can alcohol-befuddled brains be counted upon to win the next big war in which we may become involved?

There are two bills in the House of Representatives which would reenact the provisions against alcohol and vice which obtained in World War I. These bills make it a misdemeanor to have alcoholic beverages in camps or any military or naval establishments. Said bills are H. R. 3114, introduced by Representative EDWARD H. REES, Republican, of Kansas, and H. R. 886, introduced by Representative STEPHEN PACE, Democrat, of Georgia.

It would be a fine thing for churches, Good Templar and other lodges, youth groups, and clubs to adopt resolutions recommending legislation to ban alcoholic beverages from camps and military, air, or naval installations, and to make it a misdemeanor to sell or give alcoholic beverages to members of the armed services.

Farm Subsidy Loss Two Hundred and Forty-nine Million in 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent of the House I insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "Farm Subsidy Loss Two Hundred and Forty-nine Million in 1950." The article follows:

FARM SUBSIDY LOSS 249 MILLION IN 1950—MEANWHILE, ARMED SERVICES ARE BARRED FROM RECEIVING ANY SURPLUS PRODUCE

WASHINGTON, August 24.—The Commodity Credit Corporation reported today it had a net loss on its farm price-support operations of $249,230,000 for the year ended June 30.

This compares with a net loss of $254,000,000 for the previous 12 months.

Ralph S. Trigg, President of the Corporation, reported that the agency had $3,538,125,000 tied up in price-support-program, loans and inventories June 30.

Of this total, loans outstanding totaled $914,189,000, including $438,444,000 of commodity loans held by lending agencies $471,741,000 held by the CCC and $4,004,000 of loans approved but not fully processed. Inventories acquired under loan, purchase agreement, and direct purchase operations represented an investment of $2,623,935,000.

Price support operations in four commodities, corn, tobacco, cotton, and wheat, accounted for the bulk of the loan total. The loans outstanding on these included $558,125,192 on corn, $125,533,453 on tobacco, $121,037,810 on cotton, and $65,115,228 on wheat.

Mr. Trigg said the net loss in carrying the support program was largely on potatoes, eggs, peanuts, and wheat.

Meanwhile, Agriculture Department officials said nothing would be gained by turning over Government-owned surplus food stocks to the Armed Forces.

The armed services have been buying the bulk of their supplies on the open market. At the same time the Commodity Credit Corporation has been adding to the stocks of food it has taken off the market to support the prices.

The CCC now has in storage more than 190,000,000 pounds of butter, some 103,000,000 pounds of cheese, 400,000,000 pounds of dried milk, and 108,000,000 pounds of dried eggs.

Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, Republican of Delaware, recently said the Armed Forces had been spending millions of dollars for food that should have been made available from the Government-held stocks.

A spokesman for the Agriculture Department said:

"First of all, the law does not authorize the CCC to give its surplus foods to the Armed Forces. The CCC can sell these surplus foods to the Armed Forces at the same price it sells to other outlets, but there would be no benefit there.

"On butter, for instance, the CCC pays 60 cents a pound for it to support the price and sells it for 63 cents a pound. There is no point in the Army paying 63 cents to the CCC when it can get it at 60 cents on the open market."

Little Men in Big Places

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick of September 7, 1950:

LITTLE MEN IN BIG PLACES

The tragedy of American ineptitude is now being written in blood on the battlefields of Korea. On steep mountain slopes and in soggy rice paddies 6,000 miles from home, brave youths are dying because we, the people, have been the gullible victims of political charlatans.

Day by day the evidence grows that the terrible price America is now paying in an attempt to hold back the godless hordes of communism is traceable in a large degree to the inadequacy of American governmental leadership—to our own stupidity in electing to high office men of insufficient caliber to cope with the crafty and ruthless murderers of the Kremlin.

Little men in big places.

Who is there among us cannot recall that just a few months ago Secretary of Defense Johnson boasted that should Russia attack us at 4 o'clock we would be ready to meet her at 5; that Mr. Acheson, our Secretary of State, ruled out Formosa as none of our business at the very moment the Communists were crowding our Nationalist friends off the mainland of China; that the President himself just shortly before the Red strike in Korea assured us the prospects for peace never were brighter.

And who cannot recall the statements emanating from those in high authority about new and irresistible weapons that would give America dominance over any potential aggressor, and would insure our security—weapons which we now discover were not even in the blueprint stage.

Little men in big places.

What kind of defense guardians, what kind of protectors of the freedoms we so dearly cherish are those guilty of such foolish and stupid—perhaps, even dishonest—remarks concerning our national security? When all the while, as we have learned at such tragic cost, we were wholly unprepared and militarily impotent to cope swiftly and successfully with even a minor Soviet satellite.

Now boys are dying in Korea, youths are being shunted in wholesale numbers into the Armed Forces from their pursuits of peace, and the Nation's resources are being mobilized at a frantic pace to meet the Communist tide. We are paying in blood, sweat, and tears for the sell-out at Yalta and the blundering policy in China and the Far East, climaxed by the tragedy of Korea.

Little men in big places.

While we were being lulled into a sense of false security and the Russians continued to build up the greatest military force in the history of the world, tools of the Kremlin monsters bored from within on the United States home front. To our sorrow we now know of Red infiltration, of stolen Government secrets, and of thefts of data on the atomic bomb, the weapon upon which the hopes for world peace were so largely based. And these revelations brought ridicule upon those who dragged traitors into the open and cries of red herring at every attempt to ferret out Communist spies.

What about the cases of Alger Hiss, Judith Coplon, Klaus Fuchs, Harry Gold, and others? Are they red herrings now?

Little men in big places.

We have been victims of our own stupidity in permitting our affairs of state to remain in the hands of those who squandered our resources in a reckless spending orgy; who disrupted the economy through burdensome taxes, meddlesome Government policies, and the coddling of irresponsible cliques; and who are gradually leading us down the road to a welfare state.

While they feathered their own political nests and squandered billions to further their socialistic schemes, these puny ward politicians who are attempting to fill men's shoes extracted the bone and muscle from our Armed Forces under the guise of economy, and left us almost totally unprepared to meet the strike of a ruthless foe who would destroy freedom everywhere and make men the pawns of the state.

And now they have the effrontery to ask us to continue them in power. How dumb do they think we are? How far down the road of self-reliance and self-respect do they think we have strayed? How much longer do they think we can stomach the fumbling that has brought on the precarious situation in which we now find ourselves?

Little men in big places.

The issue long since has passed the partisan stage. No longer does it matter whether a man is a Republican or a Democrat. We, the people, must demand of the candidate seeking a seat in Congress or other high office whether he stands for the true principles of America, or whether he is an irresponsible apologist for the outrageous scuttling of our ship of state under New Deal-Fair Deal guidance.

True, we are engaged in a vital contest with communism. We must marshal all our resources, all our strength, all our energy to carry on that fight and win the final verdict for peace and freedom.

But while we do this we should not forget the outrageous blunders, the monstrous mistakes of appeasement that brought this fight upon us. We must not condone the appeasers, for men and policies capable of mistakes that cost American lives, do not deserve a second chance.

Letter of the Late Pfc John J. McCormick

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENJAMIN F. JAMES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, richly endowed are those to whom it is given to add even one small leaf to the evergreen garlands of poetry and prose that brings comfort or cheer or promise into the homes where little children live.

Long years ago a humble schoolmaster, unable to afford even a small gift for his children at Christmas, wrote a little story—just for them alone. His story, 'Twas the Night Before Christmas, has lived on through the years to gladden the hearts of countless little ones in all lands, and to bring back to all of us happy memories of Christmases long gone.

A busy editor, magnificently inspired, took the time to answer a query from a doubting tot, Is there a Santa Claus?

Yes; Virginia, there is a Santa Claus, has been printed and reprinted over and over throughout the land with each succeeding Christmas—nor has it to this day lost any of its charm and its power to sustain the faith and hopes of little children.

Another had been added to the long list of those whose inspired messages for children will live and deeply move both young and old.

A young soldier died in combat in Korea, but before he went into battle, he took a piece of note paper from his helmet and wrote a letter to his two small daughters back home. His letter was delivered on September 14. Three days earlier his wife was notified that Pfc John J. McCormick, 28, of Collingdale, Pa.—paratroop veteran of World War II, infantryman in Korea—had been killed in action.

John McCormick, the man, the husband and father, will live in the loving memory of his little family until the end, but his letter may well live on among the finest things written for children.

Mr. Speaker, I include, in extension of my own remarks, the letter by Pfc John J. McCormick to his children, believing that it well merits inclusion in the official RECORD of the Congress:

DEAR JOANNIE AND ROSE MARIE: This is daddy. I want you to listen and pay attention while mummie reads this to you. Just try and make believe I was there talking to you.

Joannie, I don't think you'll remember me because you were a little baby when I had to go away, but I used to sit and hold you a lot, and when you were a bad little girl, I used to make you sit in a chair until you were good, but I always loved you a lot and I was very proud of you.

Rose Marie, you should remember me because I used to take you out with me a lot, and I used to buy you a lot of candy and sodas, and I used to feel so good when people used to say you had eyes like mine. Remember the little puppy I bought you? Your mummie used to tie a little pink ribbon around its neck and you used to carry it in your arms. You looked awfully cute.

I want you both to know that I'd be with you if I could, but there are a lot of bad men in the world, and if they were allowed to do what they wanted to do, little girls like you wouldn't be allowed to go to church on Sunday or be able to go to the schools you wanted to.

So I have to help fight these men and keep them from coming where you and mummie live. It might take a long while, and maybe daddy will have to go and help God in heaven, and if do, I always want you both to be good for mummie because she is the best mummie in the world.

She had always taken care of you while I have been away. You see, kids, I happened to be caught in two wars inside 10 years, and the reason I am where I am today is because I am fighting for what I think is right.

That's one thing I always want both of you to remember. If your conscience tells you something is right, always stand up for it. You might be ridiculed for doing so, but in the long run you'll find out that people respect you more for doing so.

When you grow up to be young ladies, don't ever for et all that mummie has done for you. She has often gone without clothes for herself so that both of you could have nice things. I want you to do as she says—go to church on Sundays and you can always pray for daddy.

So remember, kids, when you grow up, save this letter in case I'm not there to talk to you, and try and remember all I am saying, for its for your good, and because I love you and mummie so much.

I'll be in a hole, fighting, in a few days, in a place called Korea. I carry your picture, and mummie's next to my heart, and if I have to go to help God, you'll know that the last thought I had on this earth was for the two of you and mummie. All my love and kisses. Be good and God bless you.

DADDY.

Americans' Failure To Vote Shames Our Valued Freedoms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SID SIMPSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Jacksonville (Ill.) Daily Journal of September 20, 1950. The editorial follows:

AMERICANS' FAILURE TO VOTE SHAMES OUR VALUED FREEDOMS

We Americans don't like to be preached to about our shortcomings. But sometimes there's no other way to stir us up. Take, for instance, this matter of voting. Apparently it doesn't do any good to talk in general terms about voting as a solemn duty or a rare privilege. Lectures along that line have been delivered for years. But in 1948, a presidential election year, only around half of all eligible voters actually went to the polls. If blunt language is needed to make Americans understand the shamefulness of this performance, then it ought to be used.

We think we have the greatest democracy in the world. Yet in free elections in the past few years, Britain, Australia, Italy, and even west Germany have vastly outstripped us in the basic democratic job of voting. Note that two of these countries had had long experience under dictators. Yet each found more than 80 percent of the people voting when their first real elections were held.

Constantly we have it dinned into our ears nowadays that if we're to lick world communism we must sell democracy abroad. The uncomfortable fact is we haven't been practicing it as well as some of the people we're supposed to be selling it to: the west Germans, for example.

None of this means, of course, that we don't care about freedom and its rights and duties. It just means that we've allowed the complexity and fascination of our big city-industrial life to distract us from our responsibilities.

By now, though, we ought to have seen enough of the world's present perils to realize that our beautiful, gadget-filled existence might be wiped right off the face of the globe if we don't make the right decisions. Those decisions are fundamentally the people's job. And they can only make them at the polls.

November 7 is another voting day, the first general election since 1948. The world will be watching to see whether Americans have learned to prize their voting rights more than another rubber of bridge or a day at the ball game or a regular place on the washing-machine schedule.

Admission of Hawaii to Union as State Would Be Living Example of United States Belief in Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to present a letter appearing in the New York Times of September 17 from J. B. Atherton, of Honolulu, Hawaii, president of the Mutual Telephone Co. of that city. The letter follows:

ADMITTING HAWAII—INROADS OF COMMUNISM DENIED IN PLEA FOR STATEHOOD

HONOLULU, September 7, 1950.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In your edition of September 3 you published a letter from John Williams, which dwells on certain population statistics for Hawaii, and seems to indicate that an argument against statehood for Hawaii is the effort of Communists in the islands in seeking to turn race against race.

It is my considered opinion that the facts adduced by Mr. Williams strongly support the case for immediate statehood for Hawaii. I head a company which serves all the islands of Hawaii, the fourth largest of the nearly 6,000 independent telephone companies in the United States. I have and do advocate statehood for Hawaii. I submit that I could scarcely be expected to do so if I believed there was even a remote possibility that Communists within Hawaii could endanger private enterprise under statehood.

There is solid evidence that communism is rapidly on the wane in Hawaii, and that at no time did Communist organization in Hawaii make the progress that it has made in certain major areas in continental United States.

TESTIMONY ON MEMBERSHIP

Representative FRANCIS E. WALTER, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the subcommittee of the United States House Un-American Activities Committee which investigated subversive influences in Hawaii earlier this year, testified at a Senate committee hearing on Statehood last May 2 that at the peak of Communist organization in Hawaii in 1946 the Communist Party had only 160 members, and that it had only 90 members as of last April. He said many former members "broke with the Communist Party when they found they were actually in an international movement and not merely members of an organization that was set up * * * to improve the lot of the workers."

Representative WALTER predicted that with increased awareness of the nature of Communism the membership would continue to decline rapidly in Hawaii. He said further the estimate of a membership of only 90 represented months of investigation by the committee's investigators, in which they had the cooperation of the FBI and the Naval and Military Intelligence.

If there are only 90 actual party members in Hawaii, that would indicate only 1 for about 5,100 of population. A few months ago J. Edgar Hoover revealed estimates of Communist Party membership in various States. These estimates indicated 1 member for about 1,400 of population in the State of California, and an even larger membership in relation to population in New York. The House Un-American Activities Committee hearings in Hawaii indicated that the Communist movement in the islands had been inspired, developed, and guided by the party organization in California. It is clear that communism has had little appeal for the people of Hawaii.

LOYALTY OF CITIZENS

It is true that a majority of the citizens of these islands are of Asiatic ancestry, and that the largest single group, on the basis of ancestry, is Japanese. Rather than being an argument against statehood at this time, this situation presents the strongest possible argument for statehood now.

The loyalty of Hawaii's citizens of Japanese ancestry was brilliantly proved in the Second World War by those who worked for American victory in the islands and by the heroism and sacrifice of those who fought with the United States military forces. Even today many island youths of Japanese ancestry are fighting and dying with the United States forces in Korea.

I have lived with these splendid American citizens all my life. I went to school with them. I work with them every day. It is fantastic to question their loyalty, or to imply that they are especially vulnerable to subversive influences.

Hawaii is as proud of her citizens of Asiatic ancestry, as New York is proud of her citizens of European ancestry.

Meanwhile, Communist propagandists are carrying out an intensive campaign throughout Asia to convince peoples there that the United States represents white-supremacy imperialism. There has been alarming evidence for many months now that we have been losing the ideological war in Asia.

What better evidence is there anywhere than in Hawaii that the United States represents true democracy, and offers opportunity to all without respect to race or creed? While Hawaii enjoys a very high degree of local self-government today, this living example to Asia would be greatly strengthened by granting statehood, because in the minds of many territorial status is synonymous with colonialism.

Air-Mail Subsidies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT CROSSER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House has favorably reported H. R. 9184 to carry out the recommendations of both President Truman and the Hoover Commission to separate subsidies from the air-mail payments of the post office.

Mr. Speaker, let me quote the recommendations for this legislation contained in President Truman's 1951 budget message to the Congress:

At present, direct financial assistance to the airlines is provided through air-mail payments, which are set generally at levels adequate to cover deficiences in the carriers' commercial revenues. Subsidy is thus merged with the fair compensation for carrying mail, making it difficult to evaluate the cost of this aid in relation to its benefits.

The recent rise in total air-mail payments—to an estimated level of about $125,000,000 in 1950—has made it increasingly important that the subsidy element be separately identified.

I recommend, therefore, the immediate enactment of legislation to authorize the separation of subsidy payments from mail compensation. Such subsidies should be paid from funds appropriated to the Civil Aeronautics Board specifically for that purpose.

At the hearings this spring before the transportation subcommittee under the chairmanship of the Member from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] this measure was supported by Secretary Sawyer, the Postmaster General, representatives of the A. F. of L. and CIO, the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, and by veterans and other groups. Twelve witnesses favored and only one opposed. The committee deliberated very carefully before favorably reporting H. R. 9184.

This bill will bring about a needed improvement, and should pass overwhelmingly.

Secretary Marshall and the China Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Marshall on the Spot," published in the Washington Post of September 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows.

MARSHALL ON THE SPOT

General Marshall was less than candid in his testimony about China in the hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee—so much so that in the early editions of the New York Times the report was captioned: Marshall Disavows China Policy. He said he had accepted the commission to China at the President's request. "While I was in this room," General Marshall said, referring to the Pearl Harbor hearing in December 1945, "the policy of the United States had been drawn up in the State Department. That policy, of course, speaks for itself." He added that the policy had been proclaimed in Washington when he was en route to China.

We hope the matter will not be left in this most unsatisfactory state. General Marshall gave the Senators the impression that he simply carried out instructions without having discussed those instructions beforehand—let alone having agreed to them. Let us look at the record. General Marshall departed from Washington within an hour or so after the President's announcement of China policy, December 15, 1945. He carried with him not only the documents, but also a personal letter from the President which epitomized the policy in these words:

"Specifically, I desire that you endeavor to persuade the Chinese Government to call a national conference of representatives of the major political elements to bring about the unification of China and, concurrently, to effect a cessation of hostilities, particularly in north China."

Elsewhere in the letter the President said: "I understand that these documents have been shown to you and received your approval." The President restated this policy the following year, on December 18, 1946. In the course of it, he said, "I asked General Marshall to go to China as my representative. We had agreed upon my statement of the United States Government's views and policies regarding China as his directive."

If all this does not mean what it says, then the President owes the public an explanation. He cannot but be embarrassed by General Marshall's incomplete statement—if not disavowal of the President's policy. What General Marshall said will be picked up, as it should be, by his Republican critics as proving that General Marshall was merely a tool—or, as Representative JUDD once put it, a "dupe." The facts are that the Marshall assignment was, in Mr. Byrnes' words when he was Secretary of State, to bring Chungking (the Nationalists) and Yenan (the Communists) together and that, on the President's showing, General Marshall had his eyes open and his mind receptive when he accepted it.

Deduction of Advertising and Propaganda Expense as a Legitimate Cost Before Taxation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed to Hon. George J. Schoeneman from Mr. Norman Thomas, on the subject of the deduction of advertising and propaganda expense as a legitimate cost before taxation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 18, 1950.

Hon. GEORGE J. SCHOENEMAN,
Commissioner, Internal Revenue Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SCHOENEMAN: For a considerable time, there have been advertisements and printed documents sponsored by various corporations which in no way directly advertise their products but carry on political and economic diatribes against something vaguely and usually incorrectly called socialism.

The Warner & Swasey Machine Tool Co. of Cleveland is one of the most diligent of these advertisers. I call your attention to its full-page advertisement in Newsweek of September 18, 1950. It is headed "Who Pays for the Profits of Capitalism?" and it concludes that our American success is all based on incentive-for-profit. The final sentence reads: "The difference—the permanent difference between dreary Russia or England, and prosperous America, is just that simple—but it is that important." A little picture and a Warner & Swasey label fill out the page.

I cite another example of a different but allied procedure. Swift & Co., June 1949, circulated a well-printed pamphlet, mostly I presume to its workers, entitled "This Is Our Problem—Your Freedom Program." It contains on page 7 the viciously incorrect statement that end objective of Socialists and Communists are the same and that both groups believe that the end justifies any means.

These illustrations of a widespread and continuing practice lead me formally to inquire whether corporations are allowed to deduct expenses of this sort of advertising and propaganda as a legitimate cost before taxation. That is, I want to know how much the public pays for this sort of propaganda at a time when the administration is seeking to close the loophole by which corporations and individuals escape taxation.

If your reply is that all this sort of stuff is a legitimate cost, let me ask a second question. Would it be legal for me to publish as an advertisement what I think about democratic socialism and deduct the cost of the advertisement before computing my income tax? I could connect the advertisement with my business, writing and lecturing, at least as well as the Warner & Swasey Co.—let us say by a little picture of myself making a speech.

If you can't answer these questions, to whom should I apply for information?

You will notice that I am not challenging in any way the right of free speech or free press, although I am considering calling the attention of the Federal Trade Commission and other bodies, official and unofficial, concerned for truth in advertising to the outrageous coupling of Russia and England at a time when England is our ally.

It must be remembered that what Warner & Swasey and Swift are really attacking is not the Socialist Party which is not represented in the Government, but the so-called welfare state which in England is fully accepted by the Conservative Party.

At this time, when unity at home and unity with our allies is important, and the Government needs every cent that it can raise from proper taxation, my questions are important. I hope for an early reply, to which I shall expect to give publicity, as well as to this request for information.

Sincerely yours,

NORMAN THOMAS.

Senator Jenner and Secretary Marshall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "BILL JENNER and Secretary Marshall," published in the Bedford (Ind.) Daily Times-Mail of September 19, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BILL JENNER AND SECRETARY MARSHALL

Senator BILL JENNER is getting a lot of heat from the proadministration forces for his attack last Friday on George Marshall, whom President Truman appointed Secretary of Defense. On the basis of consistency of performance, JENNER is absolutely right in his opposition to Marshall.

Almost immediately after VJ-day, Marshall was sent to China to study the chaotic conditions in that country. He was Ambassador, but he was actually much more than that. On his opinions stood the future of the entire Orient.

Chiang Kai-shek, leader of the Chinese Nationalist Government, which had been fighting Communists or Japanese ever since the end of the First World War, knew full well his government could continue to exist only with American support. Chiang had given the Allies the best support possible during the war. He certainly was not the leader of a united nation. China hasn't been a united nation since 1895 but Chiang did have the loyalty of millions of Chinese. Witness the flight of his government from Nanking to Chungking, witness the miracle of the Burma Road, built by manual labor to bring supplies over the highest mountains in the world. He had loyalty, he had support, and he had given his country as good a government as it has ever had. That doesn't mean it was good government in the American conception, but it was the most honest China had had in centuries.

China isn't a nation, it is a collection of nations. We once had dinner in a Cantonese restaurant (in this country) with a Shanghai Chinese. They could not understand each other's language any more than we could. It was just like trying to have a conversation with a Greek and a Norwegian, neither of whom understood the other. That little insignificant incident illustrates conditions in China, and upsets our idea that China is a unified nation like the United States.

War lords have existed in China for a half century, each one supreme in his own area. As American Ambassador, George Marshall apparently looked upon Mao-Tse-Tung, the Communist leader, as just another war lord. Marshall strongly urged Chiang to take Communists into his cabinet, to fraternize with the Reds, to build a strong China by appeasement. Chiang, who knew his country far better than Marshall, refused. Marshall got mad, came home, upbraided Chiang for failure to cooperate. The result was the quick collapse of the Nationalist Government, the flight to Formosa, and the occupation of all China by the Communists.

This is the big question today—If it was right to fraternize with the Communists in China, as Marshall wanted to do, why are we fighting in Korea today? Why don't we urge the South Koreans to "get together" with the North Koreans? Why are we sending arms and aid to the French in Indochina? Why shouldn't we urge the French to fraternize with the Reds? What are we doing in Berlin, Vienna? Why did we create the North Atlantic Pact? What good is ECA?

When JENNER accuses Marshall of bungling, JENNER is on the very soundest of ground. Marshall's opinion to "write-off" Chiang-Kai-shek opened the door to the Communists. From that minute to the invasion of South Korea the steps are logical, and the results should have been obvious. Marshall's decision in China was probably the biggest blunder of all the blunders of American diplomacy from 1944 to this very minute. JENNER is absolutely right in his opposition.

There is another aspect of the Marshall appointment upon which JENNER did not touch. Marshall is now 69 years old. He retired 2 years ago as Secretary of State on account of ill health. What has happened to give him all the renewed strength and vigor to permit his fulfillment of the biggest job in the Cabinet in a time of extreme crisis?

We saw at Yalta what happens when a sick and senile mind goes up against alert and resourceful minds. President Roosevelt did in truth sell out the Poles, Lithuanians, Latvians, Rumanians, Hungarians, and Czechoslovaks at that momentous conference, but Roosevelt was a sick man, a dying man, a tragic figure in comparison to his opponent Stalin.

We do not need any more old, senile men in high position. We need men alert, vigorous, healthy, in the prime of life. JENNER was too courteous to say this—but it is true just the same.

Story of Naming the Irish Wilderness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Record, I include an article from the Current Local, of Van Buren, Mo., of September 14, 1950, on the naming of the Irish Wilderness. The article follows:

STORY OF NAMING THE IRISH WILDERNESS

In last Sunday's Post-Dispatch a story of the Irish Wilderness was published, and the writer dwelt at length on how this thinly settled land got its name. He ended up by leaving his readers to make a choice of half a dozen ways it might have happened, according to legend, well spliced, perhaps, by his imagination (these feature writers are paid so much per word).

What, we believe, is the only true story of the several tales concerning the naming of this romantic tract, was written by the late Allen Hinchey and published in his newspaper, "The Community," of Cape Girardeau, in August 1924. Mr. Hinchey compiled a history of southeast Missouri which is still considered an authority, and habitually ascertained the facts before he jotted them down. Therefore, we believe his version of how this large tract of land came to be called "The Wilderness" is the true one. The story follows:

Out in the Ozarks in the Eleven Point Country there is a little post office called "Wilderness." It lies between Alton in Oregon County and Doniphan in Ripley. It might be interesting to the boys and girls of southeast Missouri to know something about this place and of the fine, happy, and industrious people who settled it.

About the year 1855 or 1856 the grading of the Iron Mountain Railroad from St. Louis to Pilot Knob was completed. The grading of the road had been done by Irish laborers so hundreds were out of employment in a strange country. Many had families with them and had been living in camps during all the time the work of building the road had been going on.

A young Catholic priest from St. Louis spent most of his time with those people, holding services for them on Sundays, giving aid to the sick and burying their dead. He felt sorry for them and got busy in their behalf.

He went to Washington to see the President and visited the United States Land Department in the city, in his efforts to secure homes for his people. At that time there were great stretches of Government land in Missouri and the young priest wanted to form a colony on some of this land.

He worked steadily until at last arrangements were made to permit those homeless people to homestead lands in the Ozarks where they could form a colony. The United States Land Office for Missouri was at that time in Jackson, which was a long way for them to travel to make application for their lands so the young priest opened a temporary branch land office at Potosi for their convenience.

He went to various camps and collected his people, taking them to Potosi. Some of them had teams that they had used at their railroad work. Some had cows, pigs, chickens, ducks, and geese. Most of them had small sums of money left from their wages as railroad laborers. They all had confidence in their young priest who was blessed with the optimism of their race.

After several weeks of legal delays and the unwinding of considerable official red tape, the heads of families and the unmarried men of the party had filed their applications for land and had paid their entry fees.

They had not seen the land to which they were going, but to them it seemed they were going to the "promised land." They were happy to think that in this great country they were to open up farms and build homes of their own.

It was a beautiful day in early summer when these people, several hundred of them, started on their journey for the new country across the mountains.

Into their canvas-covered wagons they loaded their household goods. In coops on the sides and at the rear of the wagons they placed their poultry. Then collecting their cattle and hogs, their sheep and goats into a herd the start was made.

In some cases a shortage of horses made it necessary to use oxen and cows to draw the wagons. The men and boys walked along the road bravely, as did the younger women. The older ones, those who were ill and the small children were given places in the wagons.

It was a journey that inflicted many days of hardship, but to them there was always held out the promise of happiness, peace, and prosperity at the journey's end.

After many days of toils and travels they reached their destination. It was certainly a wilderness, but they were undaunted and began at once the building of their colony. They were a religious people so the first building was a place to worship. Their young priest was with them and all during the wearisome journey he had cheered them on. Now that they had reached their goal he was not only their spiritual adviser but their business leader as well.

Under his direction log homes were built. Fences were built around enclosures for their livestock. Many wild animals infested the wilderness, so it was necessary for the young men to stand guard at night to protect their livestock from marauding beasts.

Gradually small fields were cleared and crops were planted and the wilderness began to look more like a settled country. But they were a long way from any town or trading point. The nearest market was at Doniphan, 20 miles away over almost impassable mountain trials. And Doniphan was only a small pioneer trading post, many miles from Cape Girardeau, its nearest supply point on the Mississippi.

But they were happy, those simple people, happy and industrious, in their wilderness. On the Sabbath they had religious services and the monotony of life in the woods was broken by merrymaking in the cabins. Into their life there came romances and there came sorrow. The young priest was called on to marry the young and to bury the dead. Faithfully he stood by them, cheerfully he encouraged them.

A few years later the sorrows of the Civil War between the North and the South found its way out into the wilderness and the little crops of those simple people were ruthlessly taken and their livestock driven away by scalawags who took advantage of the deplorable conditions of the time.

After their homes were robbed and their crops destroyed the colonists scattered and the country that had begun to smile under their industrious efforts once more became a wilderness.

This story was told to the editor of the Community a number of years ago by "Uncle Billy" Griffin, a respected citizen of Carter County, the last survivor of those colonists. To the writer it seemed a pathetic story and the pathos was all the greater when "Uncle Billy" said: "We came to America, fleeing from persecutions in Ireland. We came far out into the wilderness to make our homes. It was hard for us to understand why Americans, who had always stood for us as the greatest exponents of justice and chivalry, should have robbed us of our homes and our happiness."

United States Errors in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there have been serious military and political errors in Korea that have largely created the present crisis:

First. Wartime agreements that guaranteed the postwar independence of Korea. This is almost an impossible military commitment.

Yalta Conference complicated the commitment when we promised that Russia was to have strategic domination over Manchuria.

While committed to the independence of Korea we could not implement it without a vast effort way out of line to the strategic, economic, and military value of the country.

Second. Korean military policy. We created a South Korean Army, trained and equipped it for internal security only. It could not stop a real invasion. This policy was dictated by attempts to reconcile political commitments but without too great military involvement.

Third. Poor training and organization of South Korean forces. On June 25 the United States commander said it was the best fighting force in Asia. It folded up after the first attack against it. No doubt poor morale, Communist infiltration, bad leadership, unpopular political leaders, inefficient staff work and poor intelligence have produced military chaos.

Fourth. Underestimation of the enemy. An air of superiority was developed.

Fifth. Improper intelligence or a failure by responsible authority to evaluate it. United States staffs in Washington and Tokyo took no action to meet possible invasion threats and were taken by complete surprise.

Sixth. Underestimation of the role of armor in modern war. It was accepted theory that air and naval power alone could stop any threat of aggression. It is always the man on the ground who eventually dominates, occupies and controls objectives.

Seventh. Overestimation of the effectiveness of air power.

Eighth. Overconcentration of one kind of air power at the expense of others.

Ninth. Reduction of Marine ground units and the underestimation of amphibious assault.

Government Publicity and Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY J. LATHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a Hoover Commission task force report on Government publicity and propaganda.

As far as I know, this report has never been printed, because of the time limitation fixed by law on the activities of the Hoover Commission. The report follows:

GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY AND PROPAGANDA

Federal operations in publicity, public relations, and dissemination of Government intelligence cost the taxpayers approximately $105,000,000 a year.

Every agency of Government maintains its public relations staff. Every agency issues printed matter in great or small volume every year for public distribution. Printing costs on Government literature approach $50,000,000 a year, and mailing costs computed at regular postage rates add $40,000,000 a year. Staff salaries in publicity functions were tabulated by the Bureau of the Budget at $13,049,452 for the fiscal year 1948, but this figure does not include editorial and research expense in the preparation of Government intelligence. The Budget Bureau's itemization begins with the preparation of the press release, radio continuity or motion picture script. The research and testing behind the press release are not charged to the publicity function, but rather to the routine administrative expenses of the departments.

In many cases public relations work is concealed entirely from routine accounting review, principally by the device of carrying publicity operatives on the roll as supervisors, administrative assistants, or technical experts. For these reasons, in the present state of Federal budget and accounting procedures, a precise itemization of Government expenditures in this broad field is almost impossible.

WAR EXPANSION

In reporting the Independent Offices Appropriation bill for fiscal 1947, on January 23, 1946 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 92, No. 8) Representative RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH, of Massachusetts, presented in the House of Representatives a tabulation compiled by the Bureau of the Budget showing a total of 45,778 persons "now employed full or part time on publicity or propaganda work of every kind and description."

Salaries for these services by all agencies for the fiscal year 1946 were reported at $74,829,467.

An earlier report, covering the fiscal year 1940, was presented to the House Appropriations Committee by the Budget Bureau on June 25, 1941. It itemized total publicity salaries at roundly $28,000,000.

A comparable report for the fiscal year 1948, tabulated 2,232 full-time and 1,212 part-time Federal employees engaged in publicity and public-relations work. The combined annual salary rate for these 3,444 Government publicity employees for 1948 was $13,043,452.

But these figures do not include the entire cost of such operations. In each report, the Budget Bureau explained that all costs for research incident to the writing of a report were excluded from the tabulation.

METHODS OF DISTRIBUTION

In addition to the familiar Government bulletins, official reports, and bound annuals, the Federal publicity agencies employ every medium and channel of intelligence. The accounting categories include press service, radio, television, group contacts, paid advertising, traveling exhibits, motion pictures, lantern slides, traveling lecturers, photographic service, individual contacts and direct correspondence with editors and publishers). In addition, several agencies maintain separate sections to conduct programs of educational cooperation with schools, civic bodies, labor organizations, and similar groups.

The table below summarizes publicity and propaganda expenditures of the principal agencies for the fiscal year 1946 as reported by the Budget Bureau:

Department of State	$90,377,000
Treasury	11,104,800
Department of Agriculture	9,295,700
Office for Emergency Management	8,154,021
War Department	5,715,690
Office of War Information	3,772,095
Office of Price Administration	2,572,000
Federal Security Agency	2,043,988
Department of Commerce	2,003,212
Department of Labor	1,440,641
Navy Department	704,000
Veterans' Administration	660,571
Tennessee Valley Authority	245,000

In the totals above charged to the military Departments, the Budget Bureau explained that the figures do not include the pay and allowances of military personnel.

CHALLENGE TO REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

"In my opinion," said Congressman WIGGLESWORTH in presenting this tabulation to the House of Representatives, "the enormous governmental propaganda set-up is not only a gross waste of the people's money, but, over and beyond that, makes for the destruction of the proper exercise of the legislative functions of the Government."

He recalled title 5, section 54 of the United States Code, which provides, in broad terms, that no money appropriated by any act of Congress shall be used for the compensation of any publicity operative unless specifically appropriated for that purpose.

"Departure from the philosophy underlying that law, coupled with the surrender in large measure of control of the purse strings by the Congress," Congressman WIGGLESWORTH continued, "leads inevitably to the domination of Congress and the people by the executive branch of the Government. Government work, efficiently performed, needs no paid propaganda campaigns."

In conclusion, Congressman WIGGLESWORTH said: "If we as a Nation are to escape financial disaster, the Congress must resume control over expenditures; the propaganda army of 45,778, recognized by the Bureau of the Budget as a 'tool of executive management' must be disbanded."

HARNESS COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED

In May 1947, the House of Representatives established a special subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to inquire into the whole range of publicity and propaganda operations throughout the executive branch. Under the chairmanship of Representative Forest A. Harness of Indiana, this committee explored in detail the publicity operations of the entire Government.

"Everybody in Washington recognizes," said Congressman Harness, at the outset of the investigation, "that certain information services are an essential part of any institutional operation. But Congress insists that there is a clear line of distinction between the legitimate informational services and those additional operations which tend to build up pressure groups and mass public opinion in favor of more projects, broader programs or Federal intrusions into new spheres of paternal service. It is the latter operations which our committee seeks to itemize as to cost, scope, and influence. At least the people are entitled to know how much they are spending through their Government to educate themselves to more spending."

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

In the Department of Agriculture, investigators of the Harness committee found 525 persons engaged in public relations work. Their salaries ranged from $1,888 to $10,000 a year. Only 204 members of this information and publicity staff were located in Washington. The others were employed in permanent branch offices of the Department in Boston; San Francisco; Milwaukee; Raleigh; Dallas; Denver; Albuquerque; Philadelphia; Ogden; Chicago; Atlanta; Juneau, Alaska; San Juan, Puerto Rico; and in eight lesser cities throughout the States and Territories.

The budget for the Office of Information, Department of Agriculture, for the fiscal year 1948 was $2,307,000, an increase of $853,000 over the previous year.

In a period of 9 months ending April 1, 1947, Agriculture's Office of Information prepared 1,998 press releases, an average of about 11 every working day. During the same months it released 837 radio scripts. The radio time contributed free of charge for these Government programs was valued, at going commercial rates, at more than $500,000 a year. During the same 9 months the Department released 17 new motion-picture films, which were distributed directly through 78 film stations established throughout the United States.

The Department's mobile exhibits depicting Federal activities are presented each year at approximately 2,100 State and county fairs. In addition to preparing these exhibits and staffing them, the Department pays half the transportation charges.

The regular services of the Office of Information include a special weekly clipsheet to agricultural journals, another to general magazines, a weekly science letter, a special clipsheet to women's page editors, and a weekly clipsheet to editors of Negro periodicals.

Exclusive of mimeographing and multigraphing, processed in the Department, Agriculture's expenditure for printing and binding in the fiscal year 1947 were $2,260,784.

Among 41 new titles noted in the Department of Agriculture's catalog of farmers' bulletins for the fiscal year 1943 (a war year) were the following: No. 1849, Useful and Ornamental Gourds; No. 1851, Women's Dresses and Slips: a Buying Guide; and No. 1856, The Japanese Beetle and Its Control.

The publication of such titles during war time, in the face of acute shortages of paper, chemicals, and manpower raises a question touching the whole system of management in the executive agencies. If there is no system or routine for determining relative need in the area of Government publications in times of war or national emergency, the Nation obviously is confronted with a major problem in Federal reorganization.

POSTAL SERVICE BURDENED

In May 1942, the Post Office Department noted the increasing flood of press releases, booklets, and other material placed in the mails under the Government-franking privilege by the administrative agencies. The Department suggested that the rapidly increasing volume of Government mail was interfering with the handling of the normal business of the Department (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 20, 1942, p. A2018, Ludlow).

For the fiscal year 1941 free mail from the Federal agencies was reported at $41,500,000, the amount of postage which would have been collected at normal mailing rates.

MUCH GOVERNMENT MATERIAL NOT WANTED

Much of the material mailed by the departments and agencies to the newspaper and editorial offices is of little value. Illustrating this facet of the problem Representative Philip A. Bennett, of Missouri, told the House of Representatives on January 22, 1942:

"I frequently receive letters from publishers wanting to know if something cannot be done to lessen the vast amount of material sent them by these departments. They tell me they could not give space to one-thousandth part of the material they receive."

OFFICIAL HUMOR

During the war, the Office for Emergency Management expanded its activities to include numerous types of material calculated to support war morale. A considerable staff of Hollywood artists was employed to design posters and cartoons for free distribution. Illustrating this activity was one official release depicting a scene at the Washington zoo. A small boy, clinging desperately to his toy balloon, was being carried over the housetops, the anguished mother shouting hysterically "Catch him! Catch him! It's rubber."

Another exhibit in official humor presented a sprightly salesgirl in a perfume shop offering to a jaded patron a rare item: "You'll love it—it smells like gasoline."

These exhibits, fairly representative of Federal thought control as developed in the area of subsidized humor in wartime, were distributed in May 1942.

SMALL EQUIPMENT

The most recent survey of mechanical equipment operated by the Government photographic services is found in Senate Report No. 1554, Seventy-seventh Congress, second session, July 22, 1942. This survey covered all Federal agencies except the military services. The civilian publicity bureaus reported 8,813 cameras in use, plus 19,978 pieces of auxiliary photographic equipment and 53,717 pieces of photo-processing equipment. The total investment in these combined picture plants was estimated by the Senate committee at something more than $15,000,000.

"The study discloses that this equipment is utilized to a considerable extent in illustrating and fostering the agencies concerned," the report said.

The same committee took inventory of all mimeographs, small printing presses, addressographs and like equipment normally employed in the Federal information offices. Exclusive of the Government Printing Office and the military services, the Federal agencies owned 19,358 pieces of such equipment, of an estimated value of $7,750,000. These figures were not complete, however. The report explained that the Office for Emergency Management, which then employed some 22,000 people "advised the committee that the information requested was not available."

Excluding the nonreporting agencies and the military services, the Senate committee tabulated $22,750,000 worth of photographic and mimeographing plant, all of it employed for the most part in the distribution of official information by the Federal agencies.

MOTION-PICTURE FILMS

Motion-picture films have become an established vehicle of Government education and intelligence. During the war, all Government films were released through the Office of War Information, which was charged with the responsibility of keeping the films in line with the war aims of the administration. Special short subjects were released for bond drives, food conservation campaigns, to reduce absenteeism, and like subjects.

After the war, a new arrangement for distribution of Government films was established by agreement between the American Theaters Association, 1501 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y., and Mr. John R. Steelman, White House Executive Assistant. This new arrangement was announced on July 8, 1946. It was described at the time by S. H. Fabian, president of the American Theaters Association, as "an attempt to unite the industry in a continuation of cooperation extended to the Government in its wartime-information program."

This arrangement had the practical effect of placing all Government film distribution directly under the authority of the President and the White House staff.

It was estimated at that time that a general film release by the Government reached an audience of approximately 90,000,000 persons each week—a powerful instrument in the direction of managed opinion.

Federal agencies which use Government-produced films as a regular part of their operations include the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Standards, Veterans' Administration, Department of National Defense, Public Health Service, Labor Department, State Department, Federal Housing Administration, and the Bureau of Mines. Many other agencies release films occasionally to stimulate special programs, or to launch new ventures in Federal-State cooperation.

BUREAU OF MINES FILMS

The film library of the Bureau of Mines presents a typical pattern of Federal operations in this field. During the fiscal year 1947, this Bureau reported an increase of 20 percent in its film exhibitions as compared with the previous year. More new films were added to the library in 1947 than in any of the previous 6 years. Total screenings for the year were 111,168. The combined audience was 8,100,000. At the end of the year, the Bureau had 5,646 films on its distribution list, an increase of 1,064 copies during the year. Total footage available in this library at the end of the fiscal year 1947 was 4,820,607.

The Bureau of Mines film library is distinctive, however, in one important respect. Its films are devoted chiefly to technical, scientific, safety and first-aid topics. All films are produced under the supervision of the Bureau, but with funds provided largely by the mining industry. This program has been in operation since 1916. The mining industry, over these 32 years, has spent more than $2,500,000 for the production of these films and has provided, without cost to the Bureau of Mines, many thousands of prints for free distribution. Each exhibitor is required to pay round-trip transportation costs and to guarantee the safe return of the film to the library. The cost to the Government is relatively insignificant.

EDUCATION BY GOVERNMENT

The question arises, however, whether such long-term educational programs properly may be regarded as a legitimate function of the Federal establishment. Such work could be carried on with equal effectiveness by any established mining school, safety council, or educational foundation. Closely linked with educational and research institutions, the film library of the Bureau of Mines likely would reflect more readily the latest advances in science and technology. Removal of this work from the Federal establishment would lessen the danger, always present, of subtle propaganda influences supporting official policy.

However efficient and effective a program of Government education may be, the fact remains that mass education is not a constitutional function of the Federal Government. All programs of education by the Government tend eventually to reflect official thought, official opinion, and official aims. In these circumstances, the function of education inevitably is diluted by the pressures of politics and propaganda. The best safeguard possible for the whole process of education is to keep it in the hands of the people themselves, through their own cooperative organizations, and to remove it as far as possible from direction, guidance, and influence by the administrative officials of the Government. All the history of national thought-control agencies in other lands supports this conclusion.

PAMPHLETS

Your task force examined all the publications released by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture, during the month of February 1948. This study did not cover the entire department, but merely one bureau, that dealing with crop prospects, price movements, and production costs.

This February list contains 39 new titles for the month on the periodical list and 26 new titles on the list of maps and charts.

This tremendous volume of production far exceeds the practical needs of the agricultural community. By an orderly process of selection over a period of perhaps 5 years, this volume of work probably could be reduced by half. Virtually all the material thus assembled by the Government represents merely after-the-fact compilation of daily market decisions. Much of the statistical material presented in the periodical surveys for different commodities is merely reference tables reproduced from month to month. Save for the current month and the current year, all these figures are available in the standard reference works, such as the Statistical Abstract of the United States. This continuous reproduction, month after month, in mimeographed form reflects, for the most part, merely the instinctive bureaucratic urge to make work.

Examined alone, each of these items may be justified. But when the production of an entire month or an entire season is put together, the amount of duplication, overlap, and repetition is almost beyond measure.

PRINTING APPROPRIATION SHOULD BE CUT

The only practical approach to this problem of excessive Government literature is through the Appropriations Committees of Congress. Congress has unquestioned power to limit effectively the volume of printing and mimeographing produced for or by any agency. A persistent policy of 10 percent reductions would compel the departments and agencies to reappraise such programs each year on the basis of practical need. No essential function of Government would be impaired by such a policy. If all the printed matter emanating from Federal establishments were reduced by 50 percent over a period of 5 years—assuming a sound basis of selectivity in that period—no segment of the population would be deprived of any vital or beneficial Government service.

WARTIME CURTAILMENTS

The extent of possible curtailment in Government publications in the period of stress is disclosed by a report from the Office of War Information, in September 1942. At that time, OWI Regulation No. 3 decreed the suspension of 239 Federal periodical publications and limited the mailing of 284 additional publications. This list of 523 Federal periodicals—daily, weekly, monthly, quarterly, and annually—was the first such official list compiled since 1932. The wartime suspension of 229 publications was dictated by the paper shortage.

But since the war many of these items have been resumed, and practically all of the mailing lists have been expanded.

Approximately half of the publications discontinued by the OWI order were productions of the Department of Agriculture. Another 25 percent were productions of the Department of Commerce. Other suspensions and curtailments of importance from the standpoint of paper consumption were in the Census Bureau, Federal Trade Commission, Interior Department, Labor Department, Maritime Commission, and Treasury Department.

The significance of the OWI survey and action is this: When compelling reasons for economy in paper and printing presented themselves in wartime, a way was found quickly to reduce by more than 50 percent the volume of Government printed matter distributed to the people.

Parenthetically, it should be noted that the paper was not saved, but merely diverted in the Government Printing Office to other Government orders of a strictly wartime character, such as ration books, military manuals, procurement specifications and selective service forms. Without the curtailment of Government publications, however, the wartime needs of the Government Printing Office in paper, ink, and labor could not have been supplied.

FEDERAL PRESSURE GROUPS

Congress has been alert for several years to the organized pressure-group activities which are sponsored, supported and stimulated by the administrative agencies themselves. Fairly representative of the majority attitude toward such activities is the statement of Representative Homer A. Ramey, of Ohio, who told the House of Representatives on May 26, 1948:

"The greatest pressure that we have is from groups in Government, the agencies themselves, telling thousands of people in your district to write you to pass this and that—to spend—to surrender individual liberty to Government control, thus again to spend more money, more money and more money" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6653).

After 15 months' work, Congressman Harness summarized his conclusions on Government pressure groups in these words:

"Everyone in Congress is keenly conscious of the tremendous power of this Government propaganda machine, for he comes in direct personal contact with it every day. He lives with the lobbies, good and bad, which constantly seek to influence the course of legislation, and he can hardly fail to know that the most powerful, most persistent of them all is the Federal lobby. It works around the clock every day of the year.

"Whether the immediate purpose of Government propaganda is good or bad, the fact remains that individual liberty and free institutions cannot long survive when the vast power of Government may be marshaled against the people to perpetuate a given policy or a particular group of office holders. Nor can freedom survive if all Government policies and programs are sustained by an overwhelming Government propaganda.

THE LAW AGAINST FEDERAL PROPAGANDA

As the Harness committee pointed out repeatedly, the diversion of appropriations to propaganda and pressure-group activities is a direct violation of the Federal Criminal Code. The committee reports cite repeatedly section 201, title 18, of the United States Code, enacted July 11, 1919 (41 Stat. 68), as follows:

"No part of the money appropriated by any act shall, in the absence of express authorization by Congress, be used directly or indirectly to pay for any personal service, advertisement, telegram, telephone, letter, printed or written matter, or other device, intended or designed to influence in any manner a Member of Congress, to favor or oppose, by vote or otherwise, any legislation or appropriation by Congress, whether before or after the introduction of any bill or resolution proposing such legislation or appropriation; but this shall not prevent officers and employees of the United States from communicating to Members of Congress on the request of any Member or to Congress, through the proper official channels, requests for legislation or appropriations which they deem necessary for the efficient conduct of the public business.

"Any officer or employee of the United States who, after notice and hearing by the superior officer vested with the power of removing him, is found to have violated or attempted to violate this section, shall be removed by such superior officer from office or employment. Any officer or employee of the United States who violates or attempts to violate this section shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both."

INFORMATIONAL SPHERE DEFINED

The Harness Committee drew a clear distinction between the legitimate publicity and information functions of the Federal agencies and those activities which washed over into the area of conditioning public opinion by propaganda techniques.

"It is a duty of representative government to keep the people fully and accurately informed," Representative Harness informed the House. "Administrative officials at policy-making levels are, and should be, entirely free to express their views and discuss policy on any issue. But beyond the routine of releasing such expressions to the regular news channels, no agency properly may go. The information services of the administrative agencies may not lawfully use public funds to promote new projects, to influence legislation, or to mold public opinion for or against any legislative proposal. Federal officials and employees may not lawfully devote their time and talents, paid for from public funds, to mold public opinion. The sole legal functions of a Federal information service is to issue factual, objective, and studiously unbiased information. Unfortunately, however, the law is being violated repeatedly by numerous administrative agencies. In hundreds of ways, some devious, some blatant, Federal officials and employees are ignoring or flouting section 201 of title 18 of the Criminal Code, often for the deliberate purpose of fostering sentiment and support for administration policies and programs.

"The issue is far broader than the merits of any particular piece of legislation. The record reveals clearly the manner in which Government lobbyists operate on the Federal payroll, how they are always at work to expand their fields of interest, to perpetuate themselves in office, and to impose their ideas and systems upon the American people by organized propaganda, paid for entirely by the diversion of public funds from their true purposes to the secret purposes of the top bureaucrats and planners.

"This is the fundamental issue from the legislative standpoint—whether Congress has lost its power to establish and maintain the sort of government the people want; or whether the bureaucrats are supreme and can give the sort of government they want, regardless of Congress, regardless of elections, regardless of public opinion. That's a question that goes to the very roots of popular government. If the bureaucrats are above Congress, and may defy Congress in the way they spend their appropriations, then representative government has become a fiction."

THE FEDERAL CAMPAIGN FOR SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

The Harness committee devoted several months, July-October 1947, to an examination of the Social Security Board and the United States Public Health Service. A special report (H. Rept. 786, 80th Cong., 1st sess.) charged "that at least six agencies in the executive branch are using Government funds in an improper manner for propaganda activities supporting compulsory national health insurance." The agencies named as participants in this activity were the United States Public Health Service, the Children's Bureau, the Office of Education, the United States Employment Service, the Department of Agriculture, and the Bureau of Research and Statistics, Social Security Board.

These agencies cooperated in the conduct of a series of "health workshops" arranged throughout the country during 1945 and 1946. The purpose of the health workshops was, the committee said, "to mobilize pressure groups" in behalf of socialized medicine.

"The first meeting in furtherance of these health workshops was held in Washington on November 2, 1945. At that meeting only 10 persons were present, all of them full-time employees of the Federal Government."

This report quoted a letter under date of December 10, 1945, signed by Thomas Parran, M. D., Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service. The letter was addressed to all field and staff men throughout the country. It referred to a special message sent to Congress on November 19, 1945, by President Truman, urging enactment of a national health program. Dr. Parran's letter to the staff alluded to the President's message to Congress as "a subject of the highest importance to every citizen."

His letter continued (transcript, May 28, 1947, p. 88): "The appropriate executive agencies of the Government have been specifically instructed by the President to assist in carrying out this legislative program as presented to Congress. * * * Every officer of the Public Health Service will wish to familiarize himself with the President's message and will be guided by its provisions when making any public statement likely to be interpreted as representing the official views of the Public Health Service."

This letter was challenged immediately by some members of the public health staff as an attempt to mobilize the entire agency aggressively behind the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, then pending before the Senate Labor Committee.

Less than 2 months after the date of this public health staff circular, the first health workshop was held in St. Paul, Minn., February 6 to 10, 1946. Of the 80 persons participating, 15 were employees of the Federal Government, representing seven different agencies having an interest in health and welfare programs. A second, and larger health workshop was held in Jamestown, N. Dak., September 27 to 30, 1946, with 98 persons participating, 18 of whom were Federal employees representing seven Government agencies. The chairman of this meeting was Mayhew Derryberry, Ph. D., of the United States Public Health Service.

The report of the Harness committee states: "Apart from the Federal personnel, there were no doctors of medicine in attendance at this meeting as delegates. The testimony before your committee indicates that no registered doctor of medicine was invited to participate. * * * It is evident from the record that most of the planning was done by the Federal officials in Washington prior to each workshop conference, and that each meeting was devoted to their own purposes, that of organizing pressure groups to agitate for compulsory health insurance, as then pending in Congress."

A report from the General Accounting Office to the Harness committee, disclosed that various Federal agencies approved vouchers to a total of $1,950 for travel expenses of Government employees to and from the Jamestown health workshop. This report revealed that the Jamestown conference took 18 Federal officials away from their desks for a total of 196 man-days. Similar expense accounts were itemized for four other health workshops arranged throughout the country.

The Harness committee later obtained from the Federal Security Agency a complete copy of the instruction sheets distributed by the training officers at the health workshops. Among the topics listed in the program were these:

(a) Techniques for the Organization of Citizen Groups;

(b) Formation of Pressure Groups;

(c) Methods of Bringing About Group Action.

One paragraph of the action program finally approved by the Jamestown conference urged that congressional candidates and incumbents be polled by the committee on their stand on the national health program, and that their opinions be sent to the State organizations for publication.

In summarizing the health workshop technique, as presented in the public hearings before the Harness committee, the committee report said:

"In the opinion of your committee, this recital presents the complete picture of Government propaganda in action. The Federal employees arrange the meeting, invite the delegates, train the delegates, preside at the meetings, and then frame the formal summary of resolutions and actions. And all of this is paid for with public moneys never authorized or approved by Congress for these or any like purposes."

PUBLIC PRESSURE FOR MORE SPENDING

Field investigators for the Harness committee were sent to Nebraska in May 1947 to trace out the propaganda method employed by the Department of Agriculture, through the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, to generate pressure on Congress to increase appropriations for the fiscal year 1948.

When the 1948 appropriation bill was in the House, certain reductions were made in the soil-conservation program. On the day the appropriation bill was voted in the House, a telegram was sent from the Department in Washington to all State administrators of the AAA, summarizing the reductions approved. Following receipt of this telegram, the State administrator in Nebraska summoned his eight regional assistants to a meeting at Lincoln. At that meeting a letter was drafted to be sent to the county agents to every farmer in the State. The letters, as finally mailed by the county headquarters, were not identical. But each did contain certain sentences or phrases based on the master telegram sent to the State agents of the AAA from Washington. Investigators for the committee brought back to Washington copies of these letters as mailed out in 25 different counties of Nebraska.

The obvious purpose of this campaign was to stampede the Senate to restore some of the economies voted by the House. It was an organized attempt by the Department of Agriculture, on a Nation-wide scale, by the use of public funds, to influence the course of legislation before Congress. In this instance the campaign was largely successful. Most of the House cuts were restored by the Senate.

The potentialities of such a campaign, looking to a telegraphic drive on Congress for more funds, can best be realized by considering the size and scope of the Department of Agriculture's official network throughout the country. There are 3,029 county agricultural associations in the United States, each with its county offices or headquarters. There are 9,087 county committeemen assisting the county agents. Under these county committeemen are 97,529 community committeemen, employed on a per diem basis. In addition, there are 8,378 paid office personnel serving the county agents and the county committeemen. The direct Federal payroll for personnel hire in these categories for 1947 was $19,536,824. An additional item of $23,760,650 was allocated for travel expenses of these people.

All these local information channels are brought together in each State under the State administrator of the AAA, a full-time officer with headquarters and staff, usually located in the capital city.

As a rule, a regional administrator, also a full-time employee, with office and secretarial staff, is set up for each 10 or 15 counties.

This organization can be converted overnight into a complete network of propaganda and pressure-group activities, which may be set off by the simple device of a single telegram or letter mailed to each of the 48 State administrators from Washington. By calling this organization into action, it has been possible to lay down on Congress as many as 250,000 communications in a single week, all addressed to an identical point of legislation then pending.

The ultimate significance of such an organization is that the pressure is generated, in the first instance, by the framing of a telegram or a letter in the Department in Washington.

In bringing these matters to the attention of Congress the Harness committee concluded:

"The responsibility for correction of this improper and illegal use of Government funds in the Production and Marketing Administration lies directly with the Department of Agriculture. Although our committee first called these violations to the attention of the Department in June 1947, our best information indicates that no disciplinary action of any kind has been taken against the officials involved, and that no real steps have been taken to guard against a recurrence of such abuses in the future."

IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION PRESSURE GROUPS

A similar network of organized pressure group activities is maintained by the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, to resist all attempts to reduce appropriations for irrigation and reclamation works.

It is inherent in the nature of irrigation and reclamation works that people in the immediate locality are anxious to have each project completed as quickly as possible. But there obviously must be an over-all limit on this type of spending each year. When the Appropriations Committees of Congress undertake to keep all projects moving along on an even keel, within the over-all limit of spending, terrific pressures instantly develop in practically all the local projects. Through subtle propaganda devices emanating chiefly from the Bureau of Reclamation in Washington, each locality is given the impression that its work is being retarded for the advantage of some distant community. By this method the Bureau of Reclamation systematically generates new pressures on Congress for more spending each year.

Hearings before the Harness committee in May and June 1948, established clearly that many persons carried on the rolls of the Bureau of Reclamation as inspectors and supervisors were in fact nothing more than paid pressure-group agents. They traveled from community to community to incite local civic bodies against Congress. They were interviewed in the press, made radio speeches, addressed chamber of commerce luncheons, wrote articles for magazines and newspapers. Such activities are a regular part of the Bureau of Reclamation payroll on every major project. The net result is a well-nigh irresistible pressure upon Congress for ever larger appropriations for this type of work.

In some cases Congress allocated more money to a given project than could be spent in the fiscal year. Carry-over funds ranging up to $20,000,000 at the end of a fiscal year have been discovered by the House and Senate Appropriations Committees. Yet the pressure for more funds continues from month to month, most of it generated by the Bureau itself.

The propagandists and pressure group leaders employed by the Bureau of Reclamation could never be identified as such by an audit of the payroll. On the rolls they are identified as actual on-the-site inspectors or supervisors of the construction program.

This type of diversion of public funds can be halted only by an arbitrary reduction in the appropriations—a reduction which will compel the Bureau to allocate its funds faithfully to the construction work intended by Congress. Only by such methods may Congress hope to stop the seepage which now fuels the overwhelming propaganda machine of the Bureau of Reclamation.

On May 14, 1948, Chairman Harness, of the House Committee on Publicity and Propaganda, transmitted to the House Appropriations Committee a summary of his findings and conclusions regarding the Bureau of Reclamation In illustrating the concealment of funds as an aid to generating propaganda in the field for more funds, Chairman Harness said:

"Perhaps the most serious charge now on record with our committee was the Bureau's repeated statement to the Appropriation Committees of the Congress that its carry-over funds from the fiscal year 1947 would be $44,000,000. Within 60 days after the close of the fiscal year, the carry-over fund was found to be approximately $88,000,000, and is so reported in the President's budget message for 1949 at page 445. * * *

"Whether the Bureau had some willful purpose in misrepresenting the carry-over figure, or whether this was the result of gross negligence, is really immaterial. The gravity of the error is such that those responsible for it should no longer be trusted by the Congress."

The Harness committee also reported in its communication to the House Appropriations Committee that in the Central Valley project in California the hearings indicated a clear design by the Bureau of Reclamation to exhaust all its funds allocated for the Central Valley within the first 6 months of the fiscal year.

By spending the entire year's allocation in 6 months, the Bureau of Reclamation was able to bring about a virtual stoppage of work on the entire Central Valley development. This suspension of work naturally spread great confusion and alarm throughout the territory. When this alarm reached the offices of the Bureau of Reclamation in the form of excited inquiries as to the reasons for the suspension, the answer was given uniformly that Congress had failed to provide adequate funds for the work.

Disclosure of this type of propaganda activity throughout the Central Valley in California led to a demand for the removal of Michael W Straus, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation. In the debates on this suggestion, Congressman Harness at one point demanded the impeachment of Commissioner Straus. Because these matters did not develop in the record until the last month of the session, in May and June 1948, no conclusive action was taken on them.

GOVERNMENT PROPAGANDA FOR UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

The Harness committee also issued two reports tracing out the systematic propaganda campaign conducted by the Department of the Army to generate Nation-wide group pressure for enactment of universal military training The first report, No. 1073, Eightieth Congress, first session, was dated July 24, 1947. The second, No. 1510, Eightieth Congress, second session, was dated March 4, 1948.

Civilian speakers employed by the War Department conducted their campaign for universal military training through every known avenue of intelligence. Usually these speakers were employed at $25 per diem plus traveling expenses They conducted radio panels in various cities and appeared before citizens' groups wherever and whenever they could be assembled. The radio panels always were top-heavy with persons selected to speak in favor of universal military training. Material supporting the proposal was prepared in the War Department for distribution to participants in the radio discussions. Frequently the radio discussion ended with an appeal to write to the radio station, which undertook to forward the letters to the proper congressional authorities. One of these discussion leaders was shown to have made speeches or radio addresses in 17 States. When crowded itineraries compelled it, the speakers were carried from point to point in military planes Yet at no point had Congress authorized such activities, or any diversion of the military budget to such propaganda.

The Harness committee concluded its first report in these words (p. 7):

"It has become apparent to our committee that Government propaganda is designed, in most instances, to make the individual believe he is thinking for himself In reality, Government propaganda distorts facts with such authority that the person becomes prejudiced or biased in the direction which the Government propagandists wish to lead the national thinking It is the high authority and the supposed objectivity of Government which leads people to accept without question the words released by Government officials and agencies Propaganda in its crudest form appeals to emotion only. Government propaganda is frequently only slanted, but accomplishes the same result. An individual may be wary and critical of material coming from a special-interest group He knows such groups have an ax to grind. But he will consider it gospel truth if the Government says the identical thing, because he regards the Government officials as impartial.

"Your committee therefore reports its firm conclusion that, on the basis of the evidence at hand, the War Department, its personnel and civilian employees, have gone far beyond the limits of their proper duty of providing factual information to the people and the Congress, and have engaged in propaganda supported by taxpayers' money, to influence legislation now pending before the Congress."

Another segment of the War Department propaganda for UMT was the production of a special motion picture film for free distribution. This film cost $36,000 to produce, and an additional $14,000 was spent to distribute it throughout the country.

In addition, the Army distributed some 125,000 printed pamphlets supporting universal military training. During 1947 the Army likewise distributed 123 press releases relating to universal military training. About 1,500 copies of each press release were distributed.

Immediately after the publication of the first Harness report in July 1947, the War Department propaganda activities in behalf of UMT were reorganized and shaken down considerably. As a result, the second report, on March 4, 1948, observed:

"The committee feels that while there have been some continued violations, the evidence indicates they have diminished considerably since our report of July 24, 1947."

FEDERAL PROPAGANDA FOR PUBLIC HOUSING

The several housing agencies of the Federal Government also carry on systematic propaganda for the enlargement of Federal appropriations and subsidies for housing. The Harness Committee explored these activities in detail in the Los Angeles-San Diego area in California. The Committee reported systematic political activity through the rental offices to encourage election of State and Federal officers pledged to expand the public housing program.

All tenants of Government housing projects are required to pay their rent by the fifth day of the month. In November 1946 this payment period fell in the last week of the general Congressional campaign. Throughout the Los Angeles-San Diego area many of the Federal rental offices were placarded with posters captioned "Save your home." In at least two instances Federal employees in the San Diego housing project were solicited for political contributions, to assist the campaign of State representatives and senators pledged to large government subsidies in the field of housing.

Said the Harness committee report on the Los Angeles-San Diego projects, in June 1948: "Much of the publicity and propaganda favoring public housing emanates from an organization known as the National Association of Housing Officials and the National Public Housing Conference. These organizations have been very active throughout the country. Most of the officials and employees of the Public Housing Authority are also members of one of these associations. Both have been used for propaganda purposes in support of the Wagner Housing bill, which failed of passage in the Eightieth Congress. Federal employees are in close contact with both these associations, and assist in the formulation of operating policies. Both associations have been used to promote State and Federal legislation favorable to public housing."

Representative RALPH W. GWINN, of New York, as a witness before the Harness committee, enumerated 836 local housing authorities for cities, counties, and communities throughout the country. He presented for the record an outline of the propaganda methods employed on a national scale by the various housing authorities, all of which are subsidized in some degree by Federal funds (hearings, p. 54).

Representative GWINN summarized the political implications of this vast propaganda network in these words (H. Rept. 2351; 80th Cong., 2d sess.; June 15, 1948, p. 8):

"The party that builds the public housing selects the tenants. * * * So we have allocation of space in many of these cities on the NKVD American plan. Although our public housing is very new in some parts of the country, the vote runs as high as 92 percent for the party that built the houses. In New York, Detroit, and Cincinnati where we checked we found that true."

The Harness report on this facet of bureaucratic pressure-group activities sustained by Federal appropriations concluded on this note:

"All the evidence before the committee supports the conclusion that the Federal Public Housing Authority in the Los Angeles-San Diego area is systematically organized throughout for political purposes and for propaganda activities in behalf of a vigorous national policy for public-housing appropriations. This political organization extends not only to the administrative officials and civil-service employees of the PHA but also to the tenants, who are granted political favors and privileges in return for their votes and organizational work in the precincts.

"The investigation also demonstrates that this propaganda activity and political work in public-housing projects lowers materially the standards of management and administration all along the line. Administrative costs and management charges on public-housing projects generally run about 25 percent higher than on comparable projects managed by private enterprise. Waste, loose spending, collusion on contracts, and collusion and favoritism on rental privileges are commonplace incidents of public-housing operations.

"We present this detailed picture of one large operation for the attention of Congress, with the recommendation that the appropriate committees in the future give thought to legislation designed to curb effectively the propaganda and political activities carried on within the Federal housing agencies.

"Several million veterans' families are the first victims of this distortion of the housing program. When housing officials divert their energies and funds to propaganda activities and political organization, they not only deprive the veterans of the homes Congress intended to provide for them but they also bid up the price of all housing, so that the average veteran finds costs beyond his means when he attempts to build privately.

"This vicious circle must be broken if veterans are to have adequate housing. The beginning must be made by rooting out the propaganda activities and political work of the Federal employees in the housing agencies."

FEDERAL PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS

Below are some of the principal journals listed in the Government Printing Office's official catalogue of Federal periodical publications. The catalogue lists 118 titles published regularly in magazine or bound form, some daily or weekly, but for the most part on a regular monthly basis. Virtually every department of the Federal establishment has its periodical house organ. The Department of Agriculture publishes 12 such periodicals, the titles below fairly suggest the range of this publicity activity: Civil Aeronautics Journal, Department of State Bulletin, Federal Home Loan Bank Review, Foreign Agriculture, Foreign Commerce Weekly, Foreign Service Journal, Internal Revenue Bulletin, Land Policy Review, Monthly Labor Review, Journal of the National Cancer Institute, Naval Medical Bulletin, News for Farm Cooperatives, Consumers' Guide (Department of Agriculture), Postal Bulletin, Public Housing, Public Roads, Reclamation Era, Rural Electrification News, Social Security Bulletin, Soil Conservation, Survey of Current Business, Federal Reserve Bulletin.

Certain periodical publications serve important functions of the Federal Government. Perhaps the best examples of the indispensable titles are the Index of Copyright Entries, the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, the daily weather maps, and the weekly health surveys published by the United States Public Health Service.

The Federal Register, which publishes daily the official texts of all departmental regulations and orders, likewise is an indispensable Federal function. Decisions of the courts, the administrative agencies and the quasi-judicial agencies, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Labor Board, also are essential functions in the field of Federal periodicals. Beyond these, however, the whole field of Federal periodicals merits close study by the appropriations committees of the Congress.

The Federal Government today spends approximately $50,000,000 a year in printing, including forms and tax returns. It spends another $40,000,000 a year for distribution of its printed matter, principally through the mails. Another $15,000,000 is spent annually for direct salaries of public relations officers and staff in the departments and agencies. These items currently aggregate $105,000,000 a year, yet do not include the basic editorial expense in the departments and agencies for the preparation of this tremendous volume of printed matter.

Samuel B. Pettingill, a former Member of the House of Representatives from Indiana, observes: "You can get a Government bulletin on every subject, except on how to reduce the cost of Government.

Congress cannot take time to study and appraise every Government publication each year. It may, however, specify precisely the amount which each department or agency will be authorized to spend for printing, for distribution, for editorial expenses, for research, and for publicity and public relations activities. An arbitrary reduction of 25 percent in these items for each department and agency over the next 2 years would be a practical approach to this aspect of runaway Federal spending.

Such a limitation on Federal publication functions need not impair any essential function of the Federal establishment, if remaining funds were allocated soundly on the basis of relative public value, and the national ability to pay for such services with available public revenues.

A SELLING PROGRAM FOR GOVERNMENT RESEARCH MATERIAL

Much of the material published and distributed by the Federal establishment would pay its own way in book form outside the Federal Government, if sold for a price to all willing to pay for it. The thousands of tons of Government printed matter accepted by the people every year merely because it is free, is beyond measurement.

Congress should give consideration, perhaps, to a law which would facilitate the sale of essential Government publications at a price in line with production costs, including editorial expense. The policy now is to sell Government publications at nominal prices—prices which often do not cover actual printing and mailing expenses.

The advisability of collecting full postage on all Government publications likewise is worthy of attention. If a publication is worth anything to the citizen, it should be worth the actual production and distribution costs. Such an amendment would make important headway against the postal deficit.

The ultimate test of the value of any Government publication to the citizen is to put a price on it. If every Federal publication and periodical were priced to cover all costs, including editorial, mechanical, and distribution, the problem of Government printing soon would be brought under control.

In the meantime, and pending a systematic program of appropriation cuts by Congress in the field of publicity and public relations activities, it is urged that a standing committee of recognized publicists be recruited by the President, on a voluntary basis, to conduct a running audit and constant appraisal of all Government publications and releases.

Our own estimate is that, over a period of 3 to 5 years, Federal expenditures in this field, which have been increasing steadily since 1933, could be reduced by at least $75,000,000 a year, on a permanent basis, without the slightest impairment of any essential Federal function. Over a period of 10 years such a program would lighten the tax burden by $750,000,000. This is our measure of extravagance and duplication in Federal publicity and propaganda today.

For the World's Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "For the World's Children," from the New York Times of September 20, 1950. This editorial brings to our attention the splendid work of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR THE WORLD'S CHILDREN

One of the most useful and successful activities of the United Nations has been the Children's Fund, known throughout the world as UNICEF. Throughout the difficult postwar struggle to keep the peace the Children's Fund for nearly 4 years now has been busy saving lives, perhaps five or six millions of them. It has spent close to $150,000,000, and it is to the great credit of the United States that the major part of the funds have been supplied by this country without thought of political or economic return. At the present moment emergency feeding programs in such areas as Greece and Yugoslavia, India and the Near East are being conducted by UNICEF, and $500,000 was set aside only a few weeks ago for work in Korea.

But the emphasis has been gradually shifting to longer-range projects primarily in Asia and in Central America. As the critical postwar food shortages in Europe have been ameliorated attention has been turning toward helping governments in the less-developed areas of the world to eliminate disease directly and, perhaps even more important, to train personnel in public health and related matters as they affect mothers and children. In fact, the United States is one of the principal backers of a resolution, to be brought up at this session of the General Assembly, which would formally establish the Children's Fund as a permanent agency of the UN instead of as the emergency body that it is at present.

All of this is by way of saying that it is almost incomprehensible that in approving a $17,000,000,000 supplemental appropriation bill a conference committee of the two Houses of Congress should have completely eliminated the American contribution of $12,500,000 to the Children's Fund for the year 1950–51. If this move was supposed to represent economizing, we can only say that it is economizing of the most misguided sort. Failure to provide these funds will not only seriously cripple UNICEF by making it almost impossible to plan for the coming year but inevitably also will have a depressing effect on contributions from other countries which have always looked to the United States for leadership in this cause.

Presentation of Medal and Citation to Abe S. Berliner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I had the pleasure of being present at the time that Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt presented a medal and citation to Mr. Abe S. Berliner, of Glen Rock, N. J.

Mr. Berliner, a resident of the Seventh Congressional District of New Jersey, has been outstanding for years in his devotion to antinarcotic work. The medal and citation were given by the American Narcotic Defense Association and the New Jersey Narcotic Defense League. I am inserting an article from the Community Press dated June 29, 1950, concerning the valuable service contributed by Mr. Berliner. The article follows:

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT TO HONOR BERLINER FOR ANTINARCOTICS WORK

(By Elizabeth Hilary)

When Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt return from her trip abroad in a few weeks, one of her first engagements will be a date with Abe S. Berliner, of Glen Rock. Mrs. Roosevelt will take over a happy duty, that of conferring on Berliner a medal and citation given by the United States Government in recognition of his 25 years of volunteer service in antinarcotic work.

When the World Conference on Narcotic Education was formed by Admiral Richmond P. Hobson a quarter of a century ago, Berliner was invited to handle publicity for the new group Berliner had come to Hobson's attention through his brother, Louis, national track and field star, and member of the 1924 Olympic team.

In 1928, he was invited to the World Narcotic Conference in London, one off-shoot of which was the establishment of the American Narcotic Defense Association, for which Berliner assumed the role of eastern area public relations director. At that time there were no uniform State laws on narcotics, and drug peddling was strictly in the area of Federal court jurisdiction. It was this legal inadequacy which the American Association sought to correct.

Today, each of the 48 States has well-formulated anti-narcotics laws, and offenses occurring within State borders are tried in local courts which have power to condemn, fine, and imprison. Only the interstate, Federal or world "dope" rings are left for Federal handling. Thus, the check on dope peddling within the States is much more far-reaching than it was a quarter of a century ago and credit for the constructive move must go to the American Narcotic Defense Association.

Besides its legislation work, this American group carries on an extensive program designed to stop drug addiction before it starts. Its channels are the usual educative means of pamphlets, pictures, and lectures. Abe Berliner, during his 25 years of activity, has talked before many universities, schools, police associations, and local groups across the Nation, and he is known as a forceful speaker regarding antinarcotic legislation before State legislatures.

But, Berliner says, this is not enough. Recently he called upon Governor Driscoll to establish a bureau of narcotics control in New Jersey Between the Federal and State narcotic laws stands a gap named by antinarcotic workers "the twilight zone," which is caused by the lack of integration between the two. Through this unblocked alley, many narcotic peddlers who rightfully belong behind bars, are able to escape and to continue their deadly work. Establishment of a bureau of narcotics control would bring much-needed cooperation between State and Federal officials, and, according to United States Commissioner of Narcotics H. J. Anslinger would more efficiently enforce present State laws. Such bureaus are already in operation in New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut.

Far from being an alarmist, Berlinger talks quietly and earnestly about the danger of marijuana to young people. "They don't know what they're geting into," he says. "When they smoke a reefer, they're not told what it is. All they hear is that 'it's fun, try it,' and these adolescents, just beginning to feel the first flush of manhood or womanhood, feel very adult about trying this something new. A reefer or two makes them even more adult, they imagine—for its effect is to pep up their egos while at the same time releasing their inhibitions. They feel brave, or amorous, or many other things, and in their hopped-up state commit acts from which they would normally shrink.

"The use of marijuana is habit-forming as is any of the major drugs. As most people know, it is used in cigarettes from which the tobacco is removed, the tube filled two-thirds with marijuana and one-third with tobacco. It is sold in the same packages as popular brand cigarettes, except that the price of 'reefers' runs about $2.50 per pack instead of the 20 cents for the usual cigarettes."

"The means used by dope peddlers for getting these doped cigarettes into the hands of youngsters is sickening. One of the peddlers will hang around a school until he sights a likely looking prospect. 'Hey, feller, want to try something new? Here, give it to you free. Try it. You'll get a kick out of it like you never had before. Pass them around to the boys. You'll have lots of fun—you and the girls." And the carefully picked victim, for any one of a number of reasons, accepts the poison pack and becomes the channel for its distribution in his set.

"The result," says Berliner, "is often that detection comes about after some horrible event has taken place. With police entry into the case, the whole nasty business comes out. The youngsters have to be sent to rehabilitation centers to cure them of the habit, and the broken-hearted parents pick up as best they can and go on from there.

"If that were the end of the story, it would be bad enough. But so often, it isn't. These peddlers are in the business to make money. They follow the youngsters through the law courts, find out what rehabilitation centers they've been sent to, and then go after them again when they are released. Unless the youngster has learned his lesson well and has plenty of willpower, he can be drawn into the net again."

"Marijuana is making dangerous inroads into the lives of our youth," says Berliner. "People need to be alerted about it right here in New Jersey as well as in other States. The Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement is badly needed and its establishment should be sponsored by the peoples of this State."

Berliner also feels that before long, New Jersey will have to provide a hospital for the care and rehabilitation of the "unfortunate victims of narcotic drug addiction."

Of the major drugs—codein, heroin, and morphine, an opium derivative, Berliner talked less. "From these addicts come your major criminals," he said. "Not alone because of the effects of the drug, but because it costs $5 a day for one of these addicts to live. That is the price they have to pay for their daily shot."

He added one startling comment: "It takes only one full shot of any of these drugs to make a man an addict."

Berliner himself has never "tried" any of the drugs, it might be added—not even a single puff of a reefer. A nonsmoker of any kind, he says: "I'm the kind of guy who gets dizzy from a cigar. Imagine what a reefer might do."

All of Berliner's antinarcotic work has been at his own expense. His has been a volunteer capacity, for which he has not only studied and labored, but for which also he has paid the bills. When one considers the scope of his activity, it is not surprising that the United States Government thinks it's time for one good, contributing American citizen to achieve recognition.

But Berliner's civic activities do not end there. An insurance broker by trade, he has been in the forefront of community projects for many years. Last year, he was Bergen County chairman of the heart campaign. In January he was appointed a State trustee of the New Jersey chapter of the National Society for Crippled Children and Adults. He has served on the pack committee of the Glen Rock Byrd School cub scout unit, and is immediate past national commander of the Legion of Guardsmen, an organization composed of members of the National Guard.

Last year, in this capacity, he called on President Truman. One of his proudest possessions is a news picture of himself and Truman deep in conversation. "I spent three-quarters of an hour with him," says Berliner. "We had a wonderful talk."

This past weekend was spent at Trenton where he was toastmaster for the annual convention dinner of the New Jersey State Legion of Guardsmen.

Berliner is a graduate of New York University where he majored in journalism. He is a Patersonian by birth, and an American by practice. His scrapbook is studded with striking pictures of Abraham Lincoln, and a mention of Thomas Jefferson will evoke a responsive gleam and an intense statement: "The most wonderful American that ever lived."

Throughout the conversation as he spoke out against lethargy, dishonesty, race prejudice, and crooked politics, we were reminded of a poem which appears in the Poet's Corner of this newspaper this week:

"We care not what his temples or his creeds;
One fact holds clear and fast:
That into his fateful heap of days' deeds,
The soul of a man is cast."

If Berliner has a credo, that—judging by his acts—is what it says.

Lobbying—Secret Propaganda Is Not the American Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, all of the Members of this House are familiar with the floods of letters and barrages of telegrams which come to Congress from the Committee for Constitutional Government whenever important legislation is under consideration. Most of the Members, however, are probably not aware that this organization also makes secret mass mailings to Congress without identifying themselves. Secret propaganda is not the American way, and I regret that it is my duty to tell the Members of the House that the Committee for Constitutional Government recently sent Members of Congress anonymous letters in plain envelopes.

Just before the contempt citation of Edward A. Rumely was brought before this body, Members of the House received a flood of mailed "telegrams" which were only reproductions of telegrams. These purported to come from several newspaper publishers in Colorado, Florida, and other States. However, the envelopes were postmarked in Washington, D. C., and carried no return address or name.

On July 26, just 4 days before this House cited Edward A. Rumely for contempt, each Member of Congress was sent a letter purporting to come from a doctor in Burley, Idaho. It enclosed a letter which the same doctor had written to me on July 8, condemning me for asking the Committee for Constitutional Government to tell our committee who their big financial angels were.

This letter came in a plain envelope, and was postmarked New York, N. Y. Now I thought that the doctor might have been in New York on a vacation, but most doctors I know use envelopes with their own name and address in the upper right hand corner. My interest was further aroused by the fact that the letter did not bear a stamp, but had been sent through a postage meter. I therefore asked the Postmaster General who used the meter in question, and he answered immediately that the Committee for Constitutional Government used the meter.

Mr. Speaker, I vigorously defend the Committee for Constitutional Government's right to try to influence Congress by mass mailing of reproduction of letters of their supporters, or by any other legal means. I feel, however, that people who try to influence Congress should come out in the open and identify themselves, and not hide behind such subterfuges.

The House Committee on Lobbying does not wish to regulate, prohibit, or hamper in any way attempts to influence legislation, but I believe, and I think that all of the members of the committee agree, that Congress has the right to know the identity of those who spend money to try to influence Congress. At this point in the RECORD I wish to include copies of the two letters from the Idaho doctor, my letter to the Postmaster General, and his reply:

J. R. KIRCHER, M. D.,
Burley, Idaho, July 26, 1950.

HONORABLE and DEAR SIR: Attached hereto is a letter I have written to each Member of Congress.

Sincerely yours,
JAMES R. KIRCHER, M. D.

J. R. KIRCHER, M. D.,
Burley, Idaho, July 8, 1950.

Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN,
Chairman, Committee on Lobbying Activities, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The committee, of which you are chairman, has an important job to do. However, when the chairman of any committeet, without consulting the other members, considers himself in a position that he can violate the Constitution—the basic moral principles on which our country was founded—I say to you and to all who will hear: "Let the committee chairman be investigated and if the findings of such investigations indicate, let him also be removed from office according to whatever procedures are legally established for such cases."

I am sure you are acquainted with the unconstitutional violation I mentioned. That is, your submitting of questionnaires to corporations concerning expenditures for advertising, literature, contributions, or any project you may consider to fall within your catch-all definition of lobbying. All this is just another step toward Government control of individual rights.

Your demand that the Committee for Constitutional Government submit a list of those who bought literature for distribution purposes in the true American spirit, and particularly copies of The Road Ahead, is none of your or anyone else's business. Are you and others afraid of the effect of this book? Are you alarmed at the rising tide of public opinion threatening the insidous growth of piecemeal socialism?

I am proud to tell you that I have, in a small way, helped distribute this enlightening book and other literature. I only wish I could do more. The response has been gratifying and I believe that the people of this area, at least, are getting entirely fed up with subsidies, confiscatory taxes, deficit spending, controls, and encroachments of their personal freedoms.

In regard to lobbying, as you define the term, we are also getting tired of having our money spent for lobbying by Government bureaus, Congress, and the Executive.

I wish to warn you and all members of your committee, that the common people of this country still have the power to dispose of all compromising leaders, socialistic thinkers, and those who believe we are unable to take care of ourselves. The day of reckoning is not too far distant for such men, regardless of what political party they proclaim themselves to be under.

Have you read The Road Ahead? If not, I sincerely hope you will and will spend some thought on the information contained within its pages.

I will continue to aid in the committee's work, and am proud to list my name on the rolls of those who are fighting to protect our liberties for posterity.

Very truly yours,
JAMES R. KIRCHER, M. D.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1950.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Post Office Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DONALDSON: On July 8, 1950, J. R. Kirchner, M. D., of Burley, Idaho, addressed a letter to me relating to the investigation of Edward A. Rumely's Committee for Constitutional Government which was conducted by the House Lobbying Committee. Thereafter, on July 27, 1950, Members of Congress were sent copies of this letter. A forwarding letter was attached to each such copy. It, too, purported to be from Burley, Idaho.

The envelopes in which these letters were mailed, however, were postmarked New York, and contained no return address. Furthermore, the envelopes appeared to have been addressed by stencil plates.

The citizen's right to petition the Members of Congress is one of our most sacred rights, and must be respected. I am not interested in regulating or limiting Dr. Kirchner's rights in any way, nor do we wish to regulate the distribution of Kirchner's letter. However, I believe that this committee and the Congress have a right to know the identity of the person or group who circulated this letter, which appears to be an attempt to influence the vote of the Congress on the contempt citation of Edward A. Rumely. (Kirchner's original letter was written on July 8, 1950. The mailing to Members of Congress was made on July 27, so that the letter would arrive just before the House voted on the contempt citation of Rumely.)

I would therefore appreciate your advising me of the identity of the person or organization which uses Pitney-Bowes Meter No. 173570 at New York, N. Y. This meter number appears on the envelope in question.

Sincerely yours,
FRANK BUCHANAN,
Chairman, Select Committee on Lobbying Activities.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 21, 1950.

Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN,
Chairman, Select Committee on Lobbying Activities,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter of September 19, 1950, requesting that you be advised of the identity of the person or organization using postage meter No. PB 173570 at New York, N. Y.

The permit for the use of this meter is presently held by the Committee for Constitutional Government, 205 East Forty-second Street, New York 17, N. Y.

Sincerely yours,
JESSE M. DONALDSON,
Postmaster General.

Address by Morris L. Ernst Before the Section on Criminal Law, American Bar Association

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Morris L. Ernst, before the American Bar Association, section of criminal law, on September 20, 1950.

Mr. Ernst is well known throughout legal circles for his outstanding work in the field of civil rights and civil liberties. He was a member of the President's Committee on Civil Rights.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secret foreign world-wide organizations have affected the desires of our people to live in peace. They have caused the lowering of our standards of living in order that we may insure our way of life by guns, planes, and bombs—if necessary. It would be paradoxical in the extreme if against this background the jurisprudence of our Nation were to be unaffected by dictators who operate with stealthy wealth and vast fanaticism. Not only are we affected—we are in peril—peril in terms of our machinery of justice. In fact, if we are less than calmly wise we will win the conflict only to lose it by bending, during the struggle, down to the level of Communist and Fascist techniques.

Seldom has our Nation acted with more hysteria and less acumen. We impose oaths to detect those sneaks to whom an oath is an avowed bourgeois irrelevancy, we taint non-Communists as if they were Communists thus aiding the Communists by beclouding the line between Communists and non-Communists, by economic and social ostracism we make it nigh impossible for people to leave that organization—we do this rather than induce, as we can, at least one-third of the members under 30 years of age to desert it; we impose a kind of attainder, social and economic, on those who years ago joined nonpolitical organizations but later captured by Communist agents; we now deter decent people from joining all organizations thus abdicating all organized efforts to the men and women of the underground; we fire off radio programs actresses without any hearing and shut down the use of halls requested for Communist followers. In bewildered fashion we evoke blanket proscriptions in governmental jobs rather than designate the sensitive jobs in sensitive areas; we seldom distinguish between the ineluctable use of appraisal by association and the abhorrent concept of criminal guilt by mere association. These are only a few samples of our folly—a kind of adolescent noisy folly that deflects our thinking from a sound attack on this social disease, a kind of seemingly effective folly that accomplishes nothing except false headlines in the irresponsible parts of the press and an increase of cynicism and despair. Above all we fail to take counsel from J. Edgar Hoover who heads our national reporting agency, and just because he reports and does not indict or discharge has a position of vantage. His pleas for disclosure instead of suppression should give pause to those who think an iceberg would be less dangerous if all under water.

Everyone has all the answers and no one has the questions because of the historical background. Only a short time ago the army of Russians was a valuable ally against a similar but less shrewd type of tyranny. Surely this welcomed mass of fighting men accounts for a part of our emotional conflict. Then again, never before in our history have we had to admit that there are severe limiting factors weighing against believers in the First Freedom in any contest of ideas or arms. A dictatorship is equipped to start war. Sheep can be driven to their own slaughter, while free men would rather argue and debate than die or kill. This is as it should be but it presents a handicap even though free men ultimately fight better than slaves. Above all we have had little experience with organized secret mass movements, and the leaders of our national thought have remained too remote and hence ignorant of the pathological workings of those men and women who, benefiting by our pursuit of freedom, joined movements to disrupt liberal forces in the first instance but ever ready finally to subvert our Government. No forum in our land has approached the over-all problem.

I have purposely met on many occasions over the past decades with the heads of underground movements and more particularly with Communist leaders and have reached one conclusion which I use as a springboard for my thinking. It is this—secrecy and mendacity are so closely allied that we cannot put an end to one without destroying the other. In fact, Communists, as is also true of Ku Kluxers, Fascists, and Bundists cannot survive in our climate if in the open and without night shirts. As a corollary may I note that the Communist Party in our economy has, aside from its Negro members, no economic base. It relies for its vast funds, its leaders, and its rank and file on middle- and upper-middle-class folk—men and women who in Freudian terms are transferring their rebellion against parents into abject acceptance of the authority of a new papa—called Stalin. Papa Stalin tells them if the pact with Hitler is good or bad; whether Tito is angel or devil. All regimented secret mass movements invite peculiarly those people who dislike the chore of making decisions. Living on orders from above seems, and maybe is, simpler even though less joyous to those of us who prefer the circuit rides of trial and error.

Against this scant appraisal of background I have time to discuss only four avenues of approach of a legal nature. Don't think that my mention of these four indicates a comprehensive program. To take up four in one-half hour is truly an impertinence. We need dozens of totally new techniques and it's high time that the President appoint a national commission in the nature of a British royal high commission to bring into the arena of public debate a comprehensive program—something which congressional-committee behavior plus the equally shabby headlines of our daily press have totally failed to do.

My first proposal impinges on the matrix of our society—the first amendment, not as conceived in 1787 but as expanded by Supreme Court decisions. The theory of free speech is our national gamble—our governmental religion. We stake our all on an act of faith—truth will win out in the conflict of ideas in the market. But I suggest we must now wake up to realize that truth has slight chance to win out in a market distorted and colored by stealth and anonymity. Stealth in this field is a fraud on the minds of people.

We have traveled far from the days of town meetings when the speaker stood up to say his piece. Now with mass media of communication plus the increasing ease of people joining in organized groups it is imperative that the market place be no longer tainted by speakers for anonymous forces. In a busy world it is essential that we be advised for whom the speaker is talking, who pays for the pamphlet, the radio program, or newspaper advertising. I assume you agree with my faith in the people—that is, we will abide by the people's choice of their rulers whether klansmen or Communists provided the choice results from the clash in clean and open market place.

In 1787 we had secret committees of correspondents but no analogy can be properly drawn between the secret letters of the Adams family and the million dollars raised, for example, in the Scottsboro case, when only $60,000 of the million was spent on the case itself. These are the figures given to me by Earl Browder before he was semideposed by his Papa Stalin. Moreover, there can be no sound legal analogy between the individual spy planted by a foreign government in our midst operating through bribery or other forms of seduction, and the penetration of government by persons with concealed divisions of loyalty and acting through cohesive groups. I suggest that we are making a serious mistake in our legal approaches unless we distinguish between individual behavior patterns and the increasing effectiveness of group activities. This is the first departure we must make in our legal thinking.

We then can look at organized entrance into the market. We have a long history of pursuit of disclosure as opposed to suppression. For example, the Pure Food and Drug Acts, the Securities and Exchange Commission and our postal controls of the second class mails—all are predicated on the theory of caveat vendor rather than caveat emptor. I should guess that in terms of criminal law, the endeavor to suppress ideas will bring none of the results which the most high-minded of the proponents of the concept hope for. For my part I wish we could force the Communist Party to go on the ballot rather than try to suppress it. The most that can be expected from our present approaches to the problem will be that the Communist groups will form a new organization under a new name and disavow in Aesopian language those principles or activities which have been interdicted by the courts. We may find that all we have outlawed is a name. Unlike dictators who are always insecure and afraid of ideas—we must not and should not try to outlaw ideas. But we have open to us very simple and to my mind effective remedies in the nature of disclosure. For whom were the pickets at the White House selling their wares when that $50,000 picket line urged us to play ball with Hitler at a time when Hitler and Stalin were in bed together? I would defend the right of people to picket the President's home but it is shocking that we still do not know for whom the pickets were picketing. For my part I believe that all organizations of mass appeal trying to buy the public mind should make full disclosure of source of income, use of funds and other pertinent facts, along the lines of present disclosure imposed on those users of the mail pouches who seek cheap postage rates, to wit: second class. At present if you can afford first class postage charges you may sneak up on the public. The Washington Post prints several times a year the names of its main stockholders or bondholders but millions of pamphlets can be sent out by Gerald L. K. Smith or Frank Gannett or by anti-Catholic or anti-Semitic bigots, or by Communists raising millions of dollars each year in this Nation, without one particle of disclosure.

Surely you and I would prefer to live, as a matter of taste, in a folkway of personal anonymity with respect to our group activities but the discomfort of group generic disclosure must be suffered in order to meet the conflict of ideas spread by secret subversive groups. Above all, to single out any one group at any one time of history for disclosure is dangerous even if possible at the moment of selection, and may well invite our people to demand sporadic and piecemeal disclosure in fortuitous fashion whenever a particular situation seems to create a particular danger to our folkway. The constitutional base for such controls is indisputably in the post roads power as to anonymity in the mails, and in taxing power as to secrecy of those millions collected each year through underground aegis of Communist, Fascist, or other organizations. We must revise our thinking as to secrecy for those who lobby not to Congress but to the minds of the people. I am not now talking of adherence to ideas but rather adherence to group activity whether the adherence be by membership, contribution, or otherwise. The distinction is important because in a country of our vast dimensions, so far removed from town meeting days, any single individual operating alone is impotent and in fact, the very purpose of group activity is to overcome individual impotence.

As a guide, I refer you to the New York statutes which without outlawry call for disclosure as a condition of operation for groups like the Klan, which statutes presented no constitutional infirmities when reviewed by our highest court. Nor am I disturbed by the argument that such over-all disclosure will make it impossible for unpopular minority groups to be organized. Among other evidence, I point to the fact that President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights, of which I happen to have been a member, in a little discussed section of its report, came out for full disclosure of all groups. This, if you please, with the backing of labor, employer, and various racial and religious minority groups such as Catholic, Jews, and Negroes.

Let me shift to a second phase of the problem on which I suggest a new approach.

Eleven men gather in a room and discuss the subversion of a bank on some snowy distant week end. We do not wait until such robbers are at the door of the bank, nor would we listen to a plea of the constitutional rights of the bank subverters under the first amendment. To analogize, I should imagine that the 11 Communists recently tried, insofar as their meetings and words were secret, have no claim whatsoever under the first amendment. I have not read the record in that case and hence I am not talking about the evidence. I am quite clear that I would defend their speech insofar as it was published or spoken openly in the market place with full disclosure for whom the words were uttered. However, I am talking solely of the rule of law to be applied to the facts, and I am fearful that any rule of law other than one based on the distinction between secret and public speech may well turn out to supply a deprivation of our increasingly generous faith in the rights of free exchange of ideas. Surely secret speech is not of the character considered worthy of the high protection written in the first amendment as interpreted by our highest court. Moreover, the type and quality of the overt act needed to supply the necessary bridge from ideas to behavior must be analogized in secret speech cases to the bank robbers rather than to the single disclosed propounder of even what at any one moment of history may be deemed a present and clear danger.

This leads me to a third proposal. We should reconsider the Holmes slogan of clear and present danger. Surely the old judge—a hater of slogans—might today, if alive, ask for a reappraisal. To me "clear and present" are too subjective to be of as great value as the standards used by Judge Brandeis and much overlooked by later jurists. L. D. B. raised two objective tests: Is there time to make answer, and in the ultimate, is there time to call in the police? I suggest this is a safer rule of law to be applied to the curtailment of speech. I take it that a fully disclosed Coxey's army could march on Washington proposing to break every window in the Capitol and we would jeer, shower satire, and give answer. We would not arrest and suppress the army even on entering Washington. We could have police ready and on hand in case of need. This rule takes care of the tired and worn out example of crying fire in a theater, for then there is no time to give answer. With secret speech there is never time to answer. I refer you to Norway's Mr Quisling. When could the Czechs have been able to find "clear and present" danger before my friend Jan Masaryk was done in? Thus, the rule must be directed toward the very secrecy which denies the opportunity to give answer or even ultimately to use force to protect our structures of life. I suggest that clear-and-present-danger rule is now a clear-and-present danger to free speech.

Of the many approaches I would enjoy discussing I have time only for a fourth, collateral to the questions I have raised. I refer to the unresolved field of law which involves a troublesome technique used by the state to protect the state. I am opposed philosophically to all wire tapping, but I have come to the conclusion that the last half dozen Attorney Generals and Solicitors, and Presidents Roosevelt and Truman were correct in condoning wire tapping by the Federal Government in the fields of espionage and sedition. The FBI only recently has announced that at any one time it taps less than 200 wires in the entire Nation. I think it wholesome that the FBI give reports as to the extent of the practice but I am really not bothered by its tapping under approval of the Attorney General as compared to the tens of thousands of wire taps legally or illegally made by local city and State police each year. The constitution of New York State, for example, purports to legalize, vis-à-vis the Federal Constitution and the preempting of telephone wires by the Federal Government, what in fact is vast indiscriminate invasion of homes and businesses often for the discovery of such minor quaint pursuits as prostitution, gambling, or betting on horses. I suggest that unless we strictly limit such quite distasteful searches without warrants our people will eventually rise up and ask for the abolition of all taps. Moreover, I would think that even in the scant and limited field of Federal tapping to preserve the State, all permits should flow from the Attorney General—even if requested by Treasury, Armed Forces, or other departments. Aside from national security I would have us condone wire tapping only in the field of kidnaping and extortion where life is at stake, and then only on request of affected parties.

The bar has acted on phases of the problem but surely, as presumed leaders of our society, has made no impression on national thinking. We face a research magnificent—an exploration badly needed to help our jurisprudence grow up to the new problems of handling mendacity and secrecy—organized on a world-wide scale. Being a glandular optimist, I am confident the victory is ours as soon as we stop generalizing and smearing and get down to acting as social engineers to cope with the ideas written by two men under a candlelight a century ago.

Congressman John A. McGuire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. RAMSAY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, as the second session of the Eighty-first Congress draws to a close I should like to say a few words in praise of our colleague the Honorable JOHN A. MCGUIRE, of the Third District of Connecticut. Congressman MCGUIRE is asking the people of that district to reelect him to Congress in November on the basis of the excellent record he has made here.

JOHN MCGUIRE came to the House of Representatives from the town of Wallingford, Conn., where he had served for 16 consecutive years as town clerk. He knows the Third Connecticut District thoroughly and fully understands its problems as a result of his service as chairman of the State Democratic Committee of Connecticut and his eight consecutive 2-year terms as Town Clerk of Wallingford. I can think of no Member of this House who has given more earnest and careful attention to the needs and interests of his constituents than JOHN MCGUIRE. That he will continue to give that kind of service, regardless of his political affiliations, is a foregone conclusion. By his untiring devotion to duty and profound concern with the legislative measures before the House, he has demonstrated not only his ability to cope with the urgent problems with which the Nation must contend, but also his awareness and determination to meet the needs of the constituents he is privileged to serve.

He is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, one of the most powerful committees of the House. The distinguished chairman of that committee, the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, showed his high regard for Congressman MCGUIRE by appointing him as one of the five members of the Subcommittee on War Claims. This important subcommittee has considered some 30 bills on war claims alone during the present session.

The wide range of Mr. MCGUIRE's interests can be seen by some of the bills he has introduced during the past 2 years. They include measures to require the owners of airplanes to be financially responsible for damage caused by such airplanes; to create a committee for the purpose of conducting an investigation and study to determine an appropriate design for the flag of the United States should the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii or both be admitted to the Union.

He has also sponsored legislation to provide for the payment of up to $10,000 to the widows, children, or parents of a member of our Armed Forces who, as a prisoner of war, was illegally killed by the Government of North Korea; to amend the War Claims Act by providing for compensation to prisoners of war held by the North Koreans and any of our soldiers hiding in Korea to avoid capture by the North Koreans; and to establish a War Damage Corporation to provide reasonable protection against loss or damage to property resulting from enemy attack.

In addition he introduced a bill to establish a Federal Small Business Administration for the purpose of helping independent small business enterprises and to make capital and credit for such enterprises more readily available.

He is the author of a resolution that our Government should take such action before the United Nations as may be necessary to insure that Italy may be trustees of those colonies which she possessed prior to World War II, and a resolution calling for an investigation of safety regulations governing air travel.

One of the country's leading labor papers had this to say about Mr. MCGUIRE in a recent issue:

> His industry is amazing. The record shows he has answered more roll calls than any other member of the Connecticut delegation. That is only an example of the way he sticks to his job. On all progressive legislation, and particularly on labor legislation, his record is without a flaw.

Mr. Speaker, JOHN MCGUIRE has made an exceptional record as a first-term Member of this House. He has shown himself to be a man of character, integrity, and action. He has worked hard and faithfully for his district and for Connecticut and for this Nation in a critical period of its history. His constituents will do well to send him back to Congress and so take advantage of the experience and the seniority he has here.

Senator Baker, of Oregon, and the Battle of Balls Bluff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by Grant Conway, vice president of the Oregon State Society of Washington, on the subject of Senator Baker, of Oregon, and the Battle of Balls Bluff. This splendid address was given at Balls Bluff, Va., April 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR BAKER OF OREGON AND THE BATTLE OF BALLS BLUFF

The Battle of Balls Bluff is known chiefly as the place where Senator Edward Dickinson Baker, of Oregon, was killed. This monument was erected primarily in his memory by Congress. Baker has been largely forgotten in the twentieth century, but in the middle of the nineteenth century he was one of the foremost characters on the American scene, and his likeness may be found between Jefferson and Washington in the rotunda in the Capitol, where it was placed by act of the Forty-second Congress in 1873. Within the past year President Truman made a special trip as the guest of Senator MORSE to pay homage to this now almost forgotten historical personage.[1] There is a small stone on which Baker's name is inscribed outside that fence supposedly marking the spot where he fell. However, he is not buried here. His body was carried from the field of battle by his comrades and services were held in the Senate Chamber where he held office at the time of his death, and then his remains were transported to the State of California, where he was buried in the cemetery on Lone Mountain in San Francisco, a cemetery which he had dedicated 7 years earlier. But his mortal remains have not been permitted to rest in peace. At the close of World War II I was in San Francisco when the Lone Mountain Cemetery gave way to progressive civic planning. A controversy developed as to where he would be reburied. The town of Baker, Oreg., named in honor of Baker, requested that his body be reinterred there. However, the Army took over in this emergency and decreed that the Presidio at the Golden Gate would be the proper place.

FRIEND OF LINCOLN

Baker was perhaps Abe Lincoln's closest friend. They were rival young lawyers in southern Illinois, where Baker was credited as being more in demand as a public speaker. When the cornerstone of the State capitol was laid July 4, 1837, Baker was chosen over other competing orators to deliver the dedication speech.[2] In 1844 Baker and Lincoln opposed each other in the Whig primary and Baker was elected to Congress. While Baker was espousing an unpopular local cause at the Springfield Courthouse he was threatened by a mob of Democrats, and Lincoln came to his rescue on the platform and defended free speech and a riot was avoided.[3] Later Baker resigned his seat in the House while he was taking part in the Mexican War and Lincoln was elected to the office. On his return from the war Baker moved to another congressional district and both Baker and Lincoln were elected to Congress on the Whig ticket.

Before Lincoln was inaugurated for President, Baker visited his own mother at Springfield and Lincoln paid a visit to his home there and expressed himself to Baker. "I'd rather have you elected Senator than any man alive."[4]

Senator Baker introduced Lincoln at the Presidential inauguration. In the Senate Baker acted as the Republican Party whip on administration bills and handled patronage. Lincoln gave Baker the task of convincing Henry Clay that he should accept the Ambassadorship to Russia rather than a cabinet post for his support during the campaign.[5] A delegation with a petition called upon Lincoln to protest the way Baker was handling patronage. Lincoln tore up the petition in their presence, tossed it in a White House fireplace, and dismissed them.[6]

At Baker's death, Willie Lincoln wrote a poetic eulogy. Carl Sandburg best expresses Lincoln's loss when Senator Baker died:[7]

"Gone now forever from Lincoln was a trumpet, a shield, an intimate companion and a bright light of loyalty, namesake of his second born boy, his choice of all men to introduce him for a Presidential inaugural address. Not again would the two of them laugh with glee over Baker's leaving California in 1860 to enter Oregon, form a combination of Republicans and Douglas Democrats and wreck the political status of the secessionists—"

PUBLIC SERVANT OF THE WEST

Baker stumped the State of California in 1856 for the first Republic Presidential candidate, John C. Fremont. The Republicans were an unimportant minority in California and his political future there was dim.

In September 1859, a Republican delegation from Oregon, including three of the State committeemen, invited him to come to Oregon. He was offered support for the United States Senate if he would stump the State for the party. He visited Oregon almost immediately and became convinced that he was both needed and wanted. Returning to San Francisco he closed his law office and sailed February 17, 1860 for Portland on the Panama.[8]

On his arrival in Salem, Oreg., he opened a law office and began a whirlwind campaign around the State. By stagecoach, on horseback, and boat he went everywhere possible in the time before the spring primary, pouring out floods of inspiring oratory. The secessionist Democrats could see that they lacked a majority for their candidates in the Oregon State Legislature, the elective body of the time, and slipped away to Uncle Nick Schram's barn where the sergeant-at-arms discovered them and brought back enough of them to secure a quorum and elect Baker and Nesmith with the help of a coalition with the Douglas (Union) Democrats.[9] Baker thereby became the first Republican elected to Federal office from the Pacific coast.

Arriving in San Francisco, October 19, 1860, on the Brother Jonathan, he was greeted by a 100-gun salute and a parade. On October 26 he delivered his speech, "Apostrophe to Freedom," which was famous for many years thereafter, at the American Theater. The attendance was reported at 4,000 with twice that number turned away.[10]

Baker, while in the Senate, was credited with helping nip in the bud the movement for a Pacific Confederacy, a movement led by Senators Joe Lane and William M. Gwin. There was a strong secessionist movement in Oregon and California which is not generally known.

Senator Baker used his influence with President Lincoln and Gen. Winfield Scott to have high ranking Army officers of questionable loyalty on the Pacific coast relieved of duty and in some cases arrested. Adjutant General Thomas wrote directly to three Oregon citizens, Thomas R. Cornelius, B. F. Harding, and R. F. Maury, authorizing them to raise one regiment of mounted troops, "* * * unless otherwise ordered, you will be governed by any directions sent to you by Col. E. D. Baker. * * *"[11] A number of Oregon men later served with the Confederate Army. John Lane at West Point, son of Joe Lane, became a colonel, Capt. Thomas Jordan, United States Quartermaster at The Dalles, resigned to serve the South and was believed to have been a colonel in the Culpepper cavalry. Major Garnett resigned from his Army post in Oregon and was commissioned brigadier by Jefferson Davis. John Adair, West Point graduate of 1861, son of the postmaster and collector at Astoria, was commissioned and ordered to Walla Walla. He deserted and was dismissed from the United States Army. J. B. Sykes, Indian agent at Siletz, resigned and served with the rebels.[12]

[1] Senator WAYNE L. MORSE introduced Senate Joint Resolution 168 on April 24, 1950: "Resolved, etc., That the Architect of the Capitol, with the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library, is hereby authorized and directed to procure and cause to be affixed to the base of the statue of Edward Dickinson Baker, located in the rotunda of the Capitol, a suitable plaque bearing appropriate references to the life and achievements of the said Edward Dickinson Baker.

"There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sum as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution."

The resolution is followed by a two-column biography of E. D. Baker which may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 24, 1950. Most of the Capitol Building guards know only that Senator Baker was from Oregon. My first inquiry about Baker addressed to a uniformed attendant in the rotunda in 1940 was referred to an "expert," who confused Baker with Senator Joseph Lane. The resolution introduced by Senator MORSE will provide a suitable plaque to inform Capitol visitors of the achievements of Senator Baker of Oregon.

PUBLIC SPEAKER

Baker was a great orator, and spoke in many places on many subjects. As an attorney in California he was successful and fees were high and in line with his reputation as a good lawyer.[14] After winning a case in court, he would sometimes remain and deliver speeches on subjects chosen by his audience. Subjects chosen included: books, art, the life of Robert Burns and the laying of the Atlantic cable.[16] He drew some of the largest audiences of all times in San Francisco, New York, and Washington.[16]

One of his most famous legal cases was in defense of Cora, an Italian gambler arrested for the killing of a United States marshal in San Francisco. Baker saved Cora in court, but the gambler was lynched by the vigilantes on his release. For this case barrister Baker received a retainer fee of $15,000 which he lost the same night playing faro.[16] Baker has been the only man in the history of our country to speak in uniform before both the House and Senate while a Member of each body.[17]

MILITARY SERVICE

Colonel Baker has been attacked for his leadership at Balls Bluff on the ground of lack of military experience.[18] Baker served in the Black Hawk Indian War. He served as a colonel in the Mexican War where he was shot in the throat, and later led troops in the battle of Vera Cruz and at Cerro Gordo. When General Shields was killed at Cerro Gordo, Baker assumed command and led a charge, taking the enemy position. His troops pursued Gen. Santa Anna so closely that they captured his wooden leg which they bore triumphantly back to Illinois.

Early in the Civil War Baker left his seat in the Senate and recruited the California Regiment in Pennsylvania. President Lincoln offered him commissions as a major and brigadier general,[19] but he did not accept.

HEADQUARTERS, BAKERS BRIGADE,
Camp Advance, Chain Bridge,
September 22, 1861.

DEAR SIR: We are on the eve of a very great battle. I shall endeavor so to do my duty that the State of Oregon shall have no cause to blush for me, being in no wise forgetful of my obligations to represent her everywhere with fidelity and courage. As you have learned before this, the President was pleased to appoint me a brigadier general, an office which my duty to the State of Oregon, in my judgment compelled me to decline. Yesterday I had conferred upon me the appointment of major general. Actuated by the same motive, I shall decline that also. I confess, however, considering the present condition of the Army and the great command this office would devolve upon me, nothing could induce me to decline it, but my deep sense of obligation to the State of Oregon, which it will take me many years of faithful service to repay.

E. D. BAKER.

Also see Baltz, footnote, p. 74. Colonel Baker received the appointment of brigadier general, U. S. Volunteers, August 6, 1861, to rank from May 17, 1861. This he declined August 31, 1861. On September 21, 1861, he was appointed major general, U. S. Volunteers, but at the time of his death he had neither officially accepted or declined. General McClellan at that time was the only officer in the Army of the Potomac holding a rank as high as major general.

[20] The following excerpts are from a conversation with Maj. Robert Parish of the California Regiment: "President Lincoln has given me the commission of a major general in the Army to be announced by me at my discretion, but such are the jealousies against me entertained by the Regular Army officers, that I do not expect to survive my first battle." Kennedy, 74–5.

[21] Op cit., Harpers New Monthly, 108–9, 113. Most of the previous references cited include an account of the Battle of Balls Bluff.

That Baker enjoyed political influence there is no doubt and Regular Army officers resented his competition for high military posts. He confided to friends that he did not expect to survive his first battle.[20] The regiment's first task was the preparing of the Ethan Allen Fort, later called Fort Baker, near Chain Bridge across the Potomac River at Washington.

THE BATTLE OF BALLS BLUFF

Now for the bloody battle of Balls Bluff. On the 20th of October 1861, a reconnaissance force, the Fifteenth Massachusetts under Colonel Devons crossed the river with orders to attack a small Confederate camp near Leesburg. They were met by a superior Confederate force and General Stone, in command of the Army of the Potomac in this sector, ordered Colonel Baker with three regiments to cross at Balls Bluff to reinforce Colonel Devon. Transportation across the Potomac was to be supplied Baker's force. Baker arrived at the Potomac and found it swollen from heavy rains, and Balls Bluff with its high cliffs the most treacherous place to cross. Both above and below Balls Bluff, which we will explore, the Virginia shore is lower and the water less swift. But Baker had his orders. For transport he found two scows between the Maryland shore and Harrison Island and one scow, a life-boat and two rowboats between Harrison Island and Balls Bluff. Baker ordered that a canal barge be taken from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the Virginia shore for transporting two howitzers and a field piece, which were set up southwest of the Monument. Baker realized the hopelessness of his position and the fact that not all the 1763 troops under his command could be evacuated at the Bluff. The Confederates were there in superior numbers and more reinforcements were arriving. The Union artillery gunners were killed and the guns were evacuated. The boats were having trouble removing the wounded.[21]

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes was a lieutenant with the Twentieth Massachusetts which was known as the Harvard Regiment and formed a portion of Baker's reinforcements. Prior to Balls Bluff they had routine patrol duty along the Chesapeake and Ohio towpath, along where we will walk later today. On the first Rebel charge Holmes fired once and was hit in the stomach with a spent bullet which knocked the wind from him. Finally rising to one knee to take aim he was hit in the chest and his shirt torn from his back. Holmes was evacuated but another skiff carrying wounded capsized and all were drowned.[22]

Colonel Baker took a position ten paces in front of his men in the open and held it for an hour, rallying his men and quietly criticizing their fighting.

"Lower boys. Steady. Keep cool and fire low."

The Confederates concentrated their fire on Baker and in a charge he was cut down with a fusilade of lead. The charging Confederates tried to take his body but a desperate bayonet countercharge recovered his body and it was taken in one of the last boats to remain afloat to Harrison Island. After Baker's death the Union defense crumpled. One desperate effort was made to break through the attacking forces on the down-river side before the northern troops were driven over the brink of the bluff. No boat replacements arrived. By nightfall of the 21st all the Union soldiers were killed or taken prisoner.

The Battle of Balls Bluff was the most pronounced Confederate victory of the war.[23] Two hundred northern soldiers were killed and as many wounded. The Confederates captured 529 prisoners, and admitted that 300 of their own men were killed and wounded.[24]

The Confederate newspaper in Leesburgh on November 9, 1861, reported a great victory over the "Lincoln vandals." Colonel Baker, the notorious Senator from Oregon, was killed. "He was an Englishman by birth, a brave and skillful officer, as was shown by his service in Mexico, and the loss the Yankee cause suffers from his death is as great as could be inflicted by the death of almost any man on their side."[25]

NOTE

In May, Harold B. Say, local Washington representative of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, called my attention to two bills introduced in the current session of Congress (81st Cong., 2d sess.). They include a provision which would abolish the Balls Bluff National Cemetery. These two bills, S. 2863 by Senator TYDINGS, and H. R. 6807 by Congressman COLE of New York, were introduced at the request of the Army and referred to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the House Committee on Public Lands.

The Balls Bluff National Cemetery consists of fifty-seven one-thousandths of an acre centered around a stone wall containing a flagpole. It is located on a rocky bluff overlooking the Potomac. A nearby farmer raises and lowers the United States flag daily and mows the grass for which he is paid $450 annually, the regular cost of maintenance of the monument, and an extremely minor item in the Army budget. However, the Army claims that it will be necessary to spend $5,000 for road repair in the coming year if they are required to keep the national cemetery. The 41-passenger, chartered bus which took most of the people to Balls Bluff on the day of the speech experienced no difficulty in traversing the road. Local upkeep for the needs of farmers using the road to Balls Bluff from Virginia Highway No. 15 should also be adequate for the needs of people visiting the monument. The cost of moving the remains of the soldiers to the national cemetery at Culpeper,

The monument is considered an Oregon shrine in the East. Miss Grace Townsend of the office of Senator CORDON mentioned that the first place outside of Washington where she takes Oregon visitors is Balls Bluff.

Anyone wishing to preserve this small monument should write to either Senators MORSE or CORDON or their local Congressman.

A Report to My Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a report on the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, including a statement of my own activities, which I now present to the House, and which I shall circulate as widely as possible in the Twenty-sixth Congressional District of Pennsylvania which I represent.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the Congress shall have the power to make all laws that shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect the specific powers granted to it, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the United States or any department or officer thereof.

The House of Representatives is composed of Members chosen every second year by the peoples of the several States. Since they are the people's Representatives, I think it fitting and proper that as such they should report to those who elected them, so that the people of each Congressional District may know what Congress has done and, also, how their Representative participated in the affairs of Government.

Both the House and the Senate in this Congress have been dominated by Members of the same political party which control the executive branch of our Government. In the House of Representatives, whose total membership is 435, the Democratic Party had a majority of 90 members. Therefore, when the Congress was organized, that party named the Speaker, the chairmen of all committees, and the majority of their Members to each committee. The program of the Congress is contained in the State of the Union messages, the budget message, and such other requests as the President may send to Congress in his various reports. During the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, the President has urged the continuation of the Marshall plan; demanded the repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947; the expansion of a socialized public housing program; the Brannan plan, providing production payments to farmers; compulsory health insurance, commonly referred to as "socialized medicine"; Federal aid to education; a continuation and expansion of the program for valley authorities; the authority to build and operate steel mills, and an economic control bill. He asked that Congress make no cuts in the excise taxes, unless this income could be supplemented by other taxes. He also urged no cuts in Federal expenditures, and then submitted a budget asking for appropriations which would create a deficit House for action.

Since I have become a Member of of approximately $5,000,000,000 per year.

In an effort to carry out this program as outlined by the President, and as developed by the individual Members of Congress, more than 16,000 pieces of legislation have been introduced into the Eighty-first Congress and many of these measures have come to the floor of the Congress, I have conscientiously endeavored to study the program of the legislation called for each week and to inform myself from every possible source the contents of each bill, resolution, or motion that is presented for consideration and action, after which I cast my vote as my best judgment dictates. I have sincerely tried to vote in each instance for what I consider the good of the country and all of the people, regardless of the threats or pleadings of special groups or interests which ask to have legislation enacted favorable to themselves.

It is impossible to give in detail all of the bills which were presented. However, I shall outline briefly some of the principal legislation which was passed during this session of Congress with regard to international affairs, national defense and Federal security, governmental reorganization, national economy, social security, health and welfare, agriculture, veterans, civil rights, and natural resources.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

In order that our country may present a unified front in its dealings with foreign countries, regardless of which political party is in power, I am in favor of a real bipartisan foreign policy which is the result of actual consultation and agreement between the members of both major parties. I regret that today we have a bipartisan foreign policy in name only. As a result, less than 5 years after VJ-day our country is again involved in a war with American men fighting and dying in Korea to stop Communist aggression.

At the end of hostilities of World War II, the Soviet Government controlled 170,000,000 people. Today it controls 800,000,000 people, despite the fact that this country has spent $36,000,000,000 since that time in an effort to stem the flood tide of communism.

I support ECA, or the Marshall plan, and the North Atlantic Pact. Both of these programs are designed to assist the nations of Europe in combating the "Red menace." I oppose the Mutual Defense Pact because the entire program was to be financed at the expense of our own national defense. We cannot arm the world and if war was as imminent as some people informed us, I felt it much better that our own forces be fully armed rather than place the arms where they could be utilized by forces which might not be friendly to our country. Military experts freely stated that reductions in our appropriations for national defense jeopardized the security of our country and with solemn warning men of authority thought that our own military needs should come first. The passage of a very short time and the happenings of events since that time prove that I was correct.

THE KOREAN CRISIS

Today our American boys are dying in the rice paddies of Korea because of the present administration's weak and vacillating foreign policy in the Far East, and the constant appeasement of the Russians which has resulted in the fall of Manchuria, China and North Korea, and which threatens the entire Continent of Asia, as well as Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines. It must be remembered that Congress itself has nothing to do with formulating the foreign policy of this country. This is entirely within the province of the President and the State Department.

I favor a strong far eastern policy, but Secretary Acheson told us in February 1949 that it was the policy of the administration to "wait for the dust to settle" before deciding on our next move in China. He also stated in January 1950, in his far eastern report, that—

> This defensive perimeter (where the United States will defend in the Far East) runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus.

In other words, that the United States was not interested in the defense of Korea, and that only Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines were in the perimeter of our defense setup, thus announcing to the world that we would not intervene to halt Communist aggression in China, Formosa, or Korea, all three of which lie beyond that perimeter. To the Asiatic peoples, and unquestionably to the Soviet Union, Mr. Acheson's amazing declaration was an open invitation for the Chinese Communists to complete the conquest of China by taking Formosa and South Korea.

We were told by spokesmen of the present administration that South Korea could not be defended if attacked, and that it had no military or strategic value. So we withdrew our troops, leaving $56,000,000 worth of small arms and equipment, light jeeps, clothing, and food. The Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee in an official document issued July 26, 1949, protested this withdrawal from Korea as occurring at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation.

It was on January 19, 1950, exactly 1 week after Mr. Acheson's statement about our perimeter of defense, that a majority of the House Republican Members joined 61 Democrats in rejecting the so-called Korean aid bill containing only economic assistance to Korea, with a warning to the administration that without military aid and appropriate assistance to other critical areas in Asia, the proposed $150,000,000 in economic assistance would not only be useless, but it would enhance the prize dangled before the Communist aggressors by Secretary of State Acheson. Under the terms of the bill for economic aid, we would have sent fertilizer, seed, and money for building of roads, dams, and the construction of a hydroelectric plant. It simply meant building up a greater and richer prize for the Communists when they took over Korea. What has actually happened in Korea today confirms our fears at that time. None of the economic aid, which was finally voted in February 1950, ever got there; and although $10,000,000 in military aid was voted for Korea, actually only the small amount of $200 worth of Signal Corps wire ever got there. This accounts for the fact that when our boys were first sent to Korea they had only the small arms and equipment, which had been left behind when our troops withdrew, with which to fight the tanks, artillery, and other heavy equipment of the North Koreans, which had been supplied by Russia.

The Truman administration and the State Department have been running the show. Among the top-flight policy makers of the State Department's far-eastern program was Owen Lattimore, who stated "the thing to do is to let South Korea fall—but not to let it look as though we pushed it." The Korean aid bill was never a bona fide effort to save Korea. It was a phony, an attempt to shift the blame of the State Department's blunders for the Communist conquest of Korea, which they expected. If the money was made available they could blame the Koreans—if not, they could blame Congress. Neither the voting of military nor economic aid to Korea was consistent with such a policy. On June 27, 1950, however, President Truman suddenly changed his mind, and our boys were ordered to fight in Korea. It is to be regretted that the mistakes of the Truman administration must now be paid for in the high currency of human blood.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I have always believed that our country should be strong so as to be able to defend itself from aggression by any other nation. It was that same motive which directed the Members of Congress to pass the Unification Act providing us with a Secretary of Defense who would have charge of the Army, the Navy, the Air Corps, and the Marine Corps. The Eighty-first Congress provided $736,000,000 for a 70-group Air Force, which they felt was necessary. This money was impounded by the Secretary of Defense on orders of President Truman. In addition to that authorized expenditure, Congress appropriated many more millions for the purchase of tanks, guns, and other military equipment. Some of this money was not spent, but was ordered impounded by the President. In the last 2 years $1,270,000,000, appropriated by Congress for national defense, was not spent.

This refusal to spend authorized appropriations for national defense was called "fat trimming" by the administration, but in fact the very lifeblood of our national defense was being drained.

REORGANIZATION

The Hoover Commission made extensive recommendations for reorganizing the executive departments. Public Law 109 was passed by Congress authorizing the President to carry out the reorganization of the executive departments in accordance with the Hoover report. The President has submitted 27 plans for such reorganization; 6 of which were rejected by the Senate, and 1 was rejected by the House. Twenty of these reorganization plans recommended by the Hoover Commission have been enacted into law.

NATIONAL ECONOMY

While the need for rent control in many instances has ceased to exist, nevertheless, there are some areas in which rent control is still necessary. Recognizing that fact, Congress passed an optional rent control bill. Any community subject to rent control could, by the action of its governing body, be decontrolled at any time. If the governing body took no action, the community automatically remained subject to rent control until December 31, 1950. If, in the opinion of the local governing body the need for rent control still exists beyond that date, the local authorities have the authority to extend it for another 6 months.

The Federal Deposit and Insurance Act was amended so as to authorize the insuring of bank deposits up to $10,000.

On April 18, 1950, the Postmaster General, Jesse Donaldson, issued an order directing that postal deliveries be limited to one per day. This directive produced the greatest amount of mail received by me since I have been in office, as I received several thousand protests against this action. The Members of the House passed a bill rescinding this order of the Postmaster General; however, at this time, no action has been taken by the Senate.

SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH, AND WELFARE

In the field of social legislation, the outstanding accomplishment of the Eighty-first Congress was the amendment of the Social Security Act to extend coverage to over 10,000,000 more persons. The amendment also increases old-age and survivorship payments, and brings into balance the public assistance program.

While the benefits payable under this act are increased, there is still many examples of inequalities which will require further study and further amendment. I sincerely believe that everyone should contribute to his own pension plan and that as the contributions are increased, the benefits should likewise be increased, so that some day soon, we may have a satisfactory answer to the present problem of old age and insecurity.

The Federal-aid program for hospital construction was extended and the amounts available for this purpose increased.

Congress passed the National Housing Act of 1950, which expands and supplements Federal housing for moderate income families. It also increases the limit on the amount of mortgages that could be purchased by the Government, and liberalizes the financing terms on FHA, insured rental housing and cooperative housing, particularly insofar as veterans were concerned.

AGRICULTURE

Probably the outstanding act passed by the Eighty-first Congress which affects more individuals directly than any other was the law repealing the tax on oleomargarine. This eliminates a heavy tax upon colored oleomargarine. However, the matter will now be considered by the Pennsylvania Legislature as our Commonwealth has an act forbidding the sale of colored oleomargarine.

The President's agricultural program, known as the Brannan plan, received absolutely no consideration. The present price-support program authorizes the continuance of 90-percent parity of farm prices throughout 1950, and thereafter reverts to a sliding scale and new parities. There has been every effort on behalf of the Truman Administration to bring the price-support program into disrepute so that they would be able to place in operation the far more obnoxious and untenable program known as the Brannan plan.

Under the Brannan plan, farmers are guaranteed by the Government a high income for their products, then the farmer produces and sells his products for what he can get for them in the open market. The wholesaler and retailer then sell to the consumer for what they can receive, and finally, the farmer goes to the Government with his records, marketing cards, reports, storage or sales receipts or any other report which the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, and is paid the difference between what he is guaranteed and the amount he received in the open market.

VETERANS

A great many veterans have developed tuberculosis following World War II, and many of these cases were in the advanced stages before they were discovered. However, the law fixed the presumptive period of 1 year. Realizing the many inequities that this caused, Congress fixed at 3 years the presumptive period for World War II tubercular disability cases.

Congress also extended the terms of certain patents of persons who served in World War II. They defined the authority of the Veterans' Administration in carrying out a veteran's education under the GI bill of rights, and gave World War II veterans in the postal service credit toward automatic promotions for time spent in Armed Forces. This last bill, however, was vetoed by the President.

In addition, Congress opposed the giving up of certain hospital facilities by the Department of Defense in its economy program, a part of which were used by the Veterans' Administration. The folly of this type of economy has since been demonstrated by the Department of Defense again having to reactivate all of the hospitals which they closed.

CIVIL RIGHTS

For many years both political parties have promised statehood to Alaska and Hawaii. After very extensive hearings, the House passed bills admitting Hawaii and Alaska to statehood in the Union. Unfortunately, the Senate has not seen fit to consider these two important measures and they have been pigeonholed by that body.

Our insular possessions have received a great deal of consideration at this session of Congress, and a civil government was provided for Guam, and also the people of Puerto Rico were authorized to organize a constitutional government.

The exclusion from citizenship because of color, which was enacted by a former Congress, has always been recognized as an unjust discrimination. Congress passed a bill removing the restrictions on naturalization of Japanese who entered the United States before 1924. However, this bill was vetoed by the President because of an amendment which provided for the revoking of citizenship, not only of these but of other naturalized citizens for subversive activities.

A bill establishing a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission passed the House, but due to the filibuster procedure authorized in the Senate, this governing body voted not to limit debate so as to permit the discussion of this matter.

NATURAL RESOURCES

A matter which vitally affects this congressional district is the importation of foreign oil. One of the outstanding industries of the Twenty-sixth Congressional District is coal mining, and as a result of the huge importation of foreign oil, many miners were put out of work, and some mines were closed down. Railroaders, who were dependent upon the cars from the coal fields for their livelihoods, were also furloughed because of this existing condition. Notwithstanding the fact that a serious protest was raised by Members of Congress who come from coal-producing areas, the Truman administration's attitude was that the importation of foreign residual fuel oil constituted no threat whatsoever to our economy, and since that time, have continued to allow foreign oil, a large percentage of which was residual fuel oil, to come into this country at the rate of 1,000,000 barrels per day throughout 1950.

A study of the huge importation of foreign oil and its effect upon the bituminous coal industry in this country, especially in view of total war, makes one realize that the failure of the Truman administration to act in this matter for the relief of the coal industry is actually prejudicing our national security.

The Kerr gas bill, which I voted against, was an act to exempt independent producers and gatherers of natural gas from regulation by the Federal Power Commission and would have resulted in an increase in the cost of natural gas to the consumer. This bill was vetoed by the President.

COMMITTEE WORK

During this session of Congress, I have been a member of the Committee on Public Lands—an important committee for the Representative for this district because it deals with all problems relating to mines and mining, as well as other natural resources. In addition to these fields it covers irrigation and reclamation, national parks and forests, Indian affairs, and territorial and insular affairs.

Because of the broad scope of this committee, almost 800 bills were referred to it during the Eighty-first Congress. The committee, under the able leadership of the Honorable J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, held extensive hearings on many of these measures and reported to the House for action 315 bills. Of this number, 218 have been enacted into law—almost one-third of the legislation passed by this Congress. There are at present 25 of these reported bills pending before the House and 72 before the Senate. It is natural, therefore, that this committee work has required a great deal of my time and study.

MISCELLANEOUS

Although a new Member of Congress, I did introduce some legislation which has become law. Three private bills for persons who were unable to become citizens of the United States were sponsored by me, and all three of these have been enacted into law. The first bill to draft doctors and dentists who received their education at the taxpayer's expense, which bill formed the basis of the legislation finally enacted, was also introduced by me. It was this bill that gave me Nation-wide publicity.

I have introduced a bill to provide for the payment of $10,000 life insurance and 6 months salary to the families of the members of the Twenty-eighth Division of the Pennsylvania National Guard, who were killed in the train wreck on September 11, 1950. Among the other bills which I introduced was one providing for free postage for veterans in veterans' hospitals; a bill providing for the revision of our tax structure, with an elimination of all wartime excise taxes, as well as increased exemptions for personal taxes.

My mail has been unusually heavy. However, I have answered every letter that has come from the Twenty-sixth Congressional District, and I have taken a personal interest in each and every case which has come into my office. While I have never occupied a public office prior to this time, I have always had a desire to be in a position where I could be of service to a large number of people, and I find as a Member of Congress, I have that opportunity. I want the residents of the Twenty-sixth Congressional District of Pennsylvania to know that my entire staff and I stand ready at all times to serve them.

The Mata Hari of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON D. McKINNON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Chairman, the extremes to which Communists go to achieve their objectives is well known to many, but the following report by Drew Pearson on the Mata Hari of Korea illustrates the necessity for constant vigilance our military authorities face. I am confident that 99.9 percent of our occupational forces are moral, loyal Americans, but the following story illustrates the grave dangers that can befall our security when we have one rotten apple in the barrel:

There has been a lot of congressional debate as to who was to blame for our being caught napping in Korea. But no Congressman has touched upon the most amazing story of Korean espionage—the manner in which a Korean Mata Hari lived with an American Army colonel and gave the Communists intimate details on American Army strength.

The lady in question, now executed as a spy, was Kim Soo Im, a vivacious, American-educated Korean girl who was married to one of Korea's top Communists, Lee Kang Kook.

At the same time she was married to Lee she was the mistress of a top American colonel, John E Baird, who, as provost marshal, was in charge of keeping law and order among American troops in Korea. He was also top adviser to the new Korean Army.

Colonel Baird occupied one of the most elegant houses in Seoul, and for a time Madam Kim lived with him. According to the Korean press, she even bore him a child.

It was well known to Koreans that Kim Soo Im was intimate with the colonel. They were seen together publicly. And it was also known by many Koreans that she was married to one of the top Communists, Lee Kang Kook, who had been hiding from the military government and for whom the authorities had thrown out a dragnet.

However, because of American prestige, Koreans did nothing about the situation. After all, Americans were Korea's benefactors, the trainers of Korean troops, in effect the rulers of the country. Colonel Baird himself was senior adviser to the Korean Army. So it was embarrassing to make any protest.

COUNTERESPIONAGE

When the above facts, plus a great many others, were disclosed officially at the time of Kim Soo Im's trial, Colonel Baird gave the official explanation that he was using the lady as his interpreter and to get information from her

If so, he was not very successful. For subsequent developments have shown that the Communists knew all about our military operations, while we knew little about them.

Furthermore, when Kim Soo Im was tried, last May, the Koreans amassed such overwhelming evidence against her that she confessed all. Colonel Baird, who had been in intimate day-to-day contact with her, was made to look extremely foolish for not having known the same facts.

It was even reported that Madam Kim had hidden her Communist husband in the home of the American Army colonel for a few days when the search for him was getting hot. The colonel's house was a big one, so this was not difficult to do without Baird's knowing it.

For more than a year, Lee Kang Kook managed to foil the South Korean police and American military. Eventually, he escaped into North Korea in an American Army jeep—by courtesy of Colonel Baird's mistress.

COMMUNIST HUSBAND ESCAPES

Colonel Baird had given his lady love a new Chrysler. However, she did not use this car to take her husband across the thirty-eighth parallel. Instead, she finagled a jeep from the Army motor pool and had it driven by a trusted Communist driver, Choi Yong Tai.

Lee was disguised as a doctor, and Kim went along to tell the border guards that her mother was desperately ill in North Korea and the doctor was on his way to see her. Thus the No. 2 Communist of Korea escaped—thanks to the United States Army.

On one occasion, when Kim wanted to get an Army jeep for a trip up near the thirty-eighth parallel, Harry Frelinghuysen, son of the GOP ex-Senator from New Jersey, then an Army lieutenant, refused. However, he was overruled by a colonel. Madam Kim got the jeep.

OTHER MATA HARIS

The case of Kim Soo Im and Colonel Baird probably could have taken place in various parts of the world—especially in Japan and Germany, where American troops are stationed far from home and families. And what the Army is worried about right now is that other Communist spies might be planted on American officers.

Colonel Baird, 60 years old, born in Ireland, was a policeman in Rhode Island and a Reserve officer when he joined the Army as a major in 1941. He was stationed in Korea for 4 years, 3 of them as provost marshal, 1 of them as senior adviser to the Korean National Police.

Kim Soo Im, orphaned at an early age, was raised by an American missionary family and educated in an American school. She spoke English perfectly, acquired the vivaciousness of an American girl.

When American troops entered Korea she served as hostess at the Banta Hotel in Seoul, which was General Hodges' headquarters. This was the United States Army's nerve center and it gave her access to all sorts of gossip and tidbits which she relayed to her Communist husband.

During her trial it developed that Kim had given the Communists the complete plans for the withdrawal of United States troops from Korea. It was also revealed that she had a large amount of Japanese yen and was spending it in Seoul, perhaps for bribery, perhaps to create inflation.

Colonel Baird left Korea on June 3, at about the time his mistress was executed. He is now on leave from the Army.

The Late Honorable George J. Bates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McMILLAN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay my respects to the late GEORGE BATES, our beloved colleague, who, in my opinion, was one of the most distinguished members of the House of Representatives.

I had the pleasure and privilege of serving on the same committee for 12 years with our late colleague, and I have never known a more conscientious, hard-working man. Mr. BATES, in his position as ranking minority member on the District Committee during my term as chairman of that committee, was always eager and ready to cooperate with me in every instance. Mr. BATES carefully considered every proposed piece of legislation which was presented to the District Committee, and I leaned heavily on his opinion at all times in making my decisions on bills presented to our committee.

Mr. BATES was a statesman, and party lines meant nothing to him when he felt that proposed legislation was worthy of consideration. It was through Mr. BATES' efforts that the majority of the most important legislation enacted by the District Committee received favorable consideration of both the House and the committee.

I know of no man who has ever served in the Congress of the United States who came nearer holding the unanimous respect of all Members of the House, both Republican and Democrat. He was an untiring worker and always accepted any duties placed upon him with a smile. I always knew that when any bill was referred to his subcommittee that it would be thoroughly digested and considered before it was reported to the full committee.

I understand Mr. BATES was one of the leading members of the Armed Services Committee, and I remember when he led a subcommittee through the European countries on an investigation tour during the war, and made an excellent reputation as an untiring worker with the least publicity.

I shall forever be grateful that I had the opportunity to work with and be a friend of a man of Mr. BATES' character and ability. He left an everlasting imprint on my mind and was my ideal of a statesman. The State of Massachusetts, and the United States as a whole, lost one of its most able public servants in the untimely passing of our beloved colleague, Mr. BATES.

Sabotage at Bethany, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. ELSTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, the blast which wrecked the Voice of America transmitter tower of the Crosley Broadcasting Corp. in the Cincinnati area is clearly the work of agents of Moscow. It is striking evidence that sabotage is a part of the plan of the Reds to block all efforts to bring about world peace. It is but a sample of what can be expected in the event of an all-out war with Russia and points up the urgent necessity of legislation to regulate the activities not only of Communists but also of the pinkos and fellow travelers who belong to Communist-front organizations. These enemies of America infest every metropolitan community, and legislation for their regulation is long overdue. Public opinion should be sufficient to deal with those who have been playing "footsie" with the Communists but who may not fall strictly within the above categories. American boys in Korea will see little reason to carry on the fight against Communist aggression abroad unless every possible effort is made to stamp it out at home.

The sabotage committed against the radio tower near Cincinnati is of international significance. I include as a part of my remarks the following editorials from the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Cincinnati Times-Star, and the Cincinnati Post. The above-mentioned articles follow:

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer of September 20, 1950]

SABOTAGE AT BETHANY

Two items of international significance both of which have taken place under our noses, have been pointed up by recent news stories. Strange enough, the majority of Cincinnatians hardly were cognizant of either. Millions of persons, thousands of miles distant, knew more about the situation than did we.

Until a sabotage explosion wrecked an antenna on the powerful broadcasting plant at Bethany, 25 miles northeast of Fountain Square, the great transmitter had received but little publicity hereabouts. Yet this station, built by the Crosley Broadcasting Corp. for the United States State Department, is one of the most powerful in the world. It is used to beam Voice of America broadcasts to every corner of the globe.

The second point in the story is one which demands immediate correction. Investigation shows that the Voice of America transmitter, although it plays a vital role in our international program, has gone unguarded since the end of World War II. For some unexplained reason—possibly neglect or lack of funds—the State Department has not felt it necessary to place guards around the group of big antennae. The surrounding cyclone fence had been cut, apparently to allow entrance for the supposed saboteur who did the recent job.

This explosion should give ample warning to all of us, officials included, that the Reds will grasp every opportunity to block the United States program for world peace. It is new evidence of the need for putting every Communist in this country "under wraps" for the duration of the emergency. And it goes without saying that guards should be placed at Bethany immediately—and at all other points where the hand of communism is likely to direct its violence.

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star of September 20, 1950]

THE BLAST AT BETHANY

Until the proper authorities come out with some other explanation, if they do at all, the public has every right to regard the blasting of one of the Voice of America radio towers at Bethany as a pure case of sabotage. All the facts and circumstances argue against its being an accident, especially since this was the second explosion at Bethany this summer.

Radio towers don't just blow up. Nor do they get struck by lightning on a perfectly clear night. Furthermore, the force of the blast and the way in which the tower was demolished point to a human origin. Finally, what more obvious target for sabotage than a radio tower which is beaming programs to the countries behind the iron curtain?

If the blast should prove to be sabotage, as everyone suspects, there are two inferences to be drawn from the incident. In the face of what happened at Bethany no thinking citizen can continue to hide ostrich-like from the threat of his way of life. The Crusade for Freedom takes on a new meaning. And, secondly, an attempt to cripple the Voice of America is proof that this program is having an effect. There would be no need to silence it if it were not reaching the ears of those at whom it is aimed. Truth is a powerful weapon, and the perverters of truth fear it most.

[From the Cincinnati Post of September 20, 1950.]

LOCKING THE STABLE DOOR

Officials of the State Department may find some comfort in the fact that the blast which wrecked the Voice of America transmitter tower at Bethany did not cut off broadcasts overseas.

Nevertheless, it seems surprising to the average man that no steps were taken after the previous explosion last May to guard the tower and other installations. Apparently the property was wide open to anyone seeking to do mischief.

Now, according to the official in charge of this important work of telling America's story to the world, steps will be taken to prevent a third explosion. All one can add to that is—it's about time.

Acheson-Lattimore Dilettante Dabblers in Diplomatic Debacles Brought on Korean Crisis

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, as American blood stains the soil of Korea and American GI's turn the tide of battle and forge ahead in the campaign which may well terminate in the defeat of all Communists in Korea, the American people may well ponder the cost in lives and materials of the war which should never have been necessary.

Who is to blame for the foreign policy which permitted establishment of a Communist regime in the northern half of Korea, and then in the face of the Communist threat across the thirty-eighth parallel deliberately wrote Korea off the books, refused to provide southern Korea with the weapons to build an adequate defense against Communist aggression even after the Congress had appropriated money for this purpose, and withdrew American troops thereby inviting the ultimate invasion of South Korea by the Communists?

The guilt for the complete lack of foresight in our foreign policy in Korea which has cost the lives of American boys and returned to our shores a new grim harvest of veterans with shattered bodies and broken lives must be placed.

Our foreign policy conceived by Acheson and Lattimore, the dilettante dabblers in diplomatic debacles, with the approval of President Truman, is directly responsible for our present involvement in Korea and for all the sacrifices and heartbreak in America that has followed, as ever it must, in the wake of war. And the children now fatherless, the wives newly widowed, and the parents who have lost sons have a right to know who is to blame.

Acheson with the assistance of President Truman has sown to the wind appeasement in our foreign policy which has proved in fact no policy at all in Asia and Korea. The American people are reaping the whirlwind of war.

An intelligent realistic foreign policy in the Far East could have prevented the outbreak of Communist aggression in Korea and could have strengthened the allied position throughout the world. But the Acheson-Lattimore-Truman policy failed.

The following review from the September 15 issue of the Catholic Review gives an excellent analysis of the facts which place the blame for Korea squarely upon the Acheson-Lattimore group:

No matter what the outcome of the Korean war, it will be difficult if not impossible to gloss over, forget, obscure, or ignore the enormous cost it has exacted in life and money. And someone is going to get the blame for it.

The Collier's editorial for September 16 makes it clear that, contrary to a whispering campaign which seems to have its center in Washington, "MacArthur is not to blame." Collier's seems to think discredit should go to Secretary of State Acheson and Louis Johnson, with Acheson well ahead.

Among the candidates for dishonor in connection with the affair are mentioned "the various and badly coordinate intelligence units of the Government, and the persons who evaluate these units' information."

President Truman is practically exonerated on the inferential grounds that any responsibility he might have is attributable to a bill of goods Mr. Acheson may have sold him. There is a growing conviction that the President is not too competent for matters of such moment. He is most unfortunate in the somewhat enforced choice of advisors whose orientation—considering Russia fundamentally Asiatic—has been rather international—if we may parallel or paraphrase Marx and Lenin—than national or American.

We are inclined to exonerate our intelligence units. They were not to blame for Pearl Harbor. They have not been to blame for Communist effectiveness and infiltration in our own country. They are not likely to be blameworthy in the matter of Korea. They report the facts as they find them; they do not decide upon the action indicated.

About "the persons who evaluate" the information submitted we are not so sure. Back in Wilson's time we sent three Ambassadors to Mexico till we got one who submitted the kind of information wanted in Washington. Before the beginning of our share in World War II, we got a lot of information about Jap plans of attack from our own units and from the Koreans; but it suited administration policy to ignore the warnings till an attack justified our going into the conflict through the back door when we had long had ample reason to use the front one.

Ultimately, the information received should determine our foreign policy. When the policy that emerges from the State Department is inconsistent with the information upon which it is presumed to be based, then it is ideological, ideal, unrealistic, or it is political or it is unintelligible. Briefly, it must be based on facts or it is a mess. The Korean policy was a mess.

So we are inclined to agree that the booby prize goes to Secretary Acheson. And if Mr. Truman doesn't want a liberal share of the responsibility for the stupid Far East policy, fathered by Professor Lattimore and sponsored by the dilletante dabbler in diplomatic debacles, he would do well to reconsider his declaration of loyalty to a Secretary whose policy he has already had to discard in the Korean crisis.

Personally, the President may continue to be as loyal to his Secretary of State as the Secretary might be to his own friends. But, unfortunately, no amount of personal loyalty will prove adequate to offset stupidity.

The Far East policy of the Acheson-Lattimore group has proved stupid and may prove disastrous. It has certainly been disastrous for those who have had to be sacrificed and will certainly be so for thousands more. For this, and whatever else may follow from the Korean catastrophe, history will in all probability fasten the blame upon our present Secretary of State.

The only escape from that ignominy lies in the possibility that progressive appeasement of communism may eventually enable Russia to rewrite the textbooks.

Desperate Need for Long-Range Farm Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD O. LOVRE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, I have been disappointed with the leadership of the Eighty-first Congress for not providing agriculture with a long-range plan.

Mr. Speaker, I say they have miserably failed the farmer by not enacting a permanent farm legislation.

If there ever was a desperate need for long-range farm legislation it is now. The war in Korea and the demands for high farm production and increased taxes requires stable commodity markets and a high level of farm income.

Mr. Speaker, agricultural income governs national income by a 1-to-7 ratio. Thus, if we want national prosperity we must have a high level of farm income.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic congressional leadership failed to realize the dire necessity of long-range farm planning. The Anderson farm bill with its 90-percent support level is recognized as stop-gap legislation at best by farm leaders.

When the leadership found that the Brannan farm plan did not catch on among farmers, they dropped it like a hot potato. Democratic farm leaders in the House and Senate even refused to hold hearings on it. Most Democratic candidates for Congress refuse to run on it. Even South Dakota Democrats are desperately trying to forget it. They did not even include it in their party platform.

Mr. Speaker, talk about wild promises, the Brannan plan was certainly that.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken many times about my self-managed, full-parity, self-financing plan for the family-sized farmer. As you know, it would provide full 100 percent of parity without Treasury grants or bureaucratic control. It would operate on a two-price basis with the farmer assured of full parity on his share of normal domestic consumption.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely necessary that farmers receive full 100 percent of parity. Anyone who is against 100 percent of parity for the family-sized farmer either does not like prosperity or he is talking through his hat. The record shows that out of 10,000,000 business units in this country 6,000,000 of them are individually owned and operated farms. Think of the buying power of this segment of our population.

Mr. Speaker, if labor wants high wages and business wants profits and Government wants taxes, the farmer must be prosperous.

Mr. Speaker, the leadership of this Congress has let the dust settle on long-range farm laws just as Secretary of State Dean Acheson did on China and Korea and look what happened. I hope it does not take the same kind of a jolt to shake this dust off of permanent farm legislation.

A Former Capitol Page Speaks Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the following copy of a letter to W. Averell Harriman was forwarded to me by one of our former pages here in the House of Representatives. This keen observation, I believe, is worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I include it herewith:

Hon. W. AVERELL HARRIMAN,
The Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARRIMAN: Your recent venomously bitter attack on Senator Robert A. TAFT, of Ohio, one of the outstanding statesman in the United States Senate, has caused no end of concern throughout the Nation.

Many Americans are alarmed, firstly, because a diplomat, who is allegedly also a statesman of some merit, should, especially in such crucial times, be both willing and capable of conducting himself in a manner becoming the best interests of this Republic at home and abroad and in a manner carrying out the finest traditions of the diplomatic corps of this and other countries. In your unmitigated attack on Senator TAFT, a candidate for reelection in a domestic fight, you have thrown off the honored cloak of diplomatic dignity and statesmanlike worth to engage in name-calling, vituperation, and political demogoguery. You have completely failed to consider and to uphold your official position. As one of America's leading diplomats and as an adviser to the President, you have failed to consider the proprieties of your offices. And certainly, as a scion of one of America's leading families, you should have no difficulty recognizing the difference between dignity and indignity, duty and interference.

Many persons are alarmed, secondly, that you, in whom many have so long trusted as a leader and consultant more or less without political bias, should now choose to participate in the most unworthy manner in a State political campaign. Are you a gentleman who shall handle crucial problems of national and international stature, or are you a typical mudslinger who shall attack politicians when and where you happen to see fit? You cannot be both.

Thirdly, there is alarm on account of the blundering nature of your political attack on Mr. TAFT. Any man who has the faintest knowledge of simple logic can readily discern that if Senator TAFT is aiding the Communists by his conduct in the Senate, then virtually every other Member of Congress, to a greater or lesser extent, is similarly aiding them. Senator TAFT has always supported anti-Communist legislation, but yesterday 50 other Senators likewise voted in favor of such a bill. Senator TAFT has never been wholeheartedly in favor of limitless foreign expenditures, but he has never downright opposed foreign aid. When others, whose names are all too obvious to you and hence require no mention, were betraying this Republic, wittingly or unwittingly, at Yalta and Tehran, where were you, oh peerless judge of other men, and what have you since done to ameliorate conditions and to alleviate these gravest of errors? The words of the Bible are not totally inaccurate when they say: "Judge not, lest ye be judged."

We trust you recognize the difference between a statesman and a politician, and that you will in the future act accordingly. No one is really concerned with what you say or do, except that you have and have had positions of great influence, and there are millions of Americans who are interested in preserving America.

I should like to hear from you in reply.

Faithfully,

MARION E. HARRISON.
